Gems of Thought.

If you would win applause express the sentiments of others.—Galveston News.

If we knew ourselves, we should not judge each other harshly.—George Eliot.

THERE ought to be no liquor question except whether one will drink or decline.—Geo. E. Macdonald.

Be free and conscious of all you are:
Dignity and a selfness great;
Life at one with the farthest star,
With all of nature in every state.
—J. William Lloyd.

THE natural rights of men, civil and political, are liberty, equality, security, property, social protection, and resistance to oppression. Liberty consists in the right to do whatever is not contrary to the rights of others.—Thomas Paine.

If the story of the Fall is not the true record of an historical occurrence, what becomes of Pauline theology? Yet the story of the Fall as directly conflicts with probability, and is as devoid of trustworthy evidence, as that of the creation or that of the deluge, with which it forms an harmoniously legendary series.—Huxley.

THOUGH it is not to be supposed that cadences will ever convey emotions exactly as words convey thoughts, yet it is quite possible that the emotional language of the future will rise as much above our present emotional language, as our intellectual language has already risen above the intellectual language of the lowest race.—Herbert Spencer.

INQUIRY into the evidence of a doctrine is not to be made once for all, and then taken as finally settled. It is never lawful to stifle a doubt; for either it can be honestly answered by means of the inquiry already made, or else it proves that the inquiry was not complete. "But," says one, "I am a busy man; I have no time for the long course of study which would be necessary to make me in any degree a competent judge of certain questions, or even able to understand the nature of the arguments." Then he should have no time to believe.—W. K. Clifford.

THE prevalent idea among Christian tribes and gentiles is that the oldest university in the world is in Europe. This error we wish to correct. In the tenth and eleventh centuries the university of Fez, in Africa, was almost the only seat of Arabic and Christian learning in the world. Before universities existed in Paris, Oxford, Cambridge, Padua, or Bologna, students flocked to Fez from Andalusia, France, and England; and at the present day Fez is the chief Western seat for languages and learning in connection with the Mohammedan religion and theology.—The Moslem World.

BURNS.

BROTHER of Homer, Nature's darling child,
Best prophet of this dainty-cultured age,
When men, by far-sought fancies grandly spoiled,
Find truth's fair face in thy untutored page;
Thy home-spun words let silken dames dispraise,
And book-learned wits thy plowman phrase despise;
There lives a power in thy fresh bickering lays
That kins thee with the best that star the skies.
Thy song is like the purple-vested Ben Rooted in granite, round whose shoulders sweep
Salubrious airs, and lucid fountains leap Joyful into the warm green-winding glen,
Where rushing rivers pour their warring tide,
And grand old pine-trees toss their branchy pride.

AGAINST all miracles, against all holy superstitions, against sacred mistakes, he (Voltaire) shot the arrows of ridicule. These arrows, winged by fancy, sharpened by wit, poisoned by truth, always reached the center. It is claimed by many that anything, the best and holiest, can be ridiculed. As a matter of fact, he who attempts to ridicule the truth ridicules himself. He becomes the food of his own laughter. The mind of man is many-sided. Truth must be, and is, willing to be tested in every way, tested by all the senses. But in what way can the absurdity of the "real presence" be answered, except by banter, by raillery, by ridicule, by persiflage? How are you going to convince a man who believes that, when he swallows the sacred wafer, he has eaten the entire Trinity, and that a priest drinking a drop of wine has devoured the Infinite? How are you to reason with a man who believes that, if any of the sacred wafers are left over, they should be put in a secure place, so that mice should not eat God?—Ingersoll.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professional naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world.

A Contemptible Fraud.

Rev. Alexander P. Dole, of the Paulist Fathers, has this to say about the present Sabbath observance fight in New York:

"There is going on to-day an organized conspiracy in which thousands of well-meaning citizens are engaged, whose avowed purpose is to cut the heart out of our Christian Sunday under the plea of personal liberty. I protest against this ruthless invasion of the very sanctuary of God by the destroying foot of the Philistine, whose only god is his belly. The butcher and the baker have been closed every Sunday for the last hundred years, and never was there a word about restricting personal liberty. But close the saloon on Sunday, and personal liberty, that bulwark of free government, is strangled."

Our Catholic priest is like the Protestant priests who have preceded him in the Sabbatarian crusade—he is unable to stick to facts. It is not true that during the last hundred years no one has protested against the compulsory closing of the meat market and the bakery on Sunday, and Rev. Mr. Dole can scarcely have the excuse of ignorance for his glaring misstatement. Neither is it true that there is a conspiracy to "cut the heart out of our Christian Sunday under the plea of personal liberty." No one proposes to meddle with your Christian Sunday, any more than Freethinkers propose to meddle with the Bible Sabbath. The protest and the battle is against your persistent and largely successful attempt to force your Christian Sunday on those who do not care to observe it. Worship all that you like on that day; be as idle as you wish; stay at home or go to church; that is entirely your own affair. But mind your own business and keep your noses out of that of other people. That is all that is asked of you. "I protest against this ruthless invasion of the very sanctuary of God by the destroying foot of the Philistine." That is rodo-montade, and false at that. No Philistine is invading anybody's sanctuary. It is the priest of the sanctuary who is invading the mart of the Philistine and spoiling him, just as of old God's "chosen people" invaded and spoiled and massacred the "heathens" round about them. That is simply another instance of the wolf pouncing on the lamb under the pretext that the latter has roiled the stream by going into it below the place where his lupine lordship is drinking. The religious tyrant has never lacked for excuses for his crimes, but of justification he can show none.

State Universities and the Churches.

Prof. Richard T. Ely, the well-known educator and writer, has again brought himself prominently before the public by the promulgation of a scheme for the practical union of religious and secular higher education. His latest article on the subject appears in the Cosmopolitan for October. His general position is that the state university is the capstone of the structure of public education. A university ought to have available at least a million dollars a year. Only through taxation can the vast sums necessary be raised. Hence Professor Ely frowns upon denominational and other private institutions of learning. Private philanthropy may pioneer the way by donating to public institutions for specific studies before the people at large are awake to the importance of this particular work. That is about the limit of its usefulness. "If we were at the very beginning, the writer would possibly say, 'No private universities of any sort.' But we have to deal with an actual situation." This being so, the professor would discourage all new foundations and favor the concentration of the existing schools of the various denominations.

Now to what is this leading? It is self-evident that the churches will not relinquish sectarian instruction. They are committed to it by the inexorable logic of their position, Protestants no less than Catholics. Professor Ely perceives this and sets himself the task of convincing the ecclesiastical educators that the churches will lose nothing and will gain much by gradually abandoning their own schools and committing to the state universities the education of their youth. The arguments that he uses are ingenuous, to say the least, while the scheme itself is simply breath-taking in its audacity. If Professor Ely were not so enthusiastic a collectivist, so serious a propagandist, and so pious a man withal, one could scarcely resist harboring the suspicion that he is making fun of the religious people.

The first reason which he offers to the churches in support of his proposition has relation to the missionary work. He says:

"How can you justify yourselves in giving money to do work which the tax-payers are willing to do, when there are so many things that need to be done, and which the tax-payers can by no possibility be persuaded to do? Think of the needs of home and foreign missions! Remember the appeals from educational institutions in the missionary fields."

Put a little more plainly, this means that the tax-payers will not appropriate money for the support of foreign missions, therefore the church should let the tax-payers foot the bills for the home educational missions, leaving the churches free to devote all their spare cash to the conversion of the outside heathen. Thus with the Bible in the common schools, the church relieved of the higher education of her embryo ministers and her lay workers, and her property exempt from taxation, she would have no ground for just complaint except the failure of the state to build her places of worship and pay the salaries of her preachers; and these "reforms" would follow the others as a matter of course. Again Professor Ely:

"The calls upon all persons who are willing to improve the vast opportunities for usefulness afforded in our day are such that they should husband their resources and not waste them in needless duplication. But this is not all. There is no reason why there should be hostility between the state universities and the churches, but every reason why there should be the closest relations. Religious denominations have every opportunity which they can desire to exercise influence upon the students of the state university. First may be mentioned the Young Men's Christian associations of state universities, which are an important channel of religious influence. There is opportunity to strengthen such institutions. Professorships of the evidences of Christianity and like subjects might very well be established in connection with these associations, and these professorships could be controlled by their trustees. Apart from this, there is no reason why any religious denomination, or any group of religious denominations, should not at the seat of state universities construct halls or dormitories which should furnish homes for students. It is noteworthy that the colleges of Oxford were originally simply dormitories, and were called 'halls.'"

The last sentence has considerable significance. Reasoning from analogy, we legitimately infer that Professor Ely thinks that the denominational "halls" contiguous to the state universities will ultimately become colleges supported by the state. But to continue this quotation:

"Such a hall could be established directly opposite the grounds of a state university, and it would attract many students. As this hall, which indeed might be called a college, named after some great religious light, would be under the control of trustees appointed by the founders and supporters, there is no reason why the religious life of the institution should not be an earnest and active one. Family prayers could be held every morning, and religious services conducted during the week, as well as on Sunday. Any religious denomination might make such a hall a center of activity. Professorships could be established, and those things taught which are of peculiar importance to the denomination or denominations interested; for example, church history, evidences of Christianity, and Christian ethics. There could be a principal, a highly educated man, to receive a salary equal to that of a well-paid college professor."

There seem to be here two main immediate objects in view, with a hidden and more remote one to be reached in course of time. The first immediate object is the one already mentioned by Professor Ely, the lifting of the larger portion of the burden of education now carried by the denominations and transferring it to the shoulders of the state, thus releasing a large volume of church revenues and turning it into the channels of foreign mission and school work. The second immediate object is the bringing of higher education more directly and fully under the influence of Christianity. At present there are each year tens of thousands of students in the state universities and private non-sectarian schools who are partly out of the religious atmosphere, who are receiving a purely secular education, and therefore are likely to be lost to Christianity. Young men and women prefer to go to the more famous institutions, like Harvard and Yale, and the state universities of California, Michigan, Wisconsin, and Kansas. Necessarily there are included among these many of the children of active churchmen. And as the constantly widening field of university work calls for continually augmenting revenues the struggle for existence becomes harder and harder for the denominational institutions. Unless they have the means to do the work done by the secular institutions they are at a fatal disadvantage, for multitudes of youths will go to the schools offering the better opportunities, regardless of the religious bias of their parents. So something must be done. If church people can be induced to transfer their children from the privately-supported religious schools to the state-supported secular schools, accompanying them there with all the religious influences available, and giving them instruction at their own expense, for the present, in a few purely religious branches, it may be possible, it is thought, to largely nullify the rationalist work of the universities. Whether this scheme would be a success to any considerable extent would depend upon the degree to which they could direct the courses of study in the universities and the selection of instructors therein. Given control in these directions, they would have it in their power to greatly accelerate the "movement in favor of ignorance." But if their schemes failed to work in this particular they might lose more than they would gain, for the quota of students formerly religiously influenced and instructed in the denominational institutions would be subjected to the same danger of being led away after false deities that menace the present students in the state universities and the more independent private institutions. Professor Ely is playing with fire; he may succeed in starting a conflagration that will consume civilization, or it may merely burn out of it the Christian dross.

The ulterior object hinted at in the preceding paragraph is the ultimate state-support of the denominational "halls" or colleges, or perhaps even the transfer to the university proper of their functions. In one way or another, education in all its departments is to be made religious, and made religious largely or wholly at the expense of the taxpayer. This is shown still more conclusively in the next to the closing quotation which we shall make for this article.

Professor Ely censures Protestants for antagonizing the state university in the interest of denominational colleges, and tells them that they have no logical ground upon which to stand in their opposition to Catholic parochial schools while they do this. He quotes an English Congregationalist, himself the principal of a theological seminary in England, as saying that he did not see how Protestants could advocate sectarian colleges and oppose Catholic parochial schools. If he had added that the Protestants insist upon making the common schools the seed-beds of Protestant or at least of Christian theology, his rebuke would have had more apparent point. But where does the professor himself stand? Is he not committed to the position that Protestants and Catholics alike should make the taxpayer put up the money, or most of the money, for the education of Christian ministers? It is indisputable that Professor Ely wants the denominations to center "their activity about public institutions" and this means, as a matter of course, that all the students in all the universities are to be put and kept during all their college life as closely under the "moral" and religious tutelage of the clergy as is possible. The whole atmosphere of the university town is to be made religious; any number of denominations—say twenty or fifty—will build halls or dormitories, and as these will be run with the money begged from the credulous masses and the ambitious possessors of large wealth, it is easy to see that competition will be crushed out and the students forced, by the absence of free homes, to patronize the dormitories. That this is not a strained interpretation of the scheme is shown by what is given below, no less than by what we have previously quoted:

"The attitude of the Protestant who fights state universities and then complains that they are irreligious, is a most painful one."

The moral of it being that the Protestant (and the Catholic also, of course) should help the state universities and make them religious! By a parity of reasoning, the churches should assist the common schools with the same end in view. But it is not practicable to surround every common school building with halls or chapels; how, then, is the orthodox complaint that the common schools are irreligious to be answered? By retaining the Bible and having daily prayers and religious song services? But whose Bible? And there is the old fight again between Catholic and Protestant, saying nothing of the rights of the Freethinker and the Jew.

Professor Ely quotes from a letter he has received from a "well-known Congregational clergyman." Here are some suggestive sentences:

"I have been thinking much of your plan for connecting the churches more closely with the state university. I wish that there was such a condition of affairs in church and state as to make such a proposition hopeful of popular favor. [If nothing more is contemplated than a voluntary church movement, what has the condition of affairs in the 'state' to do with the building of the halls?] It would go a long way in the line of solving the much-discussed and growing question of church and state in their mutual relations to education. It seems to me that your plan ought to satisfy both the pronounced secularist and the advocates of Christian education. Your plan would allow perfect religious freedom, while providing for the religious development of the students. [Would there be no orthodox ostracism of the students who should prefer to go to the Freethought dormitory, if one were built, and, by the way, would one of these be tolerated?] It would give no grounds, either, for the cry of the interference of the church with public instruction."

How hollow this last sentence sounds after reading what Professor Ely has written concerning the Christianizing of the universities!

If there is to be continuous progress in the affairs of men, education must not be permitted to fossilize; minds must be ever receptive; investigation must be all-sided and fearless; the truth must be sought regardless of its possible effect on ancient theories. Revelation, resting on authority, is necessarily inimical to the New. Priests, holding that truth is given by gods, not found by men, seek ever to bind man back to the Old. Give them the molding of the youthful mind, and you put into their hands the warrant of intellectual and moral death. The priest must not dictate the education of our children, in common schools or state universities. To the extent that he does, civilization stands still or retrogrades. Against the contemplated and accomplished treasuries of clergy-led politicians we have no defense other than secular education, given in press and school and on the platform. If we would not perish we must keep or make all these free.

"Truth Seeker" Work Bearing Fruit.

It has been customary in the Central Labor Union of this city for delegates and newly-elected officers to hold up the right hand when taking the obligation to perform their duties. It was only an orthodox habit, for the law of the state does not require it, nor do the constitution and by-laws of the Union. No delegate or officer could be compelled to thus recognize the religious beliefs of his fellow-members, but some of them were sure that they had a right to exact this observance. They know better now.

Mr. James McGill is the delegate of the Plasterers' Union to the Central Labor Union. He is a Freethinker and when presiding officer in his own union he has quietly ignored the hand-raising custom, to the great scandal of some labor reformers. With this record, it was not strange that, being elected to an office in the Central Labor Union, he should neglect to raise his hand when called up to take the obligation. This happened on Sunday, September 22d. At once there was a protest from the pious. Mr. McGill answered that the elevation of the hand was not essential. Delegate Fitzgerald said that it was, that "all the sanctity" of the obligation was in the lifting of the hand. "If that is so," retorted the Freethinker, "I certainly shall not raise my hand." He was told that there was not a state in which he could make an affirmation without raising the hand. But he refused to comply with the demand made, and so, while the other officers took the obligation, he was left out in the cold by a vote of 15 to 13, overruling the chairman, who had decided in his favor.

During the week Mr. McGill was equipped with the law of this state, which says nothing about the raising of the hand, and with the decision of Judge Barrett in the case of the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Judge Barrett said that the raising of the hand had no more to do with the affirmation than the cut of the clothes. At the meeting of the Union on Sunday, September 29th, Mr. McGill was ready for his opponents. He read the provisions of the fundamental law and the decision of Judge Barrett in the case cited. There was another hot debate, but in the end Chairman Farley ruled that as the motion adverse to Mr. McGill adopted at the previous meeting had not been submitted in writing, as the constitution of the Union requires, it was null and void and he therefore declared it rescinded. This probably ends the affair, as the religious element recognizes that there is no ground for longer contest. But as it appeared last week that the orthodox members of the Central Labor Union might try to take further action inimical to the rights of Mr. McGill and as it was very desirable that they should explicitly name the authority or authorities upon which they relied in support of the claim they had made, THE TRUTH SEEKER sent to the secretary the letter which follows:

NEW YORK, Oct. 4, 1895.

JOHN S. HENRY, Secretary Central Labor Union, Clarendon Hall, New York, Dear Sir: The newspaper reports having not fully informed us as to the reasons which have led your organization to refuse to permit Mr. James McGill of the Plasterers' Union to affirm without raising his hand, will you kindly answer the following questions at your earliest convenience?

1. Is the Central Labor Union incorporated under the laws of the state of New York?
2. Upon what provision of the State Constitution or of the statutes do you base your claim that the hand must be raised in making affirmations?
3. If, however, your action has been taken in conformity with the requirements of the constitution or by-laws of the Central Labor Union, please quote the paragraph or clause of said constitution or by-laws that makes obligatory the raising of the hand in making an affirmation.

By supplying this information you will confer a favor upon,

Yours respectfully,

E. M. MACDONALD,
Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

It is the duty of the secretary to submit to the Union all communications received, but at the meeting on Sunday, October 6th, nothing was said of the letter from THE TRUTH SEEKER and business was hurried to a conclusion. It is fairly inferable that Mr. McGill will not again be disturbed, and that this incident kills the hand-raising custom in the Central Labor Union. The thanks of all Freethinkers and other friends of separation of secular from religious concerns are due to James McGill for his fearless and timely smashing of a bad precedent. And we cannot help feeling that our contests with the election inspectors and clerk of the court have already borne very good and substantial fruit. Let Freethinkers everywhere assert themselves and defend their rights.

Two Ways of Looking at the Matter.

The subjoined cards tell their own stories:

"GANANOQUE, CAN., Sept. 2, 1895.

"THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.: Please discontinue my paper. Sometime in August THE TRUTH SEEKER was stopped by the P. M. General, since which time I have received only two or three copies. I owe you one dollar, which I will remit very soon. Fraternally yours,

"HENRY SMITH."

"ORIELLA, ONT., Oct. 5, 1895.

"THE TRUTH SEEKER: We intend to get up a club and have your paper sent by mail to Niagara, and from there by express. Yours, JOHN MCCLINCHY."

Were we a citizen of Canada, and were the postmaster general or any other official to have the impudence to tell us what not to read in the way of newspapers, we should not discontinue the subscription. On the contrary, we should look around to see how we could circumvent him. We would be willing to spend several times the amount of a regular subscription to defy him, and should call his attention each week to the fact that we had the paper he condemned, and intended to have it, and read it, and circulate it to the fullest extent of our ability. When officials—the accidents of politics—take themselves so seriously as to set up a censorship of a citizen's reading matter, it is time for that citizen to get up on his feet and object with all the lung power wherewith he is endowed.

Mr. McClinchy's way of doing it we like better. It is more American, and will produce a great deal better results in the future. Official upstarts who interfere with the liberties of the people must be snubbed and defied and taught to keep their places as servants of the people, without trying to become their masters. They ought to be removed from office. Turn the rascals out.

Shameful Editorial Stultification.

The New York World has for months been making a strong fight against the Sabbath laws. It has devoted pages of editorial space to the elucidation and defense of the fundamental principles of Liberty, Equality, and Justice. But just now a political campaign is on and, as usual, everything is to be sacrificed to "harmony." It is supposed to be necessary to unite various "reform" elements against Tammany. The State Democracy and the Republicans have agreed on a lot of resolutions, among them these:

"Every citizen is entitled by the fact of his citizenship to enjoy the largest measure of personal freedom consistent with the welfare of the community and not in conflict with the moral and religious convictions of his fellow-citizens.

"While we believe that the sanctity of Sunday should be maintained in the interests of religion, of public morals, and of health through rest from all unnecessary labor on that day, we also believe due regard should be had to the sentiments and customs of that large portion of the community who desire on that day to enjoy some orderly and harmless recreation."

The World says that "these resolutions are in line with the popular demand for Liberty, Equality, and Justice which the World has voiced ever since the headlong Rooseveltian crusade began." They may be in line with what the World meant, but they are not in line with what the World said. The moral and religious convictions of certain citizens have nothing to do with the question of equal rights. If it is admitted that they have, religious liberty is only a dream. The genius of our institutions is that the majority must not force the minority to profess or act upon the religious convictions of such majority. The "sanctity of Sunday" should not "be maintained in the interest of religion," and the World knows it perfectly well. It has simply got down into the mire of politics and is eating filth for the sake of votes. Will the United States ever see such a thing as an honest, fearless, and consistently independent newspaper? Even the World is unable to resist the seductions of the harlot of politics.

The Overburdened Politician.

The politician is the most severely burdened of mortals. He must bear water on both shoulders, balance on his head a tub for the popular whale, and carry a pail in each hand. Here is Chairman Hinckley, of the Democratic Central Committee of New York:

"I believe in all laws which are in the interest of labor and morality, but whether the Excise law of this state, as it is now being enforced in New York on Sundays, is in the interest of labor and morality is quite another matter. I believe in a proper observance of the Sabbath. I was brought up to respect the Sabbath. If I had my way I would not have anything occur on Sunday which could reasonably be looked upon as an offense to church-goers. At the same time I detest anything like Puritanical laws, or any laws which interfere with the proper enjoyment of the day by people whose habits and customs are radically different from mine."

He either did not understand or had not the courage to say that "labor and morality" are mere catch-words of the Sabbatarians; that neither the laborer nor ethical development can be helped by laws enacted in the interest of a particular religious belief; that all special laws for Sunday have their source in a desire to favor religious people at the expense of their fellow citizens, and are partial, unjust, unnecessary, and demoralizing. What difference does it make to others what he believes about the "observance of the Sabbath," if he does not try to force his inherited notions on his neighbors? It is not at all a question of "observance." That is wholly a private matter. That it is introduced in political discussions and platforms is one of the most ominous signs of the times. Who cares whether or not Mr. Hinckley was "brought up to respect the Sabbath"? That is no more fit for political discussion than what he was "brought up" to think about the Trinity or grace at meals or evening prayers? It would be just as proper to legislate regarding any of these as concerning "Sabbath observance." Let it be distinctly understood that the performance of religious obligations, of which the observance of holy days is clearly a part, is a matter for the individual conscience, not for majority votes to determine at the polls or in the chambers of legislation. Mr. Hinckley should have no difficulty in understanding that he cannot consistently detest Puritanical laws and at the same time decree that nothing shall be done on Sunday that is "an offense to church-goers." There is not the slightest room for doubt that "the proper enjoyment of the day by people whose habits and customs are radically different from theirs" is "an offense to church-goers." This is the cause of the whole trouble; this is the origin of the Puritanical laws which Mr. Hinckley says that he detests. It is an "offense" to the Sabbatarian for the cars to run on Sunday a thousand miles from his home; it is an "offense" to the Sunday worshiper in Maine for a man to be shaved on the first day of the week in Alaska. The reasonableness of the inhibited labor or amusement has nothing to do with the present issue, for "what could reasonably be looked upon as an offense to church-goers" is not considered by the makers of Sunday statutes; if it were, they would cease to be the makers of Sunday statutes. They are influenced simply by what the church-goer thinks about any given act, regardless of its intrinsic reasonableness or unreasonableness.

At the recent diocesan convention of the Protestant Episcopal church of New York the Australian ballot system was used in the election of the members of the Standing Committee. Inasmuch as the Australian system was designed for the double purpose of preventing the bribing of venal electors and the protection of wage-workers who might otherwise fear to vote against their employers' supposed interests, the use, in a religious convention, of this bar to fraud and intimidation cannot fail to attract the attention of the observant.

"Man is of few days and full of trouble," but he would have far less trouble and live longer if he had more sense. He doesn't know much on the average, and so he keeps on in the old ruts of superstition and intolerance, tormenting himself with a false conception of duty and his neighbors with his insane attempts to make them think and act as they do not want to think and act. This from the World of October 1st tells a characteristic story of human idiocy and knavery, mingled in fairly equal proportions:

"Among the criminals who stood before Magistrate Crane in the Jefferson Market court yesterday was Reuben Becker, who keeps a hosiery store at No. 122 Seventh avenue. He pleaded guilty. Policeman Reilly, who was on the lookout for law-breakers, found Reuben's store open on Sunday and asked Reuben if he had a pair of stockings for lady's wear. A member of his family, he said, had hung her best Sunday stockings on the clothes-line, where they attracted the attention of a hungry goat. The goat had eaten them and the now stockingless lady could not go to church. Reuben sympathized with the unhappy lady and brought out a presentable pair of stockings, price 10 cents. Reilly bought them and arrested Reuben. 'I thought I would be helping the cause of religion,' Reuben pleaded in court. 'I don't like to hold you, my good man,' said the magistrate, but it's the law and I must. Fifty dollars' bail for trial in general sessions."

Here we have a senseless law that induces the policeman to lie like a land agent in order to get a tradesman into trouble for such an innocent act as selling a pair of hose, and the tradesman to lie in court in the hope that a pretense of interest in religion will lessen his punishment. Here we have a law which enables an officer to seduce a dealer into violation of it by an appeal to his sympathies and his gallantry. Here we have a magistrate who thinks that it is his duty to help the policeman persecute an inoffensive citizen; and, finally, here we have a sentiment in the minds of the people that permits the continuance of this farce, this burlesque of justice, this travesty of common sense, this fools' dance on nothing.

Canadian Papers on the Canadian P. M. G.

A Confession of Weakness.

From the Hamilton, Ont., Herald of September 30th.

A Freethought journal published in New York, called THE TRUTH SEEKER, has been barred out of the Canadian mails by order of Sir A. P. Caron, the postmaster general. THE TRUTH SEEKER is not the sort of paper to attain a very extensive circulation in a country like Canada, where the masses of people are as orthodox in their uttered ideas as can be, but it seems a bit idiotic to attempt to suppress it when publication of such a journal as Secular Thought is permitted in Toronto, and when works on Atheism and Agnosticism and kindred subjects can be procured in every bookstore in the land. The effort to suppress publications of this nature always looks like a confession of weakness.

No "Index Expurgatorius" Needed.

From the Hamilton Evening Times.

It is reported that the Customs Department have seized certain books of a controversial character, alleging that they are immoral, and that the pious and highly moral postmaster-general has forbidden the use of the mails to certain journals on the same ground. We know nothing about the papers in question, but the books are to be found in many of our best libraries. Moreover, we object to the making of any man the arbitrary censor of literature in Canada. We need no "index expurgatorius" here; our politicians have enough to do without attempting to impose on us a cabinet standard of orthodoxy. And when the Canadian people can be saved only by the good offices of a moral censor we don't think either Caron or Foster will be in demand.

Editor Dana Revolts.

From the New York Sun.

Mr. E. M. Macdonald, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, "a journal of Freethought and Reform," invites us to express our opinion on the act of Postmaster-General Caron of Canada in ordering the exclusion of his paper from the mails of the Dominion, on the ground that it is a scurrilous and blasphemous publication.

We understand that, under the laws of Canada, M. Caron possesses the power of determining the question absolutely. If he holds a publication to be blasphemous, that settles it, and the mails are closed to that publication. The only remedy is a change in the government, or a change in the law.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is undoubtedly an honest and candid paper, but it is not adapted to suit a pious Catholic like M. Caron, or a pious Protestant either. It is what is ordinarily described as an Infidel publication. Christianity and the Bible it rejects, criticizes, and assails, not we believe with scurrility and blackguardism, though its picture illustrations sometimes go pretty far in that direction, and its arguments are often calculated to shock and startle reverential and simple Christian spirits. Its discussions are otherwise like those of Thomas Paine in the days of Washington, or of Abner Kneeland in Boston forty years ago.

We hold to liberty, and we revolt at the arbitrary act of the Canadian postmaster-general. But if the Canadian people support him, what remedy is there short of a long agitation, with a doubtful conclusion?

A similar arbitrary act was performed by the postmaster-general of the United States when he ordered the exclusion of lottery advertisements from the mails. An act of Congress, subsequently enacted, justified the order, though it was held by eminent lawyers to be clearly unconstitutional. But no attempt has been made to repeal the act or to procure the reversal of the order, because the public sentiment is now very strongly against lotteries. In the same way the majority of the Canadian people are likely to support M. Caron in his crusade against Infidel periodicals, because they are or pretend to be Christians, and are willing to silence all criticism by any means the law may put into their hands. Yet if any political passion should become mixed with the controversy, they may adopt a different policy in a hurry, and engage with zeal in promoting and establishing the very liberty which they now condemn and suppress.

Call for the Annual Congress.

TO BE HELD IN HARDMAN HALL, NINETEENTH ST. AND FIFTH AVE., NEW YORK, OCTOBER 25, 26, 27.

To the Liberals of America, Members of the Free-thought Federation and Secular Union, and all Societies organized for the Purpose of maintaining a purely Secular Government.

It is of great importance that Freethinkers should combine. It is of more importance now than at any previous period, for there is more work to do and the work cannot be done by isolated effort. There are vast ecclesiastical combinations organized for the express purpose of overthrowing Freethought, and also of uniting church and state in a more dangerous form than ever before. These questions immediately confront us:

The Taxation of Church Property,
The Bible in the Public Schools,
The Sabbath Laws, and
The Liberty of the Press.

Property to the value of a billion of dollars is exempt from taxation in the American Republic, in many places religious exercises in the public schools are on the increase, and the very foundation of universal education is being destroyed. The conflict in regard to Sabbath laws is now waged both in the states and in the national Congress, and a centralized political power is being established for the purpose of aggrandizing the authority of the church in civil matters; and honest Freethinkers are imprisoned to-day for discussing questions of the utmost importance to human improvement. Against these flagrant and ever accumulating acts of injustice we must unitedly contend. Freethinkers throughout the Union, in every state, county, city, and village, should be in active communication, and ready to meet at any point the encroachments of the church. It is often the case that a Freethinker is alone in his community in the open support of Liberal thought and principles, and for this reason suffers persecutions. Religious bigots assume that they can trample upon the Freethinker's rights with impunity on account of their own vast majority.

When it is well understood that the Freethinkers of this country are joined together and will defend one another at all hazards, the rights of Freethought will be respected and the individual Freethinker will have the power of numbers to support his cause. The theologian is naturally a coward. He persecutes only the minority. He does not trust in God unless God has a big majority. When the theologian realizes that the Freethinker is not a solitary unit, but the representative of a great force, he will not only cease his persecutions, but even welcome him to social equality. A theologian is very considerate towards a powerful party, however much he despises the humble citizen.

There is a great contest before us. We must be an organized party or submit to defeat and ostracism. We cannot fold our hands and do nothing. We must become an intellectual, social, moral, and political power through a generous and permanent comradeship. We can do this only by public meetings, congresses, associations, and a Freethought press. We must use the same instrumentalities that are constantly used by the churches. They have their great gatherings, their synods, their councils, their conventions, and in this way the churches create an immense enthusiasm and exercise a more potent sway. These are human, practical, and far-reaching means, and Freethought must avail itself of such necessary aids.

All, therefore, are urged to come together at the National Congress of the American Secular Union and the Freethought Federation of America, to be held in New York, October 25th, 26th, and 27th, 1895.

It is hoped that there will be a large attendance, and that measures of co-operation, greater advance and usefulness will be adopted and cordially carried out by friends of freedom throughout the country.

The members of the American Secular Union are notified that such amendments to the Constitution will be proposed at the coming Congress as will enable the Union to consolidate with the Freethought Federation of America.

The members of the Freethought Federation are also notified that changes of the same nature will be proposed for its Constitution in order that it may unite as an organized body with the American Secular Union.

It is the general desire that there be one grand national organization adapted to all the needs of the present and future work. Without doubt this will be determined in a wise, conciliatory, and progressive spirit. Let us close our ranks and meet the common enemy, the bigots of the Christian church. We work for the future; we work for humanity; we work for the best interests of civilization, for the liberty and the progress of all. Let us stand bravely by our colors and unite in the common cause. There are vast and profound principles which should harmonize superficial differences. We have no creed to support, but always and everywhere the rights of man. This is the mighty battleground. Let us rally now as never before, with earnest convictions, courage, and enthusiasm. We cannot evade the issue, neither can the church itself. It is liberty or it is slavery. This is the conflict of the ages, and in the American Republic all that is most precious and ennobling is at stake.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, President.

Katie Kehm Smith.

It is with deep sorrow that THE TRUTH SEEKER announces that Katie Kehm Smith is dead. The letter given below tells the sad story, which must shock and grieve every Freethinker who has known or known of this bright, fearless woman and her work. We lament the loss of the Duttons and Gove and Tompkins and Colwick, all with the snows of age upon their brows, and Cook at seventy-six, and Hacker at ninety-four, but they had been with us many years and we could not expect to keep them much longer. It is a different thing to say farewell to Katie Kehm Smith, laying down her burden at twenty-seven. We cannot help feeling that she had not lived out a third of the days that should have been hers. There was so much to do and she was doing it so well. She had taken up a neglected department of the Freethought propaganda and had already shown us that it was possible to educate our own children in Secular Sunday-schools, to so conduct those schools as to make them at once attractive to old and young, and well-springs of genuine knowledge. We can best honor her memory by walking in the path which she has opened for our feet, and by making it a broad highway to a future of learning, liberty, justice, and love here on this our mother earth. Here is the letter from the bereaved companion:

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Friend: My wife, Katie Kehm Smith, died at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Chas. G. Caspary in John Day, Grant Co., Or., September 18th, 9:30 P.M., and was buried at Wagner, Grant Co., Or., on the 21st at 3 P.M. She sleeps in a quiet, beautiful valley, mostly settled by Secularists—her loving and loyal friends. She did not seem to suffer, or to suspect that she would die. She was taken down with fever—her doctor said typhoid—about August 8th, and canceled some lecture engagements to rest a few days, but it was more serious than anyone supposed. She never finished her Eastern Oregon campaign. She died in the field, at the front, five hundred miles from home, in the interior of the state. I reached her August 18th, and was with her constantly. Mr. and Mrs. Caspary did all they could—they were untiring. This is the first chance I have had to write to you. Mr. Carl Wagner delivered the funeral address. Very respectfully, D. W. SMITH.

From "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" we quote the following biographical sketch:

"Probably the youngest prominent lecturer in the Freethought ranks is Katie Kehm Smith, of Oregon. She was born at Warsaw, Ill., and received her education in the public schools. In 1885, at the age of seventeen, she graduated from the Ottumwa, Iowa, high school and immediately began life as a teacher, which pursuit she followed in Iowa and Oregon for over six years. At sixteen she became a convert to Freethought and ever since has been an outspoken and aggressive worker in the cause. She is a student, an observer, and a thinker. As a teacher, she saw and met the common people in their every-day lives. She saw them willingly bear the burden of an expensive church and clergy; she saw them work hard and innocently divide the fruits of their toil with these, sacrificing comfort and happiness in this world for the sake of their 'souls' in the next. She therefore early resolved to do what she could to take people's eyes off their 'souls' and turn their attention to their bodies. She delivered her first lecture at the age of seventeen, and although a teacher, and often opposed and ostracized by Bible bigots, she never neglected an opportunity to expose the myths and evil effects of Christianity. She is impatient to have the people see the wrongs they endure and break the fetters which bind them. She also realizes that as these wrongs are the slow results of centuries of priestly rule, it will necessarily take persistent and systematic effort for a long time, to right them.

"In 1891 she married Hon. D. W. Smith, of Port Townsend, Wash., but did not sacrifice her identity nor lose her interest in Freethought. Her husband encourages and seconds all her efforts. Since 1891 Mr. and Mrs. Smith have urged the plan of organizing Secular churches and Sunday-schools and placing each, or a circuit of them, in charge of a competent person duly appointed by the state organization, whose business it shall be to lecture regularly, at a regular time and place; that the lack of regular lectures, by regular lecturers, is why Freethought societies heretofore organized have not flourished. To prove the practicability of this plan, Mrs. Smith organized, Jan. 29, 1893, the First Secular Church of Portland, and soon after the Portland Secular Sunday-school, and has lectured for this church ever since [and to 1895]. Her audience has steadily increased, until at the end of a year it numbers between three and four hundred, and is as large as any orthodox church in the city."

Until lately Mrs. Smith wrote the lessons for the Secular Sunday-schools of the state and was also secretary of the Oregon State Secular Union. Here she did most efficient work. In manner and speech she was gentle, with the charms of the orator and the reasoning of the logician. Our regular readers are familiar, through her frequent and interesting reports from the front, with her recent campaigns in the Far Northwest.

For ourselves and THE TRUTH SEEKER constituency we offer to her bereaved companion and all her relatives and personal associates sincere sympathy in this hour of gloom. They have the satisfaction of knowing that she was one of those whose lives have made for truth and peace and equity. Nothing better can be said of any of the dead, she has helped make it possible for it to be truly said of an increasing proportion of those who shall hereafter return to their constituent elements. For her grave, roses and carnations and lilies-of-the-valley, but not yew nor cypress. For her memory, sweet remembrances. For us who remain for a little time, unceasing battle for the cause under whose flag she died in the van of the conflict.

In his lecture last Sunday night Mr. Symes showed the essential identity of Christianity and serpent-worship. Details cannot be given here. He took for his text John iii, 14, "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the son of man be lifted up," etc. The connection of this with the cock-and-bull story in Numbers xxi was shown; and by reference to Hezekiah's "Reform" (2 Kings xviii, 4), he showed that the worship of Nebushtan, the brass serpent, had been a permanent practice in Israel from time immemorial; and that the tale in Numbers was invented to account for this worship and to excuse it, after the worship itself had been condemned.

In the early church and for several centuries there existed a sect called Ophites, Serpentians, Naassenians, or Nahassenians, who, like many others, worshiped the serpent. They held that the God who made the world and planted Eden was the bad God, who gave a bad command to Adam and Eve; that the serpent who led them to eat the forbidden fruit was Christ, a good God; that the so-called fall of the couple was really a rise, an introduction to saving knowledge; and that this Christ or serpent had come to destroy the deeds of the bad God of the Old Testament. The name Nahassenians is almost literally Nehushtanians, or worshipers of Nehushtan, especially if we read that name, as we well may do, Nahashtan. As the Ophites are said to be older than Christianity, the probability is that they were a survival, more or less direct, of those whose God Hezekiah destroyed in the vain hope of crushing out the worship offered to it.

It is all very well to call those serpent-worshipers heretics; but the word heretic flung at your rival is mere abuse, and signifies that you have no argument or reason by which to convince him. Gieseler's Ecclesiastical History, vol. I., p. 143, says the orthodox Christians used the serpent as a symbol, and that symbol was a serpent on a cross. The word symbol may be understood how you please. The present crucifix is but a successor of the older crucifix which consisted of a crucified or crossified serpent. Remember, Crossified and Crucified are but different modes of spelling the same word. And the fact stated by Gieseler shows that there was a wide-spread Christian belief that Jesus and the serpent were one (in some sense of the word one). In fact, serpent-worship was once as orthodox as any worship in the church. These are interesting facts, which will not be acceptable to the Christians.—Melbourne Liberator.

News and Notes.

Friday afternoon, Sept. 6th, I take a farewell smoke with Saladin, who sends his good wishes to the Free-thinkers of America, and presents me with his brilliant book "Janet Smith," which I read on my homeward voyage. Friday evening, with Mr. and Mrs. Foote and Mr. and Mrs. Sumner, I visit for the last time, this journey, the home circle of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Watts. Here is the hearthstone where I received the first welcome, and here is the adieu. The evening was a happy termination to my eventful pilgrimage; a conclusion that looked forth to many golden to-morrows. Friendships are formed, broadened, strengthened, and enriched by thought, by hope, and by sympathy. It is good-bye, and all hail the hereafter.

When I awoke Saturday morning the biggest thunder storm of the season was roaring over London. I did not like the outlook. It was too melancholy to quit London and England amidst such a shower of tears. It cleared off a bit after breakfast, and when my friend Wilson's equipages swept up to the door of the hotel to take me bag and baggage to the Waterloo station, there was a lull in the fury of the elements. With the unpleasant weather I hardly expected to see any friendly faces; but Watts was there, George Ward, Mr. Guest, and others, and there was no lonely departure for the Pilgrim. Watts was the first to greet and the last to say good-bye in Merrie England. As the train rolled out of the station, long as I could see the company I waved adieus. When we reach the open country the sunshine fills the landscape and my final glimps of England is one of beauty and delight. In a couple of hours the crowded express arrives at Southampton, and the great steamer Paris awaits the one thousand passengers she is to proudly bear over the heaving deep. I find this world is not so very big after all. I am continually meeting friends. Travelers met at one point I strike at another. Passengers are on board the Paris that were with me on the Berlin; and on the deck of the boat I was met by Clarence S. Darrow of Chicago. It was simply a chance meeting. He came from Paris and I from London. With Darrow was John P. Hopkins, formerly mayor of Chicago. I like Hopkins. He is a bright, genial traveler, and thoroughly democratic in manners. He is full of ideas and keeps his eyes open. He does not think Chicago is the whole world, but recognizes the merits of foreign people. Although a member of the Catholic church, he is very liberal in his ideas of religion and history, as many nominal Catholics are. I think Hopkins has the courage of his convictions. He is Jeffersonian in his political doctrines, and he thus represents an element in American politics which I hope will be victorious. Chicago Liberals all know Darrow, who is at the front of the "coming men" of this age, an orator, a philosopher, a reformer, and a lawyer—but honest and fearless in the last capacity as Abraham Lincoln himself, whom he resembles in spirit and level-headed power. Darrow is a man of the people and stands for the people every time. He has the soul of the poet, and is devoted to the glorious golden visions of William Morris, the noblest bard of England to-day. I have not met anyone who is more widely read than Darrow in literature, or who is better equipped for the stirring issues of the present time, or who has a broader perception of the future. I was glad to meet him, for it brightened my voyage with home-like associations.

Chauncey Depew is also on board. He has a kindly-beaming Presbyterian face, as if he were thoroughly satisfied with the universe; with God, devil, heaven, hell, etc., all being foreordained to his especial comfort. He is one of the saints. I don't expect to scrape acquaintance with him, for he is in the altitudes of orthodoxy, while I am a born rebel. Still I rather like him. It's my opinion that his religion is but skin deep and at heart he's a good fellow. At any rate, he doesn't put on any airs.

There are over one thousand passengers besides the crew, which numbers three hundred and eighty. So we have a little city on the deep of about 1,400, composed of all sorts and conditions of people, lawyers, doctors, clergymen, editors, governors, mayors, senators, actors, merchants, stock brokers, bankers, etc. As to the ladies, I suppose they are all angels without any particular occupation. At least they grace the ship with beauty and fashion.

The weather the first day out and the following Sunday was simply lovely and I anticipated a delightful voyage. A change, however, came o'er the spirit of the deep and the waves began to roll mountain high. As Chauncey Depew remarked, it was the plains of Normandy coming over, but the hills of Switzerland going back. It was disastrous to most of the company on board. On Monday morning, as Chauncey again picturesquely described it, it was like the battle of Waterloo. Almost everybody was slain. The saloons were deserted and also the decks. For a time indeed we were locked in and not permitted to go "out doors" at all. It was dangerous, for one man, a clergyman forsooth, already had his leg broken. Several were on deck just before breakfast, when a huge wave swept along, tossing furiously over the ladies' cabin, and piled about forty chairs and a dozen passengers in a promiscuous heap. It was dire confusion for a minute or so, and when the remorseless billow retreated, among the debris of chairs was this man with a broken leg; another with a cracked crown, etc. After that the gates were barred on all the passengers. I have concluded that I am a "good sailor." I did not have a single qualm or lose a single meal. I found it pretty difficult, however, to travel from one end of the ship to the other; one had to hang on to railings and chairs and tables, and the way the deck went up and down gave a buoyancy to the step, at times, more than desirable. The "inner man" in my case, however, retained his equanimity. I understand this was a test occasion, and that if anybody survived without a tribute to old ocean he was fit to grapple with any storm. It was even reported that the captain himself was on the verge, but this was officially denied, it being asserted that the captain was sea-sick only once, and that forty-seven years ago. I guess, however, from the story Chauncey Depew relates, that there was some pretty awful sea-sickness about. As this story is also confirmed by Bishop Potter it must be true. A lady was lolling on deck fearfully demoralized and looking up to heaven with a most pitiable expression. The head of a man equally suffering was laid upon her lap. A sympathizing passenger remarked to the lady, "You are quite sick?" "Yes, I am," she gulped. "How is your husband?" "I don't know how my husband is; I haven't seen him the whole day." The somewhat amazed passenger queried, "Isn't he your husband?" pointing to the head in her lap. "Oh, no," she groaned. "I don't know who he is; I never saw him in my life before." Thus does sea-sickness level all distinctions. It is more democratic even than death.

Only two or three met me at the table. The saloon presented a forlorn appearance. After awhile the doors were opened and we could go on deck. It was a glorious view to those well enough to enjoy its vast and tumbling magnitude. Mightily the billows rolled along and broke in tremendous and far glittering spray. I saw the mountain waves, with great shining, sweeping valleys between, ever changing, ever rushing, crest piled on crest and depth succeeding depth, with enormous swirls and eddies; black walls, manes like ten thousand horses leaping, vast gulfs into which the ship plunges, down, down, and then upward, like a magnificent bird, springs across the seething spaces. At times the sun appears and the horizon extends with molten brilliance, as if sea and sky were melting in a furnace heat. The black clouds would again cover the sky, the rain descend, the winds whistle, the masts creak, and the mighty surge bound furiously upon the struggling ship. Anon the rainbow spans the curtained sky with vivid colors. It hangs over the sea with perfect brilliancy. The waters pour in many-hued streams athwart its misty foundations, while beneath its central glory the broad bright ocean sparkles like a bossed and silver shield, as if the sea-god in all his pomp attended the fleeting vessel. From the rainbow we glance to the opening West with its promise of to-morrow. The mists gather and float away in vanishing lusters. The pathway of the sun becomes one blaze of gold. Like giants the billows leap against the accumulating splendors, and then fall back, themselves covered with the overflowing brightness. How beautiful the night approaches, its deep dark-blue flecked with clouds, the straggling battalions of the disappearing storm. What thoughts rush upon the mind, thoughts exultant, glorious, incommunicable, thoughts of man and his resistless spirit who reads the stars a thousand million leagues away, and plows the unfathomed sea and defies its mightiest tempest. The phosphorescence bubbles in the silver pathway of the ship, and far in the gloom we catch the vanishing diamond drops. One might imagine that beneath this luminous veil were the halls of mermaids and fairies who watch with jealous eyes the sweep of the majestic palace above, the invader and the scorner of their beauteous domains.

While the storm glowers the steamship Teutonic, from New York to Liverpool, lifts itself from the tempestuous horizon and moves majestically along, a mile or two from our own ship. It presents a striking appearance in the midst of the billowing sea. The mighty waves have no effect upon its calm and stately motion. They roll obediently from her offy prow, and let her pass like a queen of the watery domain. I suppose our vessel presents the same appearance to those who gaze upon it from that palatial steamer. Nothing is more stirring than the sight of a great ship at sea, especially amidst the grandeur of a storm. To the glory of the sea is added the glory of man himself; his art resplendent on the liquid plain, imperious along the surge of nature's mightiest force.

When the storm is over the reanimated passengers again throng the decks, and happiness prevails. On Thursday evening there is an entertainment in the saloon, for the benefit of the Sailors' Homes at Southampton and at New York. These entertainments are a graceful affair. They are a kind of festival for the passengers, and the spirit of humanity illuminates them. Some members of Daly's company are with us, professional singers, etc., and the display of talent is varied and attractive and hearty applause greets everyone who contributes to the pleasure of the occasion. Darrow reads a poem which has quite a sparkle of radical thought, and is appreciated even by that fashionable audience. Chauncey Depew is quite an ideal chairman for such an occasion, and his after-dinner speeches come in fine play. His stories are well told, and he can garnish a chestnut with delightful variations so that it has an air of novelty. It seems that Chauncey Depew goes to the theater in spite of his evangelical associations. He confesses that when he is all tired out and feels blue, and wants to be recuperated, he goes to the theater and refreshes himself with its comedy. He doesn't go to a prayer-meeting or listen to a sermon. He endures the latter from a sense of duty, but the former he enjoys and is benefited thereby for the battle of life. Chauncey is something of a pagan after all. He averred that "all the world's a stage, and all the men and women merely players," and that the most honest player of all is the actor himself, who makes no pretense about it. Chauncey says he has crossed the ocean thirty times. No wonder he is a kind of "old sea-dog," and he isn't sick at all the whole voyage. Out of his fund of observation and varied experience he gives us a bright and humorous harangue, and the evening's amusement is a most successful affair financially and otherwise.

We are twenty-four hours late. Something happened—a pump broke, I believe—and only one engine was in use for a day or two. Then there was an alarm of fire one morning, but it ended in smoke; the origin of this, I understand, was "fat in the fire," but you really don't know the truth of these things, for the officers will never tell. They keep mum or tell a "white lie," which of course is wise. It wouldn't do for the passengers, as a general thing, to realize that there was any danger. For a moment a tremor of horror went through the ship, as the smoke rolled into the cabins, but whatever the peril, it was fortunately averted.

Alas! the Etruria, which left England three hours after our ship, passed us by. It was remembered, however, for our consolation, that the Paris had several times passed the Etruria, only we were not on board at the time. How many fine things do happen when we are not there!

All things come to an end, and so did the ocean voyage, with its various incidents and accidents. Saturday dawned bright and beautiful, a dazzling day indeed. The sea was smooth, and flashed blue and green; it was like an immense floor beneath the cloudless dome of the sky. The ship is in good trim. Its great heart beats rejoicingly. It sweeps the broad plain with buoyant motion. Its banners make music with the waves below. Two thousand eyes are looking for land. Old ocean's reign is almost over, and star-crowned Columbia will now rule the hours. About four o'clock in the afternoon the dim edge of land appears. We know not if it is a cloud or a mirage, so faint and wavering are the outlines. These grow steadier. The fringes along the horizon increase with varying aspect—trees, towers, huge animals, a man on horseback, with other grotesque shapes—until at last we know it is land, solid land, and a great shout arises from all the ship. A thousand hearts beat happily. The lights begin to appear as night darkens, glimmering fitfully, one by one at first, then a constellation of them; then great spaces of radiance appear, and finally the whole horizon is decorated with a million torches, and the sea reflects the effulgence. New York lifts its flaming tiara, with Long Island on one side and Jersey shore and Staten Island on the other. At half-past ten Saturday night we anchor at quarantine. We remain on board until morning, and are up before sunrise. We see the red ball of fire ascend. It is a glorious prospect, the flaming rays on river and shore; on the houses, ships, and forts; on the great bridge, on the statue of Liberty. We wait patiently for the custom-house officers to climb aboard, and then the ship moves on to the dock. We crowd the deck. The great city seems to welcome us with its shining columns. Its roofs and windows appear besprinkled with innumerable jewels. The glad waters sing about our path. The broad river opens its silvery portals. The pier is thronged with hundreds of waiting friends. Handkerchiefs wave and voices of welcome tremble on the air. Soon the giant vessel is at rest, and we rush ashore. Home again. Much have we seen and learned of the wonderful Old World. It has wisdom, art, magnificence, the treasures of centuries. But America is the land of promise, the land of the future. We turn to it with more devotion than ever. More beautiful floats its starry flag.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Observations.

As a colored delegate took occasion to remark, the coons had the dogs up a tree in the South Carolina Constitutional Convention. A white delegate introduced a resolution providing that marriages between Caucasians and persons having Negro blood in their veins should be declared off. The colored delegate offered an amendment to the effect that white men guilty of illicit communication with Negro women should be disqualified for holding office, and that the children resulting from such offenses should inherit the property of the father. He set forth that the degradation and deterioration of his race by intermixture with whites were marked and deplorable, and that none but the lower classes of his people would consort with whites anyway. He also called for a single standard of morals for both races. Said he: "If a Negro improperly approaches a white woman, he is lynched, while if all the white men who have taken advantage of our girls were even disqualified for public positions, this convention would have to adjourn for want of a quorum." The dogs up the tree barked vociferously, but they did not come down, and miscegenation received its death-blow by the adoption of the white man's resolution, minus the amendment. The effect on the increase of the saddle-colored population will be watched with interest.

The Chinese Vegetarians and theologians who slaughtered the Christian missionaries have explained their conduct. The missionaries offended their sense of propriety by eating meat, which involves the taking of animal life, and such being contrary to the principles of all good vegetarians, they slew the offenders. Remembering that the Mongolians have condescended to place the occidental on a level with the hog, which animal cannot be denied the possession of animal life, the Vegetarians would appear to have laid themselves liable to a charge of inconsistency in killing them off. Still, their course might bear favorable comparison with the practice of those other religionists who profess to love God, and prove it by disdaining his works and by denying any inherent virtue to the only image of him they have in the world.

If you don't see what you want, look for it under the head of "Socialism" on the European continent. The program of the Socialist Congress at Breslau contains the proposition that, religion being inimical to progress, the party will discourage all systems of faith. Again, it is proposed to abolish all laws that place unmarried mothers and their offspring in an invidious position, and all women are to be elevated to an exact political equality with male citizens. These planks alone might make a basis of union better on the whole than that formulated at Prohibition Park by the gullible innocents, but the program is said to fill six newspaper columns, and there is no guessing what wild schemes it embodies. Unlike the Socialism of Europe, the collectivism of our own country is approaching under religious auspices, and the vehicle it travels on will be used later as the hearse of free opinion. But so long as state affairs are controlled by the whims of majorities, and so long as church supporters are in the majority, Socialism will loom up as the coming slavery in Europe as well as in America; and the Freethinker who advocates it anywhere is twisting a rope for his own neck. A Socialistic postal system has created a Caron in Canada and a Comstock in the United States.

If the Puget Sound ministers are right, God is no match for the subtle and scientific agriculturists of the state of Washington. The ministers hold that the hop louse which has destroyed so much of the crop in the White River valley is a special messenger from the Almighty, sent to discourage the beer-brewing industry. I copy from the Seattle Post-Intelligencer the following reply to the ministers by Mr. Ezra Meeker, of Puyallup, the leading hop-grower of the Sound country:

"In this morning's report of the Methodist conference," says Mr. Meeker, "I notice under the heading 'A Curse on the Hop Crop' that Preacher Hanson, of Puyallup, reported he 'had some good news from the great crop country—the hop crop, the main support of the people, was a failure; the crop had been cursed by God.' Whereupon Bishop Bowman said, 'Good,' and from all over the room voices could be heard giving utterance to the fervent ejaculation, 'thank God.' For the edification of the reverend fathers and fervent brethren I wish to publish to them and to the world that I have beat God, for I have 500 acres of hops at Puyallup and Kent that are free from lice, the 'curse of God,' and that I believe it was the work of an emulsion of whale oil soap and quassia sprayed on the vines that thwarted God's purpose to 'curse' me and others who exterminated the lice."

Mr. Meeker's letter has a stinger in the tail of it that may make the Rev. Mr. Hanson squirm. He says: "I want to recall to the memory of the Rev. Mr. Hanson, that the church in which he has been preaching for a year past was built in great part by money contributed from gains of this business 'cursed by God.' For myself I can inform him that as a citizen of Puyallup I contributed $400 to buy the ground upon which that church edifice is built, every cent of which came from this same hop business 'cursed by God.' I would 'thank God' if they would return the money and thus ease their guilty consciences."

I am afraid Ezra will never see his money again, and it will serve him right if he does not. The religious parasites of the Northwest are worse than hoplice or potato-bugs, and he should have been aware of that fact before he joined in their cultivation. For his information I would say that the moral whale oil soap and quassia necessary to neutralize their devastations is obtainable from the Truth Seeker Company. Families sprayed fifty-two times per annum for $3.

It is a well-known fact that not all of the articles appearing in a paper as editorials are written by the person whose name is at the head of the editorial column. Sometimes an editor hires a hand to express his thought while he discusses the outlook with a rural visitor or turns off mimeographic epistles to delinquents. This being the case, I prepared the following open letter and offered it to the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER as a leader. To my surprise, it was declined, under a pretext which, I hardly need say, was in my opinion fallacious. The letter contains suggestions that certainly should be made, and I present it here with this explanation, but with no apologies:

To MR. RICHARD B. OLNEY, Secretary of State, Washington, D. C., Respected Sir: If you are a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, as we hope you are, although your name does not appear on our list of paid up subscribers, you must be aware of the efforts at present made in the United States and Canada to turn us down. In this country some of the clerical gentlemen who occupy editorial chairs have called upon the authorities to suppress us, and the next wind that sweeps from the pulpits may bring to our ears an appeal to the secular arm. But it is not of these that we would particularly speak. With a fair field and no favors, we have the conceit to think that we can hold these gentlemen level; while as regards contests about controverted points in theology, wherein it is our luck to differ with them, they might almost be called quitters. Their attempt to run under your guns after crossing the line shows that they have had enough of debate. In Canada the case is different. There the postal authorities have actually had the audacity to shut us out of the mails. We recall nothing that we have ever done to offend the Canadian government. Whatever it is, the offense is unintentional, for, to tell you the God's truth, as the saying is, Mr. Olney, we have managed to live as an American citizen without worrying ourselves, and scarcely informing ourselves, whether Canada had any government or not, though sundry groans from her tax-paying population have led us to infer that she had. Until Mr. Adolph Caron, the Kanuck postmaster-general, brought himself to our notice by denying us the transportation facilities we had paid for in the mail wagon he runs through the provinces, we were just ignorant enough of natural history not to know that such a Neanderthal kind of a man had survived the Miocene epoch.

Of course we are aware—or we should not have felt ourselves slighted when Brother Cleveland put you instead of us into the place you occupy—that you have no more control over the postmaster-general of Canada than you have over the wild cayuses and cold waves of Manitoba, and therefore we do not expect you to call Mr. Caron to time by firing an ultimatum across his bows; but from the defiant attitude your department has assumed toward China on account of certain outrages on missionaries, we infer that the United States intends to maintain missionary rights in foreign lands. Now, we are a missionary to Canada, which, as much as any part of this green earth that we can call to mind at the present writing, needs the sort of enlightenment we are here to spread. And we contend that our claim to missionary rights in Canada is a good deal superior to that of the Christian emissaries in China, for the reason that while the Chinese object to being evangelized, there are citizens of the Dominion, right to the contrary, who want us bad enough to pay $3 a year to have us come. You understand, of course, Mr. Olney, that we do not go ourselves. We are the Board, and if you have noticed, the Board always stays at home to look after the Fund. Our missionary is the journal in which these lines appear, and while we cannot exactly say that it has been massacred by the paynim in their blindness, we can offer you documentary evidence that they have come as near to holding a lynching bee as the circumstances will allow—that is to say, our missionary has been buried in the Dead Letter office, which is the next thing to getting out a brass band and welcoming us in person to a hospitable grave.

In the matter of the apostles to the Chinese, England called for the head of the particular official responsible for their decease, and he was degraded before sundown. Why not run a little bluff on Canada and get Caron degraded? His crime is not so serious as that of the viceroy of Sechuen, but the difference is equalized when we remember that Caron would not have far to fall. Just speak to Mr. Herbert, Secretary of the Navy, about our fix, and if there happens to be a government vessel in commission, from a man of war to a lighter, that he is not at present using as a pleasure craft, have him start her up the Erie canal as a commerce destroyer. After he had blown up a few canal-boats loaded with Canadian spuds, and sunk a scow or two of Ontario onions, the Dominion government would get rattled and begin to inquire if this thing couldn't be arbitrated. Then make your own terms, not forgetting such advertising as they might throw our way. If Mr. Herbert feels like making an extra dollar out of the trip by picking up an occasional subscriber for our journal, we will talk with him about discounts and commissions.

We have chatted quite familiarly with you, Mr. Olney, anent this affair. Now let the Administration sing its grand, sweet song.

Yours forever, THE EDITOR.

I am not oblivious of the strain this letter will lay upon the relations between this country and Canada, nor of the imminent danger that it will put off annexation many a weary year, but better sacrifice the entente cordiale, the modus vivendi, and the gaiety of nations than endure Caron.

Governor Culberson, of Texas, without the consent of the governed, lately called an extra session of the legislature to enact a law prohibiting prize-fights. This is not popular government, for if the people of Texas could have had their way, the proposed fight would have come off. On the principle of choosing the least of two evils, there is no doubt that the voters of the state would prefer an extraordinary session of pugilists to devise measures for preventing the meeting of the legislature.

GEO. E. MACDONALD.

America Ahead, as Usual.

Dr. Buckley, of the Christian Advocate, New York, has the honor to lead the way with a Christian lie about Huxley. He puts it tentatively, but no doubt it will soon reach the dignity of a full-grown assertion. His words are: "Huxley, it is said, wished, a few days before his death, to be buried with the service of the Church of England." Who said this, Dr. Buckley, before you, and how comes it to be said in New York when it is not said in England?—London Freethinker.

Those of our readers who contemplate buying pianos should read the advertisement of J. E. Remsburg & Son which appears in our columns and write them for further particulars. They handle a first-class instrument and claim that they can save purchasers at least $100. A few days ago Mr. Remsburg went into a music house at Fort Worth, Tex., and asked the price of an Adam Schaaf piano, the one he sells. The dealer asked $375 for it. Mr. Remsburg had previously sent one exactly like it to Belton, Tex., for $245. Mr. Frank Beverly, an old TRUTH SEEKER subscriber, who purchased it writes as follows:

"FRIEND REMSBURG: The piano arrived all right, in good condition and in tune. It was tested by an expert and pronounced an excellent instrument. Mrs. Beverly is highly pleased with it. It gives perfect satisfaction. We are both greatly obliged to you for sending us such a good piano."

A Unitarian View of Sunday Laws.

The possible absurdities of high civilization seem about equal in church and state. Probably the height of narrowness was never reached until a country based on common schools began to establish one kind of morality for six days in the week, and another kind of morality for the seventh. New York city is rapidly finding out what comes of such impossible notions. Morality, of course, under any rational interpretation is an action or course of action that advances our own well-being together with that of our neighbors. In evolution terms, to be moral is to will on a line with our own honor and manhood—to increase our life and redeem it from waste. Immorality is life waste—and therewith it is the destruction of character. It is impossible to create a specific Sunday morality. If whisky selling tends to the damage of seller and buyer, it is no more a curse on Sunday than on Monday. If it is inherently innocent to pick a basket of apples on Tuesday, it is on others. When our Puritan fathers undertook to legislate sin into a Sunday shave they did so because they literally thought a supreme revelation ordered it. But New York aldermen and New York legislators are not troubled with such convictions. The Sunday laws are results of old superstitions. They are held on to after the superstitions are dead, because the religious public is not ready to face the question of natural morality and live by it. It simply is impossible to create a one-day morality. What is right on Saturday is right on Sunday.

The time has long since passed when we could rest all together—we cannot play alike or worship alike, or think alike. Who shall lay down the law as to how we shall keep Sunday? By and by the majority will turn around and say, We have had enough of your law; now you shall have some of ours. You have told us what we shall not do; now we will tell you what you shall not do. We will shut up your churches as we now shut up your barber shops and your other Sunday indulgences. We will keep you indoors and forbid the Sunday display of new dresses on the avenues. Sunday began two hundred years ago by driving all to church and fining those who stayed away. It has come down to forbidding this and that, while not a tenth of the people go to church. You are on the wrong track. You are wasting your moral force trying to keep up the semblance of a sacred twenty-four hours.

Then comes the personal liberty question. Can you tell exactly where the line is going to be drawn? Can we forbid "Tom and Jerry" a saloon tippie when we know that mayor and aldermen and lawyers and not a few priests and parsons have their wines or worse? Can we understand just what is rest to some one whose temperament or occupation is different from our own? One of our most famous authors was unable to keep in health without sharp physical exercise every day, and he took it sawing wood. Going to church is the severest possible labor to some people. They need rest from brain labor.

The whole Sunday enforcement business should be given up. The aim of law and of religion should be to enlarge the opportunities to rational rest. Spend all our moral force on permissiveness and help. Our churches should have play-grounds and gymnasiums as well as sermons. When Agassiz first came to America he complained that the worst feature of society was Sunday restrictiveness. He had been accustomed to hear his preacher discourse in the morning and play ball with him in the afternoon. Even John Calvin sometimes adjourned his evening service and went with all his congregation to the theater. "Better theaters than ours?" To be sure; and we would have better theaters if we gave up our Puritanic struggle to give the devil the best chances at pleasure and rest. I write as one who rarely goes to a theater; but I claim the green fields on Sunday. I insist on my right to take my rest with games that discharge the blood from my brain. We are an overworked nation. Insomnia and insanity are multiplying. Our time for rest we must have whether in the middle of the week or at the beginning or the close. The church must learn to give us something besides the hard work of listening to logic, or the harder work of listening to illogical sentiment. The subject opens out very widely, because we are infusing our whole social life and our legal code with the mischief of two kinds of morality. The key to the whole difficulty is, "Do unto others as you would that others should do unto you" on every day in the week alike. Give up your seventh day restrictive code. Enlarge your religious privileges to cover all that is helpful. Make your church everything that is wholesome and saving. Think of the whole governmental force of New York clapping their hands over "a dry Sunday," no matter how wet or whisky-soaked Wednesday or Saturday is. Nor does any one believe a single soul saved from evil desire. They have simply put the handcuffs on for one day and then taken them off for six.—E. P. P., in the New Unity.

An Honest Confession.

Some ministers seem to have an incurable itch for claiming that all the men who have figured prominently in public life are Christians. Mr. Lincoln has almost been canonized, and Gen. Grant has been put forward as possessing all the graces, though neither one of them ever joined the church or made the slightest public profession of faith in Jesus. We once heard a minister of our own denomination, in a public address, enroll Andrew Johnson among the disciples. And now, at last, it is gravely affirmed that Edwin M. Stanton is entitled to the same honor. That Mr. Stanton was a man of consummate ability need not be said. But if he was a Christian, save the mark! A little common sense is not a bad thing even in the pulpit. It seems to us that the whole business of paying court to great names, even when they represent irreproachable characters, is essentially vulgar. Is our holy religion so lacking in attractiveness that it must needs be commended to the world by a parade of its most noted adherents? Or has it anything to gain by decking itself with the ambiguous compliments of men who never submitted themselves to its demands? The less of all this the better. We are sick of the pulpit toadyism that pronounces its best eulogies over those who are not the real disciples of Jesus Christ.—Nashville Christian Advocate.

CONCORD, N. H., Sept. 30, 1895.

DEAR FRIEND PUTNAM: Your work, in the main, pleases me well. It is a truly valuable contribution to the literature of the times. And I hope it may so prove to you—financially, as well as in other considerations.

A neighbor and friend of mine, a native of France, has your book now, and is very much pleased with it. He thinks it should be translated into French, and that it would meet a ready sale in his country.

It is indeed a book for France, and for all civilized nations, as well as for America.

I am glad you have written it, and in my life-time; and hoping it, and all your efforts in behalf of untrammelled civil and religious liberty, may have great success, I am, Most fraternally yours,

Vale Bible!

I close its lids and calmly turn away;
There is no hope in all its musty pages.
Across the moorlands of the vanished ages,
Whose the lean hounds of Superstition bay
In snarling rings forever round the gray,
Half-buried tombs of scribes and hoary sages,
Whose God in infant's blood his wrath assuages—
From my long quest have I returned to-day.
Back to the present, with its life and light,
I have returned with empty, bleeding hands;
I found no pearls, but only shifting sands
In all that land of bigotry and blight.
With calm contempt I hear the rusty gate
Of the swart Past swing to with raucous grate.

An Outline of the Congress.

The Freethought Federation and Union Congress will open at Hardman's Hall, Friday morning, October 25th, at 10 o'clock, with an address by Samuel P. Putnam on "Rome or Reason: Which?" Committees will be appointed, and other business transacted. Daniel T. Ames and others will speak on Friday afternoon; Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., on Friday evening, when the New York Liberal Club unites with the Congress. This will be an important and interesting meeting, for old-timers are expected to be present, and the New York Liberal Club is a historic power. Saturday sessions, morning and afternoon, will be devoted to business. Saturday evening Susan H. Wixon will give an address, "Will the New Woman Go to Church?" followed by Franklin Steiner. Sunday morning T. B. Wakeman will speak on "Religion Under Evolution," and E. O. Walker on "The National Reform Association: Its Position and Work." Sunday afternoon, Henry Rowley and Henry Bird will speak. The Newark Liberal League and Brooklyn Philosophical Association unite with this session of the Congress. Sunday evening, L. K. Washburn will speak on "Liberty and Education the Basis of the Republic," and Samuel P. Putnam will give the closing address on "Evolution, Progress, and Freethought." A paper is expected from E. M. Macdonald on "New York Politics and Freethought Principles," and from George E. Macdonald on "The Worth and Worthlessness of an Oath." Also letters from Hon. C. B. Waite and others. The object of the Congress is to enlighten the people to present Freethought in its living aspects, as liberty, justice, and civilization. No Liberal can afford to stay away from this Congress. It is a means of information which nothing else can give. Our ablest and best-informed speakers will be on hand. A solid array of facts and arguments will be presented. We must reach the people. Mass meetings are one of the most potent instrumentalities for agitation and education. Come if possible. And, if possible, let us enter the fall campaign with the best resources at our command. Send all contributions directly to

BUSHNELL, ILL., Sept. 23, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $1 for a selection of pamphlets. I believe the great need of the Freethought cause now is more individual earnestness. Ask good Christians in cases of terrible calamities what the sufferers had done to make God angry. This is a very good way to bring on a little interesting talk. Of course, everything is as an infidel God wants it to be.

Your sincere good wisher,

SODOM, O., Sept. 22, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Sometime ago, I think in May, I renewed my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER up to July 1st, 1895. By an oversight of yours my tab reads '96, and I cannot let you cheat yourself that way, for the best of papers. You will now please find $5; $3 50 for subscription and for "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated," and for the rest send eight copies of "Age of Reason," "Self-Contradictions of the Bible," and "Myth and Miracle."

ROBERT BROWN.

He Sees the Point.

NEW YORK, Sept. 27, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Prohibited in Canada! It is well, certainly, to feel highly gratified at this tribute to your influence and effective work against the Christian church. The embargo on THE TRUTH SEEKER will increase the circulation of the paper. We Freethinkers need excitement. When bigots say "Shall not," the independent mind says "I will." Fight them by getting more books and papers into Canada. That will secure the approval by all Liberal-minded men.

GENESEO, ILL., Sept. 20, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: As usual, I am a little behind. Times are close here, but we can not do without the grand old TRUTH SEEKER (I mean, when I say "we," wife and I). Inclosed find $5 on subscription and for two copies "All About the Holy Bible," two copies "Liberty of Man, Woman, and Child," and eight copies "Age of Reason." Hoping you will continue to strike hard at orthodoxy, and that you are well and happy, I close by wishing good luck to the Badge-pin man.

GRAFTON, W. VA., Sept. 24, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I have been reading THE TRUTH SEEKER for three years, and must say that I never perused a publication with greater satisfaction. I see in the last issue that the sky-pilots are after you and demand the paper's suppression. Have we a censor in this country? If so, what is his name? If we have, has he the authority to decide what is blasphemous? In his absence, who is? Is it Comstock? I know that for centuries it was the rule with the black-coated gentry to denounce as blasphemous anything that ran counter to their lop-sided conceptions and dogmas. I also notice that the Christian Reformer, et al, don't speak very flatteringly of your readers. Well, I don't feel offended; one has to consider the source. This much I will say, that my fellow-believers in this town and vicinity will compare favorably in every respect with any equal number of Christians.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., Sept. 24, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I have taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for several months through the Springfield News Co., and I like it so well that I shall continue to take it. I also take the Freethinker, Investigator, Agnostic Journal, and Freethought Magazine, and am well pleased with all of them, but I like THE TRUTH SEEKER better than any of them on account of those "horrible" pictures that shock the Christians so much. I have purchased quite a large number of books from you through the News Co., and am well pleased with all of them. I have just finished reading "Men, Women, and Gods," and I hope that every woman in the country will read it. I am trying to organize a Liberal Club in Springfield, but it is very uphill work, as the people here take too much stock in gods, witches, and devils. If I succeed in organizing a club it will probably be named the Truth Seeker Club, which I think is a very appropriate name for it.

Please let me know if you have any portraits of R. G. Ingersoll and Thomas Paine. Wishing you success in your good work, I remain, sincerely yours,

GEO. K. CLARK.

Santa Claus vs. Jesus Christ.

FORT FAIRFIELD, ME., Sept. 30, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I had a religious "confab" with an Adventist awhile ago, during which "confab" my conversation ran somewhat like this: I told him that the fable of Jesus Christ was the crudest fable ever invented by mortal man; that it had cost many millions of lives; that it had been the cause of untold suffering, as well as some happiness resulting from imagination.

The fable of Santa Claus has been a blessing to mankind, or children-kind, the world over, wherever its influence has been felt. Millions of fathers and mothers have taught their children to hang up their stockings by the old chimney corner, or by the modern stove-pipe, at night on the 24th of December, and allow dear old Santa Claus to come down the chimney and fill their stockings with peanuts and candies and other goodies. Those dear children arise in the morning, and their dear little hearts are made happy, and their bright eyes dance with merriment and delight to see their stockings thus filled, and they, all the time, thinking that Santa Claus did it.

I told my friend that I had a record of over 14,700,000 people who had been burned at the stake and otherwise tortured and put to death in the name of Christ and religion! And that that was enough to make me condemn both Christ and religion.

I told him if he would admit that there was probably a Jesus Christ upon every other planet throughout the boundless universe, I would talk with him about ours. But in that case ours would not be the only begotten son of God by millions. And if there was not any other Christ but ours, he would have to fly from planet to planet, and world to world, all through the universe to "save" the population on those other worlds, and that was a piece of nonsense. He admitted the force of my argument (for I talked with force and power and emphasis in my voice), but thought he would hang onto Christ awhile longer. I told him to hang onto him, but that was all the good it would do.

Hell's Sulphurous Clouds Recede.

KAU KAUNA, WIS., Sept. 25, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER. After this expires I will renew my subscription for a year or six months, just as my funds will permit me to do, for it would be impossible for me to go without the paper entirely. I will try to use economy in something else, so I will be able to take the paper the remainder of my days. I do think it improves the mind of almost anyone. One thing, it shakes off all that dreadful fear of hell. I try to make good use of my papers by sending them out abroad to convert and enlighten people. I did think I would have them bound in book form, but I see I can do more good by lending them. If I only could persuade some of those old orthodox, hypocritical church members to read them, I think I would be doing noble work. If they only get a glimpse of Robt. G. Ingersoll's portrait, they think it is poison and not fit to gaze on. I think that the Freethought question is progressing wonderfully, and I say amen to it. That is the best wish I have for it.

Yours truly, MRS. MIKE SMITH.

The Attention of C. Severance is Solicited.

AKRON, O., Sept. 28, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: In answer to C. Severance on Spiritualism, allow me to ask the gentleman where and of whom he obtained the information that Spiritualism recognizes man as the only immortal entity of nature? There may be some Spiritualists who do not accept the teaching of spirit philosophy, but our friends in spirit life speak of immortality as an embodiment of individuality connected and correlated with matter as much in all other organized life as in man; that every rose that blooms on earth has its never-dying principle in spirit matter; the trees, in majestic beauty, tower upward as on earth. Man is not the great "I am" in many ways, and, like Mr. Severance, I think nature knows of no pre-eminence of man over a beast, except in better development. And as for the power or attribute of reasoning, it can be found in most, if not all, other animals in such a degree as to correspond with their animate nature. Reason, like conscience, is but a creature of conditions, and consequently of dictation, to a large degree; both "hope" and "desire" entering largely into the result, and a "plug hat" by no means makes man a god or so pre-eminently superior to the lower animals, for in many respects they have developed attributes that man has not. Evolution has not been accepted by the great body of educated thinkers as true, but more as probable or possible than otherwise, for the chain has many missing links, and there are many arguments against it. While no student of nature will deny that nature in her wondrous ways shows a progressiveness in nearly all animate life and a grand unfoldment for the good of all, it is not an accepted fact that man came from a relative of the monkey, or the monkey from the vegetable kingdom. However, it is not evolution that we are discussing, but the philosophy of modern Spiritualism.

Mr. Severance brings many things into the argument that have little or no bearing on the subject in question, and I might as well quote the old epitaph of Solomon Peas:

Here under the sod, beneath these trees,
Lies the body of Solomon Peas;
Peas is not here, only his pod;
He gave up his soul, it went to God.

Yet such a declaration does not prove the immortality of the soul.

The facts are, we have "proof positive" of the continuity of man in an immortal state after passing from earth, unless it can be shown that the many phases of phenomena attributed to spirit power really come by the agency of some other occult power. Mr. Severance says: "Are these Spiritualistic manifestations sufficient and satisfactory. To some they are, to others they are not, and the world is divided in opinion where honest and sincere investigators have seen the same in all its phases." I have many a time dug an honest worm, impaled it on a hook of honest steel, spit honest saliva upon the bait, and, with honest "hope," failed to catch a fish; while other fools, like myself, could catch fish with a pin-hook, and, in consequence, I cannot reason that fish cannot be caught with a hook.

My friend seems to discourage "hope," and tells of what some great intellect has said about it; yet hope is the mainspring of all human action, and without it our life would be miserable.

As for Horace Greeley's offer, if such was made, it was no criterion in the case whatever, for he may have made the offer and given no opportunity for spirit power to demonstrate or comply with his demands. Should I deny the fact of telephonic communication, and then keep clear of all telephones, it could never be demonstrated to me that the intelligent tones of a human voice can be transmitted by wire. The diagnosing of disease by some peculiar media has also been proven a fact, yet hundreds of mediums claim such power who are not, by nature, constituted clairvoyant in any sense, but more fraud-voyant, and impose upon the public to get their money. Three witnesses once testified that they caught a certain Irishman stealing chickens; six others swore they knew nothing of it; the prisoner, after conviction, being asked what he had to say about it, replied that "it is a devil of a country where thray can bate six." Yet he was a convicted thief all the same. Mr. Severance, do you hear? A. D. SWAN.

The Other Side.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., Sept. 22, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: As a rule, we candidates for hell do not waste much time on religious papers that seek to prolong decaying Christianity, for, if our time possesses the value of a setting hen's, the comparative loss, at that value, would be immense.

However, as someone has been kind enough to send me sample copies of a paper "devoted to truth and righteousness as taught by the apostles of Jesus Christ," I have given the same some attention.

It seems, from a plain statement by the editor, that Freethinkers are not the only persons who become delinquent on the subscription list, for he says: "We have not less than six thousand dollars due us on our list, and nearly all of these delinquents have received many notices; some of them a dozen or more. Each week we send out notices for near or about one thousand dollars. In response we receive not more than fifty dollars." In consequence, he declares it the greatest injustice ever committed by Christians in regard to an honest effort to do good. But let him be consoled by the thought that God has prepared a very warm place for such people in the next world, for it is full of comfort and satisfaction.

Among other articles is found a full account of the burial of Jesus, which excited intense interest, on account of the freshness of the subject and the charm which is ever found in the contemplation of the grave. If this article did not increase the weekly remittance of delinquents, then they must fail to appreciate it or be unable to raise the wherewith.

Further information confirmed the death of Jesus; and it is safe to say no room now exists for the doubt that he is really dead. I am thoroughly satisfied that he is dead and was buried, but, oh, how much trouble this world has seen because of his refusal to stay in his grave, part of which is outlined in communications that tell of in-harmony, and congregations split up and divided. Says one brother: "The work is still growing darker and more sinful as the days go by. I told you about the innovators propping the windows and locking the doors against us, and taking the Bible and hymn books out of the chapel, and now, as a last resort, they have gone into court and prayed for an injunction." All of which is sad, though confirmatory of predictions made by Jesus in regard to strife, the realization of which establishes his fame as a prophet.

Another brother jumps onto a rival sect which, of course, he does not like, and denounces it as "a daily fornicator with the world," which is a pretty serious charge, to say the least, and I really hope it cannot be proven outside of the clergy who belong to it. No reasonable doubt exists as to their guilt, but that the whole sect is so bad and immoral, I cannot believe without sustaining evidence.

An essay on Infidels and hell would not have been recognized as dealing with such a subject had it not been for the heading; but the advice of the editor to correspondents requesting them not to roll their manuscripts up in a newspaper, when letter postage is required by law, was indirect evidence, but sufficiently strong, to show that some Christians thus get the best of Uncle Sam.

As life is a mixture of joy and sadness, the happy thought so often alluded to that Jesus died to save sinners, was offset by the letter of a brother, who said: "Our meetings closed August 11th without any addition to the church. The time for the meetings did not seem to be well-chosen, for some were afflicted in one way and some in another; but the worst of all afflictions seemed to be the progressive worldly-mindedness."

Another brother says he "threw down" (is this slang?) twenty-seven meetings in May on account of the drought and the tear up of settlements in the Indian Territory; which would indicate that God is largely responsible for the "throw downs" and the failure of the gospel in that arid section. Another servant of the Lord Jesus revealed the fact that he got into that country on borrowed money, was dead broke and willing to preach for nothing if his fare was paid from place to place. He did not seem much discouraged under such adverse conditions, for the hope of a large reward in the next world doubtless buoyed him up. Before I finished reading these interesting papers, I was as much shocked as the editor, for some new preacher has declared, so he affirms, that he can eat all the hell there is and not scorch his mustache. If that is not trifling with sacred things, then the editor and I are mistaken; and any preacher who will thus attempt to destroy the Infidel's future home is really a foe to Christianity and the perpetuity of priestcraft, for hell is the foundation of the whole business.

C. SEVERANCE.

CLINT, TEX., Sept. 26, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Your valuable issue of the 21st inst. came duly to hand, but being off from my ranch I did not see it till to-day. I read first the articles of the Christian Reformer and Christian Statesman copied therein, and my wrath and indignation were at a white heat by the time I was through with that devilish and hypocritical attack upon our beloved Freethought publication in particular and upon human liberty and progress in general. Then I read your reply thereto, and that "sorter" cooled me off a little, for, metaphorically speaking, you skinned the wretches alive. The wonder to me is that you could do it so coolly and gentlemanly like—am free to confess that if I had been put at that job I should have been careless enough to let the scalpel slip and go far below the cuticle.

"Do not the souls of these blasphemers shudder when they think of their awful responsibility to a tribunal, not human, before which they shall one day stand?"

Behold above the stock in trade upon which these heresy hunters, whose name is legion, live and fatten, so permitted to do by the fears, the ignorance and superstition of the masses, brought about from of old by this Bible religion and its cunning, power-loving priesthood.

"If you say anything bad about our church, or us saints here upon earth, and don't join in the heavenly procession, and pay your dues to support in state us duly appointed ambassadors from heaven, our great big God will go for you 'awful' when he gets you in his 'other world,' while we will lie back on our golden thrones, and enjoy the agonies of the damned, and in looking over the battlements of heaven down upon the dreadful pits where the fiery waves of darkness 'gainst the rocks of deep damnation break (as we can't just yet jail and shackle and torture them here), we shall be greatly rejoiced and thankful to see the Editor of the aforetime TRUTH SEEKER tossing about in the sulphurous billows, and crying aloud for the historic drop of water which, of course, we will take great pleasure in denying him.—Selah."

Such is their holy creed, and such the animus exhibited in their publications.

Now, Doctors McAllister and George, Right Rev. Wiley, and the rest of your kidney, having had your vile say about THE TRUTH SEEKER and other disseminators of good morality, minus the insanity which you call religion, as a private in the ranks of Freethought and Secularism I wish to say a word to you holy men, but not in the way of argument, for you despise reason and common sense when in conflict with your religious creed: In the days of my youth and ignorance I was under the domination of just about such sacred teachers as you are. They told me I was utterly depraved, and as I could not "believe and be baptized," they had me "hair-hung and breeze shaken" for a long time, and in that imbecil condition of mind they got many an honest dollar from me which I now wish I had back to give to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Ralph Waldo Emerson was the man who first opened my eyes to begin to see the clerical imposition and fraud. With all your claims to learning and piety, I don't think you can have the assurance to class yourselves with that scholar, poet, philosopher, genius, Infidel, and perfectly pure man. If you have the brains to understand, go and read him, and he may teach you something of justice and charity. After that THE TRUTH SEEKER may kindly lend you a few books from its library to save you from the hell of bigotry, sectarianism, fanaticism, and hatred of your fellow men who cannot bow down before the monster that your diseased imagination has created and called God. But you will stick to John Calvin because it is to your pecuniary interest to do so—John Calvin, the author of the most diabolical religious creed on the face of the earth—Calvin, who warmed himself at the fire that consumed the body of the gentle Servetus, and stirred up the religious fury and fanaticism that set Europe on fire and consigned multitudes to the stake, the rack, and the dungeon. Isn't it pleasant to contemplate that the originators of many different sects and religions had to be fiends in human shape, as, for instance, Constantine and the Popes, John Calvin, Henry VIII., etc. And now, reverend doctors and divines, as you have hissed out your hatred and holy venom upon Heaton and the Macdonalds because in the discharge of their duty and in self-defense they are slightly interfering with your thriving God business, I will voice the sentiments of thousands of the most intelligent and virtuous men in this country when I say that a man who believes, or pretends to believe, the Presbyterian creed, so horrible and so repugnant to the humane instincts of all enlightened people that its paid priests are afraid or ashamed any longer to reveal its Mokanna-like features from the pulpits—that such a man is either a fiend, a fanatical dupe, or a knave of the deepest dye, and is not a good citizen in any country. So you see, reverend and holy doctors, that we have our opinions of you as well as you have yours of us, and you may denounce and pray as much as you please, but in the end we'll establish justice and teach you better manners.

Mr. Editor, these ministers are thirsting for blood. Can't you send over to China and get the heads of some of their recent victims slain upon the demand of Christians for blood because poor China is helpless, and present them on a silver salver to these humble followers of the meek and lowly Jesus, so as to appease their appetites for a time?

This letter don't amount to much. The best reply to Brothers McA., G., and W. is the $3 inclosed to pay my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER in advance. Heston, keep stirring them up with the pole of your artistic genius. Your pictures instruct those who cannot understand arguments. We'll stand by you so long as we have a dime to give you a dinner, and, Mr. Editor, do you help to turn "Tammany" loose next election. Better open dives and saloons with freedom and sociability and human nature, although accompanied with a little vice, than New England blue laws, Presbyterian and other priests on the top, then the union of church and state, a censorship of the press, the stoppage of everything but orthodox speech, the jailing of such heretics as you and I, and, in short, the hell of the Dark Ages triumphant again.

S. G. ETHERIDGE.

Arguing Against a Plesantry.

SAMOTH, ILL., Sept. 22, 1895.

E. M. MACDONALD, TRUTH SEEKERS, et al, Greeting: As I am in arrears, inclosed find $3 to tally my tab a step higher. THE TRUTH SEEKER is performing a philanthropic work; go on in this grand discharge of duty; slay the argus-eyed monster of superstition that has from time immemorial been fostered by senseless creed and custom.

Show the stolid Sundayites the folly of their fanaticism. Deal a rib-roaster to the devotees of the union of church and state. Show up the dogmas of the octopus orthodoxy, and go on in exposing the barbarities of their fetish book.

Freethinkers must be the standard-bearers of freedom.

In your issue of Sept. 7th the "Observer" observes: "Eliminating that species of insanity designated as 'love,' which is but another form of avarice, and allowing for the dissolution of the partnership at the instance of one or both parties, I conceive that the arrangement is as near perfect as any that could be entered into by fools."

While I've perused the pointed puns of the "Observer" with pleasure, the above does not pleasantly meet my approval. As I am only a country chap, without the proverbial hayseed in my hair, perhaps one would say, "I wouldn't attempt a criticism of that philosopher, wag, and humorist." I reply with some trepidation, "That wag, poet, and philosopher is only human, therefore fallible, as the above pessimistic observation demonstrates." Now, if all people were of a similar opinion as Mr. Macdonald, and put it into practice, where would this old world wag to? Would it not wag back to barbarism and intellectual night? Would there be any poetry, art, music, and all that which refines, transfigures, and exalts the soul to an ethical existence, the essence of that which Mr. Macdonald affectionately designates as "a species of insanity?" Take love from the human heart, and would life be worth the living? Does Mr. Macdonald desire to deprive the grief-stricken mother of that love she fondly lavishes upon her little babe, when at the brink of the grave her heart goes out in tender, maternal passion for her own flesh and heart's blood, who soon will be lowered gently down into its dark and damp "windowless palace of repose," free from pain, and perhaps forever removed from mortal gaze?

What would you substitute for love?—lust? Do you consider—"honor bright"—that such a mother is suffering with a "species of insanity," and should be confined in some retreat for the feeble-minded? Is a man "insane" because he builds a home, diligently labors to provide for his "other half" and children? Of course love must necessarily sanctify any matrimonial or free-love alliance. Could lust sanctify it more? Is not "love" the theme of the poet, the plot of the novelist, the background of the artist, and the forte of the musician? and without "love," would not all these be a lost art? I understand that you are married; if so, was Mrs. Badgepin foolish enough to accept the undivided devotions of an "insane" man?

When a noble-hearted woman will heroically withstand the brutal assaults of a drunken husband—will go down in the gutter, and implore him tearfully to not touch it more—is she "insane" for so enduring and endeavoring to lift him from a lecherous life?

If you advocate lust theories, contrariwise to the general conception of "love," think what influences will be thrown around coming generations, during the period of prenatal life and afterwards? Is a home a home where the ties of affection and love is not? In my estimation, love educates the brain and ennobles the heart. Without love, our progeny would be lust-brats, and as a consequence, equally as criminal. Where is the sense in producing such progeny?

If love is a "species of insanity," I sincerely advise every young man and woman to forthwith court "insanity" for their life's health and happiness. If I am mistaken, I honestly believe I am advocating a noble and praiseworthy cause. Such a cause fires the patriot's heart, and he will lay down his life if need be.

Freethinkers everywhere should set a shining flame of love before their less loving Christian brothers. As THE TRUTH SEEKER is such an able and impartial forum for the agitation of advanced ideas, I ask you to extend me a hearing.

Yours for a life of love,

CHAS. D. MCBRIDE.

MR. EDITOR: The remarkable effect which my observation has had on the mind of Mr. McBride is wholly unexpected by me. I submit that I could not have foreseen that it would lead him to a baby's grave, to a field of battle, and to "a retreat for the feeble-minded." I know that I said nothing about maternal grief, which your correspondent appears to have had in view in drawing his picture of the infant lowered into its damp and otherwise unsanitary place of repose. I must deny having tried to discourage noble-hearted women from withstanding the assaults of husbands in a state of inebriety and tearfully advising them to swear off. If a wife thinks that a husband who falls into the gutter is better than none at all, she will exercise the right to go down there after him. Again, I have not depreciated the sentiment of patriotism, though I hold that dying for a problem is a poor way to solve it, and that a man who will forfeit his life to maintain any government as yet established is afflicted with an excess of enthusiasm. These being the varieties of emotion cited by Mr. McBride to illustrate the utility of love, and none of them being the one I had in mind when I wrote the sentence that does not "pleasantly meet his approval," I am not harassed by any felt obligation to discuss them at length.

To tell it just as it is, Mr. Editor, I am forced to distrust the analytical powers of Mr. McBride's mind. I am afraid, too, that he has not made the question in hand the subject of protracted thought. I am convinced that his letter might be improved by judicious revision. In the first place, if he is addressing myself, as in the argumentative part of his communication he is apparently doing, why that stately salutation to E. M. Macdonald, truth seekers, et al? Unless I am the party hailed as Et Al, where do I come in as a second person singular? Why are the Editor and his constituents examined on a charge that is brought against me? I wonder if it is a fact that Mr. McBride thinks in words having the same initial. It would seem so from such combinations as "tally my tab," "folly of their fanaticism," "octopus orthodoxy," "perused the pointed puns," and so forth. Or is this done for effect? If the latter, then I shall be doing him a favor in apprising him that the effect is bad. His work is too coarse. "Apt alliteration's artful aid," in his case, is not apt, it is the opposite of aid, and there is no art about it. It has been invoked to the neglect of sense, as in the case of the octopus, for there is certainly something incongruous in the conception of a devil-fish as a dogmatist, as there is also something ungrammatical in the use of the plural pronoun in the same sentence. Skipping to other places, I would ask if "argus-eyed monster" is approved diction in Samoth, Ill. What is the matter with "hydra-headed?" What sense is there in the following question: "Is not 'love' the theme of the poet, the plot [?] of the novelist, the background [?] of the artist, and the forte [can he mean motif?] of the musician, and without 'love' would not all these be a lost art?" All what?—the poet, the novelist, the artist, and the musician? They are the subjects of the inquiry, but they cannot with propriety be called an art. Does Mr. McBride mean to ask whether poetry, etc., would not be lost arts, or whether the agents, the poet, etc., would not be lost artists? The thing actually lost, if it ever existed in his mind, is the meaning of Mr. McBride. The only tangible thing he has advanced is his subscription.

Criticism is more grateful to me than verbal compliments, for the reason that it is more likely to be deserved and often has the appearance of greater sincerity. So I thank Mr. McBride, and in taking leave of him venture to hope that he will cultivate habits of clear thinking.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Land of Dreams.

Over the River of Drooping Eyes
Is the wonderful land of dreams,
Where lilies grow as white as snow,
And fields are green, and warm winds blow,
And the tall reeds quiver, all in a row—
And no one ever cries;
For it's a beautiful place for girls and boys,
And there's no scolding and lots of noise,
And no lost balls or broken toys—
Over the River of Drooping Eyes
In the beautiful land of dreams.

Over the River of Drooping Eyes
Is the wonderful land of dreams;
There are horns to blow and drums to beat,
And plenty of candy and cakes to eat,
And no one ever cleans his feet,
And no one ever tires!
There are plenty of grassy places to play,
And birds and bees they throng all day,
Oh, wouldn't you like to stay
In the beautiful land of dreams?

Some Popular Errors About Snakes.

II.

In a recent number of the San Francisco Examiner "Rene Bache" says, "For what purpose does the snake rattle?" is still unsolved." This is strange, to put it mildly. But if the readers of the Children's Corner will "stay with me" I think we can solve the problem. That the rattle is a great disadvantage to the snake in his encounter with mankind is true, but so is any conspicuous habit of all other animals. But with everything else the rattle is of great advantage, as everything is careful to keep away from it. A horse once bitten never forgets it, and the progeny of a bitten animal is said to be more sensitive to snakes and rattles than others. Not long ago, close by, while reaching under a bush with a pick to loosen some gold-bearing gravel, I heard a rattle, and I assure you I did not stop there to discuss the tariff, silver, or design theories. Yet what could the poor snake do when I returned with some rocks and a sharp shovel? But in the case of a horse, cow, coyote, dog, or other animal, the rattle was all he needed to make him victorious, and as long as he stayed where he was they could not harm him. There is every reason to believe that a rattlesnake never rattles when he strikes anything he intends to eat. He bites only to get food and protect himself. His supply of venom is, probably, limited; if he had an unlimited supply he could afford to bite without rattling. I presume the greater number of rattlesnakes never bite anything, only as they want it to eat, in the whole course of their lives. They need the venom to paralyze, with poison, rats, mice, birds, rabbits, prairie dogs, and other creatures they live on. When for any reason his stock of venom gets low his chances for food are diminished. The rattle is his "bluff," and does him just as well or better than if he bit three or four animals or people a day; and as he is honest and means just what he says when he says, "H-r-r-r-r-r-r-r-r," which interpreted means "Get away! git! or I'll—" He commands the respect (although he has not yet succeeded in getting the love) of all who come in contact with him. This disposes of "why does he rattle?" The sound of a large one is something like a child's small rattle moved very swiftly. Sometimes he bites without rattling. Some years ago I saw a little boy, near Fort Worth, Texas, who was bitten that way while walking in a garden path; the snake—nearly three feet long—caught his big toe and held on until the boy got to the house before he was shaken off, tearing the skin and flesh to the bone. I think the snake meant to swallow the little wiggling toe, and forgot to take in consideration that the rest of the boy was fastened to it. Six days after I saw the boy on horseback five miles from home, not much worse off than many boys with badly stubbed toes. They put turpentine and tobacco on the wound. This was a standard remedy in the Boston mountains in Arkansas and Northern Texas at that time. I have given turpentine internally to my own horses and other stock when I suspected snake bites and always with gratifying results. But I do not wish to be understood as endorsing it unqualifiedly, as I do not know.

The latest discovered antidote is hypodermic injections of strychnine. But I think turpentine given internally and applied externally should be experimented with by those who have the facility; but, possibly, it is too simple, and has not the elements of greatness, like remedies that either kill or cure, and require the skill and knowledge of a doctor. However, if this article induces experiments with the remedy stated by competent and responsible parties, more will have been accomplished than I expected when I commenced writing.

The pain from rattlesnake bites is said to be terrible by those who have been bitten. A great many never fully recover. A man here this spring was bitten eight years ago. He is lame, and has a running sore from it. Many cases prove fatal. The rattler is not formidable on open ground. I knew a large family, nearly all girls, traveling overland from Minnesota to the Southwest, across the "Sand Hills" of Western Nebraska, where there were as many rattlers a few years ago as I ever saw anywhere. At first the cry of "rattlesnake" would cause a squealing and a stampede of all the girls, but in six weeks' time, an eleven-year-old girl swinging a bridle by holding to the headstall, killed one while the family sat down to a camp-fire supper, the others scarcely getting up "to see the fight;" the comment running about like this: "Oh, I could have killed him in half the time!" "Now, she had better be careful!" "Why didn't she hit him when he started to run the first time?" This shows how easily we get accustomed to necessary dangers. The tactics of these girls was to get the snake to retreat and then hit him with the bridle-bit as stated. So many bridles had got broken that orders were given not to use any more bridles in snake encounters. One day one of these girls stepped on the neck of a rattler with her bare foot, as he lay, after a shower, half way out of a hole sunning himself. That gave them all a cautionary shock that lasted some time. It is also well to mention that that summer was very cool, and it seemed to me the snakes were more clumsy on that account, and consequently more easily conquered. It also made them come in sight more frequently to sun themselves.

Once, while I was a soldier in the United States army, and we were marching up the Gila river in Arizona, one of our lieutenants cut off the head of a very large snake with his sword. The father of a large Mexican family of strolling players from the state of Chihuahua, Mexico, who were camped near by, took the snake saying, "Muy bueno, bueno."† Some of the older soldiers said the Mexicans were going to eat the rattler. I went with others to their camp and they had it cut up into pieces (skinned) frying in pans. There were some very pretty girls in the party, but the thoughts of those beauties getting on the outside of that hideous rattlesnake sent a chill through me. And when, at night, they played the guitar and sang sweet songs of love in Spanish, I was content to stay in camp with no beauty to contemplate except that afforded by a government blanket branded U. S. in the middle. No grace of limb, nor charm of voice, nor flash of love-lit eye could rid me of the thought that inside of it all stuck a piece of rattlesnake.

The readers of the Children's Corner will all go to bed now, and if they don't dream of "seraphims whose footfalls tufted on the velvet floor," I am not to blame.

He Hit the Kaiser.

One day last winter the German emperor and empress, while out sleigh-riding, came across three little boys in the Thiergarten who were so busy snowballing as to overlook the imperial couple's approach until quite close, and then chance had it that one of the snowballs hit the monarch on the nose.

"Did it hurt you, Herr Kaiser?" asked the little culprit, in so anxious a tone as to set emperor and empress both laughing. "You can hit me," resumed the little fellow, "and we'll call it square." At which there was more laughter.

The emperor took the boy's address, and next day sent him a comical memento of the incident.

What the Little Folks Are Saying.

The parson (meeting Johnny, who is just returning from a swim): "Johnnie, can you tell me where little boys who bathe on Sundays go to?" Johnnie: "Aye. You come along with me, and I'll show yer."—Judge.

"My tooth aches awful," said Willie. "Don't think I'd better go to school today." "No, you needn't go to school. I'll take you to the dentist instead," said his mother. "I think—I guess I—I'd better go to school after all," rejoined Willie. "The tooth aches, but it doesn't hurt any."—Harper's Round Table.

The indignant father raged and stormed over the dinner. Little Mabel had cried out that she didn't like the meat. "Why, you ought to give thanks," cried the outraged pater. "When I was a boy I delighted in crusts, and never used sugar." The little one thought a moment. "How thankful you must be that you are now living with mamma and me!" she lisped.—Philadelphia Call.

Book Notes.

The Review of Reviews says of W. H. Maple's "No Beginning, or the Fundamental Fallacy": "The old idea of a 'creation out of nothing,' which was taught to a good many of us when we were youngsters, is—to use a familiar expression—'about played out.' Mr. Maple's thesis is very well sustained in so far as it combats that idea. He employs the resources of both logic and scientific discovery in a convincing and common sense way, and ought not to offend the feelings of the most orthodox who is willing to argue honestly." NEW BOOKS BY ROBT G. INGERSOLL

The Field-Ingersoll Discussion. Price, paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

In 1888 the Rev. Dr. Henry M. Field wrote an open letter to Colonel Ingersoll, with the intent to convert him. The letter was published in the North American Review, and was replied to by the person addressed. All our older readers know the value of this discussion. To those who do not remember it we can only say that they should lose no time in procuring a copy if they want a controversial treat.

The Ingersoll-Gladstone Controversy about Christianity. Price, paper, 25 cts; cloth, 50 cts.

When the Field-Ingersoll Controversy closed in the North American Review the Christians felt that their champion had been very badly worsted in argument, and the publishers of the Review engaged the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone to attempt to rehabilitate the Presbyterian creed. He wrote a long letter to Colonel Ingersoll, to which the latter replied at length and, it is generally agreed, completely demolished the greatest controversialist Christianity can produce. These letters are now for the first time available in pamphlet form.

Myth and Miracle. Price, 25c.

This is one of Colonel Ingersoll's best lectures, but never before put into print. Everyone who has heard it will most certainly want it, and those who have not heard it will have a rare treat in its perusal, as something new from the Colonel, which also is something that everybody is looking for.

Which Way? Price, 25 cents.

This lecture is a consideration of the difference between the natural and the supernatural, and some reasons why the former is the best way to go. Perhaps no one of Colonel Ingersoll's orations has won more general applause from enlightened audiences than this. It contains that most magnificent of perorations, his visions—"This was. This is. This shall be." The lecture was never before printed in pamphlet form. It is splendid. Send for it.

SOME PRESS COMMENTS:

We have read some of the passages of the commentary prepared for the "Woman's Bible" by that very accomplished American woman and Biblical student, Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton. They are a great deal more satisfactory than many of the comments upon the same texts that we have read in other and more pretentious commentaries. Mrs. Stanton's interpretative remarks are often shrewd and sensible. —[Editorial New York "Sun."]

If the Revision Committee continue this style of exegesis, we venture to predict that there will be sensations in the religious world such as no mere man of our time, no Cummings, nor Colenso, nor Beecher, nor Briggs, has been able to arouse. —[N. Y. "Press."]

The chapter published from the advance sheets of the "Woman's Bible" last week very naturally created a widespread sensation. The "Woman's Bible" promises to be an important contribution to the literature of Holy Writ. —[N. Y. "Recorder."]

The announcement that the proposed "Woman's Bible" will soon be published has stirred up many of the clergy. The work will be simply a commentary on certain portions of the Bible relating to the status of women. —[N. Y. "Tribune."]

An association of "up to date" women is engaged in making a new translation of the Bible. This is great news. —[Charivari, Paris, France.]

The "Woman's Bible" is a translation by a joint committee of American and English women and is the most serious labor yet undertaken by the women's rights leaders. —[Albany "Evening Journal."]

The Sisterhood of Advanced Women has decided to take a bold step toward the complete emancipation of the sex. It has long groaned under certain implications of servitude contained in a few passages of scripture, and has, therefore, determined to abolish these disabilities by publishing a "Woman's Bible." —[Pall Mall Gazette.]

The most marked step in this iconoclastic direction is the movement to publish the "Women's Bible." It is being prepared by some of the good and advanced women of the day, who are met in their many reforms with the stubborn arguments of some of the passages of the scriptures that tend to justify low ideals. Their aim is to omit the immoral teachings of the Mosaic law and all the unwholesome passages. Expurgated editions of the poets there have been, but it remains for the ingenious new woman to devise an expurgated edition of the Bible. —[Minneapolis "Times."]

The theological world of Chicago is thoroughly stirred by the announcement, published in the Times-Herald this morning, that Elizabeth Cady Stanton and nearly a score of collaborators in the persons of distinguished women, will undertake a revision of those portions of the scriptures dealing directly or indirectly with the relative positions of man and woman, and will publish the result of their labors in a new Bible, which is to be known as "The Woman's Bible." —[Chicago "Post."]

PIANOS, PIANOS!

After years of earnest study and experiments, Mr. Adam Schaaf, of Chicago, one of the oldest and most experienced piano manufacturers of this country, has produced what is believed to be the most perfect Upright Piano ever constructed. The instrument is thus described:

"The volume of tone is fully equal to any of the best Square Grand Pianos, while the quality is of the most exquisite musical character—pure, sympathetic, and in the highest degree pliable. Its durability and its capacity for standing in tune, is unparalleled in the history of piano-making. In a word, this piano is made to stand, not merely as an ornamental piece of furniture (it is finished in the most artistic and handsome style), but as a musical instrument—not for a day, but for a lifetime."

These pianos received the highest honors at the World's Fair; Mr. GEORGE STECK, Judge of Awards, the best living authority on pianos, reporting as follows:

"This exhibit deserves an award for excellent tone quality, sustaining power, well planned scale, and excellent action, with easy, prompt touch. Material and workmanship are superior."

The distinguished Pianist and Composer, SIGNOR FABIANI, of the Paris Conservatory, says:

"I have used the Adam Schaaf Pianos, and have critically studied their merits, compared them with those of the best American and European makers, and I find them unsurpassed for quality and variety of tone, responsiveness of touch, elegance of appearance, and reliability in every way."

Having made special arrangements with the manufacturer, who is our personal friend, to introduce these superb pianos, we are prepared to offer them to TRUTH SEEKER readers at the above marvelously low prices—from $50 to $150 less than dealers ask for inferior instruments. Every piano is warranted for five years, and the purchaser is not required to pay for it until delivered. We will pay the freight to any station within 1,000 miles of Chicago. Full description of instruments sent on application.

If you or any of your friends contemplate buying a piano it will be to your interest to correspond with us.

Gems of Thought.

Of all deceivers who have plagued the world, none are so deeply ruinous to human happiness as those impostors who pretend to lead men by a light above Nature.—Logan Mitchell.

ON the Sunday and every other day every man has a right to do everything except injure others or disturb the general peace. If he is interfered with in that right he is bossed too much.—New York World.

To the mass of the people nothing is so costly as thought. The fact that, taking the world over, ninety-nine people out of a hundred accept the creed to which they were born, exemplifies their mental attitude toward things at large. Nearly all of them pursue mechanically the routine to which they have been accustomed, and are not only blind to its defects, but will not recognize them as defects when they are pointed out. And the reluctance to think which they show everywhere else, is shown in their dealings with children.—Herbert Spencer.

THE teaching of the "Sermon on the Mount" is immoral. "Take no thought for to-morrow, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink, or wherewithal ye shall be clothed." This injunction, so at variance with all economy, prudence, and wisdom, is uttered, not once incidentally, but three times. It constitutes the passport of the indolent tramp, the voucher of the imprevident sponge on society, and the senseless excuse for the beggar. No wonder the mythical Jesus "had not where to lay his head," if he acted as he preached. He did not deserve any.—A. S. Hudson, M.D.

WHAT effect will logic have upon a religious gentleman who firmly believes that a god of infinit compassion sent two bears to tear thirty or forty children to pieces for laughing at a bald-headed prophet? How are such people to be answered? How can they be brought to a sense of their absurdity? They must feel in their flesh the arrows of ridicule. So Voltaire has been called a mocker. What did he mock? He mocked kings that were unjust; kings who cared nothing for the sufferings of their subjects. He mocked the titled fools of his day. He mocked the corruption of courts; the meanness, the tyranny, and the brutality of judges. He mocked the absurd and cruel laws, the barbarous customs. He mocked popes and cardinals and bishops and priests, and all the hypocrites on the earth. He mocked historians who filled their books with lies, and philosophers who defended superstition. He mocked the haters of liberty, the persecutors of their fellowmen. He mocked the arrogance, the cruelty, the impudence, and the unspeakable baseness of his time.—Ingersoll.

NEARLY twenty-two centuries ago, in pitiless mockery, the savage triumphant Brennus, the leader of the marauding Gauls, shrieked out the above words ["Voe Victis"], as he flung his heavy sword into the scale already unduly pressed earthward by the false weights with which it was piled. And the vanquished Romans, with sullen brows and unwilling hands, heaped on the gold coveted by the greedy Gaul. But thousands of years before Brennus spoke or ever the pillaging Gaul began to ravage the nations of Europe, "Woe to the Vanquished!" was the cry heard in every region and corner of the earth. Ever since life showed itself upon the globe, the fierce struggle for existence began, and the ceaseless strife continues to be waged in undiminished violence and fury. Voe Victis! Woe to the vanquished, and for the victors survival, until that time comes (and come it must, sooner or later) when those better fitted for the cruel war of extermination march upon the battle field. The rocks tell the story; tell of the ruthless fighting that has been in the eons of the past. No cry for mercy is ever answered, no quarter is ever given, in the savage battle of life. One generation goes off the scene and another generation comes on; one type of being disappears and another takes its place, but it is ever, "Woe to the Vanquished!" In the rocks we see the monuments of the life that was before us, and we read, "We lived, we fought, we died. We conquered, and others made room for us; we were overcome, and we gave our places to others. So will it be with you!" Their joys, their sorrows; their hopes, their despair; their dreamful, watchful sleep, wearier than our waking hours—all these things are forgotten, unrecorded. All we know is that it was ever "Woe to the Vanquished!" And over all this havoc and misery and incessant warfare, the Christian's Bible teaches that a loving God sits "enthroned above all heights," looking down complacently upon the work of his hands, and deeming it good, and listening enraptured to the song which the morning stars sing together, and whose weird chorus is "Voe Victis!"—Winnipeg, in Secular Thought.

Not for Parsons.

"You are accused of seeking cheap notoriety." "It isn't cheap," protested the Rev. Mr. Howlout; "I have to pay full rates for getting my sermons printed. They won't even give me the usual ministerial discount."—Indianapolis Journal.

This is how a minister introduced a visiting parson to his congregation: "Our brother will now address you. His subject is 'Hell,' of which he has made a special study for years. Indeed, I may say he knows all there is to be known about it, for he seems to have been specially fitted for it."

GILBERT PARKER recently encountered a Canadian bishop whom he had known in his boyhood. The bishop pompously inquired: "Ah, Gilbert! and are you still writing your—ah—little books?" Mr. Parker answered promptly: "Yes, bishop. And are you still preaching your—ah—little sermons?"—Judge.

A METHODIST clergyman had finished reading the scripture lesson in a week-day prayer meeting recently held in a New Jersey village. Looking out over the meager audience, he asked Mr. Smith to start some appropriate song. Mr. Smith thumbed over the leaves of his hymn-book and began in an unknown key: "I love to steal"—This was clearly wrong and the leader stopped to take a fresh hold lower down the register, and again sang out: "I love to steal"—Again he stopped short. He could not get the right pitch. Some of the younger persons present tittered and giggled. Smith's face was red, and the perspiration was beginning to ooze from every pore. Mopping his face, he made one more effort to grasp the proper note, fairly shouting: "I love to steal"—The clergyman with solemn mien arose, and, glancing at the now hopelessly confused Smith, said: "I am very sorry to hear it, brother. Will Mr. Jones kindly lead us in prayer?"

AT THE PEARLY GATE.

Hard by the gate, the turnkey Peter
Sat in his easy chair,
Where he could catch each anthem's meter,
And look down the golden stair;
For to that pearly portal
Great hosts of pilgrims come,
There many a sanctimonious mortal
Sues for a harp and a home.

Well, as he sat in the light of the city,
As he for ages had sat,
Mourning, perchance, with a glimmer of pity,
That daylight so long should grow flat;
Silent a spirit, all battered and gory,
Just from the murderer's hand,
Stood there, a candidate ready for glory,
Fresh from a safe Bible land.

Brought then a cherub a roll of writing
That Peter the turnkey took;
"This," to the spirit in voice affrighting,
He said, "is thy life's long book.
Oft hast thou succored thy helpless neighbor,
And cheered on his way thy friend,
Of purity, truth, and kind love's labor
Full were thy days to their end.

"But Doubt grew strong in Faith's fair garden,
Trust vanished before Research;
Never a prayer came up for pardon,
'Thou never wert seen in church!'
Paused he no moment his sentence to ponder, Tightly the portal he jammed;
"Thy home is the region of darkness yonder, Hasten thee hence and be damned."

Scarce had he gone when a ghastly mortal
Up from this mundane speck
Clambered and stood at the turnkey's portal

With a hangman's rope on his neck.
"No record of thee have we," said Peter;
"Thy life is as hell's black pit"—
(The anthem of heaven waxed sweeter and sweeter—
A parson had counted a hit.)

"But thou, in the day thy life was ending,
Took thought to save thy soul,
And died on the arm of faith depending,
Thy faith hath made thee whole!"
The angel host drew near to meet him,
And welcome to heaven its own;
The elders sage sped forth to seat him
On his burnished golden throne.

Their harp strings rang to a song victorious
For this new-born sun of night;
They sang till the ring on his neck grew glorious,
"Of such is the City of Light."
Oh, be good and true, and doubt, I pray you,
Lest heaven be yours as well;
Through life and death take this to stay you,
You are safer twice over in hell.
—Walt A. Rattoliffe, in Secular Thought.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine].

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator].

Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

SPECIMEN PRESS NOTICES.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

Send us a new subscriber and get the book free of all expense to you. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us $3 and get the book and the paper for one year.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professional naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers: "Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a "story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. SPECIAL NOTICE.—We shall be obliged to our readers if they will send us the name and address of any Freethinker who is not a regular subscriber.

The Christian Statesman and the Christian Reformer, in their current issues, indorse the action of Postmaster-General Caron of Canada in excluding THE TRUTH SEEKER from the mails. This was to be expected, but the editors of these organs of the God-in-the-Constitution party go further and demand the total suppression and stamping-out of THE TRUTH SEEKER, not only by excluding it from the mails, but by prohibiting its publication; and the state and general government are called upon to take measures to that end. We shall attend to these gentlemen next week.

We give in this issue the first installment of a long paper by JOHN PECK, entitled "The Old Story in Plain English. With Notes and Comments." Our readers all know Mr. Peck and know that he writes vigorously and hits hard. It would not be a bad idea for those who have Christian friends amenable to reason to send them a trial subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for three months, to include the issues of the paper containing these articles. It costs but half a dollar.

A Craze That Is Endemic Among Christians.

Our readers have heard of the Holiness people and their camp-meeting at Indian Spring, Georgia, where they prayed that God would interpose to prevent the arrival of an excursion of the Uniform Rank Knights of Pythias, from Macon, a part of whose entertainment at Indian Spring was to be a dance on a large scale at the hotel. The Holiness folks regard dancing as the abomination of abominations. Well, as it happened, the excursion train was wrecked, with disastrous results. The Holiness people accepted this as a direct answer to their prayers. A correspondent of the Macon Telegraph writes from Indian Spring that he heard a young preacher say:

"The railroad authorities are in no way to blame for the accident. Close examination has shown that the track was secure, the machinery perfect, and no mistake of judgment on the part of officials was made. It was God who did it, and did it for a lesson, too. Every dollar taken from the road for wounds will be ill-gotten gain, for the accident was a rebuke to worldliness by the Divine Power."

The correspondent asked another man, "Are you not sorry for the trouble caused by the wreck?" The answer was, "God's will be done, and blessed be his name." The Macon News has an editorial on the subject, under the head, "Are They Crazy?" and it concludes that "They," the Holiness people, are crazy. If they are crazy, then all Christendom was once crazy, for all of Christendom believed, nothing doubting, that God would answer prayer and would send his judgment upon all who disobeyed him and upon the nations whose rulers were wicked. If the Holiness people are crazy, then the National Reform Association is crazy, from private to commander-in-chief, for they hold and proclaim that the financial convulsions, the forest fires, the floods, the drouths, the labor troubles, and all the rest of our afflictions are God's judgments for our national shortcomings, the violation of the Sabbath being particularly provocative of divine vengeance. They further declare that if we do not mend our ways and do on Sunday as the Covenanters want us to do, our nation will be wiped out by the besom of heavenly revenge. The Holiness people at Indian Spring have excited the indignation of their fellow Christians of Georgia because they were so tactless as to say what they believed right among the friends of the injured and the members of the order to which they belonged. It is not always safe to charge God with "judgments" of which your powerful neighbors are the victims, even though those neighbors themselves hold to the abstract principle that he will smite the unrighteous. They feel such specific charges to be impolite reflections on themselves; for of course they are not the unrighteous, and the Holiness folks should have perspicacity enough to know it. In the course of its comments on the incident, the News says:

"We do not wish to argue their peculiar religious views with them, for all people of intelligence, regardless of sect, consider them absurd and disgusting, but we would point out to them the cowardly, contemptible, hideous side of their nature when they attempt by prayer and fasting to make God commit such a crime as the one they charge against him. The inhuman wretch who might draw a spike or place a crosstie on the track would be promptly and rightfully lynched, and yet these holiness cranks would attribute an act equally heinous to a merciful heavenly father. What a frightful, wicked, heartless creature must be the God they worship, and how unworthy the homage of these sanctified souls—the earth's purest and heaven's own; loaned to us but a little while that a few bright rays of holy light might flash from their sacred bodies and shed its benign influence over a benighted world. We recognize the impossibility of caring for all of these imbecils, but the worst of their number should be confined, or else some effort should be made to restrain them and prevent any display of violence."

Now there is nothing "peculiar" about the Holiness people's belief that God will answer prayer and visit his judgments in this world upon the disobedient. Every Christian is bound to believe that prayer is heard and answered and that the lives of the wicked shall be cut short. The only peculiarity of the sect mentioned and of the Covenanters is that they still avow their belief in special judgments, and this is probably because they are not so enlightened or are more sincere than other Christians. It is indeed true that if a man had been caught wrecking the Macon train he would have been lynched, and yet Georgia Christians keep right on worshipping God, but this is because they are illogical. If there is a God who knows everything and does everything, he knowingly wrecked that train, just as surely as if he had answered the prayer of the Holiness people by drawing a spike or placing a crosstie on the track. There is no possible escape from the conclusion. Predicate an infinit God, and you assume that he brings evil as well as good upon the children of men. For other Christians to call their Holiness brethren "imbecils" and demand their confinement because they really believe the Bible, is unfair and unkind.

Christian Brotherly Love.

There is just now much newspaper discussion of the possible dismemberment of the Turkish empire in Europe. The Christian nations are all eager for slices of the land of the sultans. The partition somewhat generally agreed upon by the newspapers is this: Bulgaria will have a part of Macedonia, and Austria a strip through to Salonica. To Greece will go Epirus and the islands of the Egean; France will appropriate Syria, and Russia will absorb Armenia. Italy will take Tripoli. The Sultan is to be retired to Asia Minor, having for his capital Broussa or Konieh. Some of the editorial prophets think that Constantinople will be a free city, while others are convinced that it will be assigned to some weak power, presumably Bulgaria. The Bosphorus and Dardanelles, it is assumed, will be made free to all nations, through international agreement. All this seems easy enough on paper, but, as the New York Times pertinently remarks, the business is not settled yet and is not likely to be soon. There are many difficulties to be surmounted first, such as the control of the lines of railway extension from the Mediterranean to the Persian Gulf, Russian communication with the Indian Ocean, the control of the Kurds, a new Arab caliphate, and the possession of Jerusalem. All these are delicate and important diplomatic questions, but the one of greatest present moment and interest is the occupancy of Jerusalem. In this connection the Times says:

"Ever since the final conquest of the Holy Places by the Turks there has been the keenest strife between the different Christian churches in Europe and Asia for the strongest influence at Jerusalem. One result has been the establishment of communities of monks and priests of the Latin, Greek, and Armenian churches, as well as of the Copts, Jacobites, and others. These have derived their income chiefly from the throngs of pilgrims, and hence any place or position that might prove attractive to the superstitious peasants has been eagerly sought and often fought for by the royal hierarchies. The contests arising in connection with the Easter ceremonies, which have risen to such a pitch as to require the presence of Turkish troops to keep order in the Holy Sepulcher, have long been a scandal to Christendom and an object of the most supreme contempt to Islam. A modus vivendi has indeed been arranged, and Greeks, Roman Catholics, Armenians, and others are somewhat held in check, but it is still true that the jealousies and rivalries continue, and are as intense as ever, if less obtrusive. Any advantage gained by one becomes immediately a source of vexation to the others, and it not infrequently is the case that the various embassies at Constantinople and the courts of Europe find some of their most difficult questions arising from the petty squabbles of priests over some newly discovered relic."

The sword that Jesus came to bring, as he is reported to have declared, has never been sheathed through all the Christian centuries. The Times says that "one of the most potent influences which led to the Crimean war" was a disturbance raised by the quarrels of Roman Catholic and Greek priests at Jerusalem. Such quarrels and disturbances are chronic manifestations of Christian love. "So long as the ruling power is alien or non-Christian," continues the Times, these troubles can usually be settled. "It is, however, scarcely possible for any one of the churches interested to permit a rival to gain the supreme advantage." Hence the present dilemma. Palestine geographically belongs to Syria, and in Syria France has claimed since 1860 to have a prior right as against the other Christian nations. It is asserted that the popes have long anticipated the coming of the time when French rule would give them the control of the "holy places." France has much influence in Aleppo and Mosul, and both places are centers of Roman Catholic activity. On the other side is seen Russia, jealous of the extension of the Latin power. The Russian peasantry and priesthood, slavishly submissive under the grossest political and social tyrannies, are yet almost sure to make trouble if to Rome is given the city of Solomon. The Times quotes a gentleman said to be thoroughly acquainted with the situation who declares that "were the czar to permit France and the Roman Catholic church to get control of Jerusalem, his people would tear him from his throne." This religious jealousy and hatred may seriously affect the stability of the Franco-Russian alliance. So far as the return of the Jews to Jerusalem may be thought of as a possible solution of the problem, it is generally conceded that Russia would rather leave the Turk in possession, such is the bitterness of Christian feeling against the countrymen of the Christians' "savior."

"Peace on earth and good will to men" certainly did not accompany the advent of Christianity, and it is fortunate indeed for the world that Christians have spent and continue to spend so much of their strength in fighting each other. Their quarrelsomeness and their vindictive intolerance would else have crushed out the last vestige of human liberty and justice. May their internecine bickerings multiply and hold their attention in part until they become civilized enough to respect the rights of their neighbors.

The Silversmiths of Canada.

"Sirs, ye know that by this craft we have our wealth. Moreover, ye see and hear that, not alone at Montreal, but almost throughout all Canada, THE TRUTH SEEKER hath persuaded and turned away much people saying that they be no gods, which are made with hands and minds; so that not only this our craft is in danger to be set at naught, but also that the temple of the great goddess Ste. Anne de Beaupre should be despised, and her magnificence should be destroyed, whom all Canada and the world worshipeth. And when they heard these sayings, they were full of wrath, and cried out, saying, Great is Ste. Anne de Beaupre of the Canadians."

According to the story in the nineteenth chapter of Acts, when Paul and his companions came to Ephesus and preached that the images made by men were not gods, one Demetrius, a silversmith, who made silver shrines for the temple of Diana, and to whom and his fellow craftsmen the worship of Diana thus brought "no small gain," called together the "workmen of like occupation" and harangued them in the manner set forth in the foregoing quotation. The situations at Ephesus and in Canada differ chiefly as regards the names of deities and places. The Ephesian craftsmen, like those of Canada in a later age, at once set about suppressing the miserable iconoclasts, the heartless villains who had the audacity to preach a doctrine that might reduce the revenues of the image-makers. They seized Gaius and Aristarchus, the companions of Paul, and rushed with them to the theater. "And the whole city was filled with confusion; . . .

Some therefore cried one thing, and some another; for the assembly was confused; and the more part knew not wherefore they were come together." So it is in Canada to-day; the majority of the people do not understand why THE TRUTH SEEKER is shut out of the mails; some say that it is blasphemous, others that it is indecent, others that it is scurrilous, and others approve the exclusion simply because it is excluded. The silversmiths, the priests, alone know why Caron has issued his edict; they alone know what they want and how to get it; it is their craft that is threatened, their wealth-getting that is in danger, their soft places that are jeopardized. They are the true successors of the silversmiths of Ephesus, who of all in that surging mob imprecating Paul and his fellow-preachers knew what the trouble was and what they were after. The reader of this will the better perceive the exact parallelism of the two events when he reads the stories of the thronging pilgrims and the "miracle cures" at the shrines of Ste. Anne de Beaupre and St. Donat de Montcalm, which stories he will find on page 665, following the vindictive fulminations of the True Witness and the Representative. There is too much money for the church in the shrine industry and related enterprises for the priests to sit quiet while THE TRUTH SEEKER disperses the fogs of ignorance and superstition in the darkness of which only it is possible for such industries to be profitably conducted. "Sirs, ye know that by this craft we have our wealth." Such an argument is absolutely irresistible when addressed to priests and their lay henchmen who have no comprehension of or respect for liberty of thought and freedom of expression. This fully explains Caron's despotic order.

To return to the scene in Ephesus: "And Alexander beckoned with the hand, and would have made his defense unto the people. But when they knew that he was a Jew, all with one voice about the space of two hours cried out, Great is Diana of the Ephesians." So when THE TRUTH SEEKER and its friends and the friends of a free press and free mails would make their defense, the whole mob of priests and their dupes, Catholic and Protestant together, led by the True Witness, the Providence Journal, the Christian Statesman, and the Christian Reformer, recognizing in the pleaders for fair play the hated Freethinkers, lift their voices in a frenzied and interminable chorus of "Great is the god and great are the saints of the Christians; down with the heretics; shut that blasphemous paper out of the mails; forbid it to be printed; imprison the editor and the artist; set up the Inquisition once more, for our craft is in danger."

It is complained that THE TRUTH SEEKER is "scurrilous" and "disgusting" in its letter-press and illustrations. The True Witness and Catholic Chronicle professes to be surprised that we should doubt the alleged fact of our own scurrility. It is much to be regretted that the paper with the long name did not see fit to set us a better example; it should have given us an object lesson in the amenities of journalism; as a supposedly obedient disciple of "the Lord" it was its duty to turn the left cheek to us for a blow after we had smitten it upon the right, instead of striking back so viciously. In connection with our paper we find such choice expressions as these: "Abominations"; "diabolical publication"; "boorish ignorance"; "blasphemous language"; "criminal sheet"; "miserable and vulgar representation"; "infernal piece of villainy"; "audacity"; "insolent and false"; "abominable depths"; "mind that is entirely perverted." If the postmaster-general of Canada were a fair-minded man and desired to impartially enforce the provision of the Post-office act that denies the privilege of the mails to "scurrilous" sheets, the True Witness and Catholic Chronicle would now be going to its subscribers by express, charges prepaid. Denunciation following persistence in unfounded statements after those statements have been disproved by fair presentation of the facts and by honest argument, is one thing, but denunciation and vituperation wholly unaccompanied by any marshaling of facts or alignment of arguments is quite another. THE TRUTH SEEKER has argued against the unreasonable dogmas of the Christian creed, it has denounced the intolerance and cruelties of the Christian church, and it has laughed at the frauds and fables of the Christian priest. If the postmaster-general of Canada and his newspaper and pulpit backers are able to show that our arguments are fallacious, that our denunciations are based upon misapprehensions or misrepresentations of history, that the alleged frauds are not frauds, that the asserted fables are historically and scientifically true, why do they not do it? There is no law denying them the right to the freest expression; they lack neither money nor trained apologists. Is not the attempted suppression of THE TRUTH SEEKER by an unjust law a full confession that they are unable to answer our arguments, that they cannot deny nor explain away the facts we present, and that the more light that is thrown upon the frauds and fables the more fraudulent and fabulous they appear?

The Mt. Forest Representative does not beat around the bush in the least; it does not pretend that this paper is "scurrilous" or "disgusting"; it frankly approves its exclusion from the mails because it is an infidel journal, because it is, as is asserted, "a blasphemous sheet," "one of Satan's agencies for disseminating doubt." We should judge that the editor of the Representative is either a Catholic or a Presbyterian; which, it would be difficult to determine from the sample we have of his method of disputation. When talking about THE TRUTH SEEKER the representatives of these two churches use language so strikingly similar that unless we can see the label, we are at a loss to properly classify our critic. It is a pretty archaic orthodoxy that, in this age of the Higher Criticism and increasing enlightenment, talks of "Satan" and his wiles. Even where the belief in a personal devil yet lingers most Christians are a little reluctant to express their faith in his majesty, but the Negro camp-meeting exhorter, the Covenanter, and the Canadian Catholic have, equally with the Irish witch-burners, the courage of their ignorance. It is not strange, therefore, that the True Witness and Mt. Forest Representative join with the organs of the God-in-the-Constitution party in the United States in the clamor for the extermination of Freethought papers. It is not remarkable that they are foolish enough to set a fire that, with a turn of the wind, would sweep into their own temples and sanctums. They are so blinded by prejudice born of their intellectual limitations that they cannot see that the freedom of the press must be maintained or the minority of each hour is at the absolute mercy of the majority of that hour. They are so sure that they are the custodians of the decrees of heaven that they are ready to precipitate upon the country all the horrors of religious persecution. They are so confident of the power of truth that they dare not trust what they call the truth in a free and open encounter with what they denominate the falsehoods of Satan. Untaught by the mistakes of the past, uninfluenced by the progressive impulses and hopes of the present, they look longingly back to the ages of Christian darkness when the new thought was the only warrant needed to stretch the thinker on the rack or chain him to the stake.

The Sunday Question the Real Issue.

Our Episcopal brother, Dr. Huntington, of Grace church, has come to the conclusion that the present issue in New York is not primarily either the enforcement of law "as law," nor the suppression of the liquor traffic. Hear him:

"No. The question really at the fore is the Sunday question. An attack is making upon the immunities of the weekly rest as those immunities have been defined by usage and by law. It so happens that in this particular case the hostile movement has sprung up in the quarter known as 'the liquor interest,' and that is what is confusing people's minds, but there are other points from which the assault might just as naturally come."

"The question really at the fore is the Sunday question"! So THE TRUTH SEEKER has persistently maintained, despite misapprehension, apathy, and denunciation. "Rest" has been dragged in to seduce the "laborer"; "temperance" has been dragged in to lead astray the friends of moderation and abstinence; "morality" has been dragged in to befool the lovers of purity, and "respect for law as law" has been dragged in to deceive those who might escape the other snares. But the fight is really over the claim of the church to determine for men and women how they shall employ one seventh of their time. We are grateful to Dr. Huntington for pulling down the mask in the sight of the people. Sabbath laws are not needed to secure for the wage-worker a period of rest. They are not needed to promote the cause of temperance. They are not required nor are they other than hurtful when employed ostensibly to promote morality. Their enactment and enforcement serve only to make "the law" an object of contempt and hatred. Their one purpose and use is the glorification and enrichment of the church. The side issues cunningly brought in are what are "confusing the people's minds," as Dr. Huntington incautiously admits.

"Dr. Huntington said the points he proposed making were that Sunday observance was no mere specialty of the Hebrew code, or the survival of discredited Puritanism, but was an essential and permanent feature of Christian morality. The people of New York are living under Christian morality. Therefore, legislation which infringes upon the weekly rest should emanate only from the body with which sovereignty is lodged, and never become subject to a purely municipal control, or what is popularly known as 'local option.'"

Which means that, while we have a majority of Christians, we are to be forced to observe Sunday regardless of our opinions concerning sacred days and also regardless of the constitutional guarantees of religious liberty. It means that he, a Christian clergyman, discards the authority of the Bible and takes the holy day of the Catholic church for his Sabbath. It means that he identifies "Christian morality" and the decrees of Catholic emperors and councils. It means that he holds that the people of New York are in duty bound to obey these decrees of Catholic authorities rather than the laws framed in harmony with the Constitution of the Republic. He totally ignores the fact that the weekly holy day is of lunar origin, and that the week has varied in length from four to ten days. If we are to be compelled to observe Sunday because we "are living under Christian morality," what becomes of the pretext that Sunday laws are designed as a secular protection of the secular rights and needs of the laborer? Finally, let no Freethinker or wage-worker fail to note that Dr. Huntington calls all legislation that permits Sunday work and recreation an infringement upon "the weekly rest," thus insinuating that the modification or repeal of our Sunday statutes would be an invasion of citizen rights, a complete inversion of the truth.

Dr. Huntington says that the people of this state are "living under Christian morality," therefore the legislature alone should have the power to liberalize the Sunday statutes; the city government should never be permitted to make such alterations. What a non sequitur! It is impossible for a reasonable person to see any logical connection between Dr. Huntington's premises and his conclusion.

The people of the state of New York are living under Christian morality.

The people of the city of New York are included in the people of the state of New York.

Therefore the people of the state of New York cannot grant to the people of the city of New York local self-government as regards the observance of Sunday.

Why not? If they can grant to the cities local self-government in some things, why not in the matter of Sunday laws? What has the alleged living under Christian morality to do with it? But it goes without saying that if the relative attitudes of the two jurisdictions were reversed, if it were firmly believed that the large cities of the state would enact more stringent Sunday laws, while the state outside the cities was known to be averse to such laws and to have a probable majority in the legislature, it would not take Sunday worshipers five minutes to find any number of sound reasons in favor of local self-government for the cities.

"If this precious franchise be of God, man cannot annul it. If this protected circle was really scored by the finger of the Almighty, no temporary madness of the people can permanently efface it."

"If this precious franchise be of God," what right has the church to enforce it by the arm of the civil law under a constitution that decrees the eternal separation of church and state? The belief that Sunday is a "franchise from God" is a religious dogma and as such cannot be legislated upon by a secular state.

Colonel Ingersoll's Speech on the "Declaration of Independence" and His "Vision of War."

For many months this speech has been out of print and unobtainable. By permission of the Colonel and his publisher we have now put it into a neat pamphlet, with fancy colored cover, and a portrait of the speaker. We have included also the "Vision of War," which many have desired to have in compact and cheap form to hand to friends. The price of the pamphlet is ten cents. The "Declaration of Independence" is the centennial oration delivered July 4, 1876, at Peoria, Ill., and the "Vision of War" is an extract from a speech delivered at the soldiers' reunion at Indianapolis, in September of the same year, beginning, "The past rises before me like a dream."

A Successful Skirmish.

In our account of the contest in the Central Labor Union over the question of hand-raising in the installation of officers, we said that Mr. James McGill, the Freethinking delegate of the Plasterers' Union, had ignored the pious custom when presiding officer of that Union. It was when he was presiding officer of the Building Trades Section of the Central Labor Union that Mr. McGill dispensed with the religious flummery mentioned. In other respects our narrative was strictly correct. Now we have the pleasure of announcing that at the meeting of the Central Labor Union last Sunday Mr. McGill was duly installed as an officer of the Union with "his hands in his pockets," as the World puts it. There was sharp debate over the question. The Mercury tells the story in a few words:

"Delegate Hoadley, who was chairman of the meeting, ruled that the matter had been settled by previous action and that the delegate should be pledged. Mr. Lloyd, of the Tin and Sheetiron Workers, appealed from decision of the chair. Delegate Hoadley stated that his decision was based on the simple fact that the constitution of the Central Labor Union does not require any such action from the delegates unless they choose to hold up their hand. The delegates sustained the chair by a very close vote, and the matter was settled finally by Mr. McGill being pledged as a member of the grievance committee."

The attendance was small and the vote sustaining the chair was 13 to 12. Had there been a fuller meeting the vote in favor of the purely non-religious affirmation would have been more than proportionally larger. The religious element is very bitter over its defeat. James McGill has done a good work; he has established the fact that the Freethinker has the same rights in the Central Labor Union that are possessed by Christians, and he has helped make more general the knowledge that the law of the state, no more than the law of the Central Labor Union, requires any religious acknowledgment from witnesses, jurors, and officials. One can affirm or swear, as he chooses, and he is not required to lay his hand on the Bible or lift it toward the sky.

"Men never were and never will be on a universal footing of equality in the social scale. The reason is obvious. Men are not born with the same intellectual or physical qualities. Some come into the world possessed of minds with great intellectual capacity, while others are born almost into insanity. Some are created with bodies that will develop unusual physical strength; others, again, are weak and puny from birth. Thus it may be seen that some men, endowed at the outset of their experience with superior mental and physical qualities, are destined to succeed in a greater measure than their less fortunate fellows."—Archbishop Janssens, New Orleans.

This is all very obvious, but it should be equally obvious, even to Archbishop Janssens himself, that the fact is an unanswerable objection to the doctrine of divine providence. If there exists an irremediable inequality in the capacities and consequent conditions of men, it inevitably follows, if Theism be true, that God designed that this inequality should exist, and hence it is folly to pray to him to undo his own work, even to the slight extent of making lighter the burden of some particularly pious saint. On the other hand, the naturalist sees in this inequality, not the unalterable fiat of a god, but the result of different conditions of growth, and he knows from history, observation, and personal experience that it is possible to greatly soften the fierceness of the struggle for existence and happiness. For him, there is always hope of improvement; for the logical Theist, there is none. What God has willed will be. Election and predestination are the unescapable corollaries of the God idea.

"Foreign customs have no claim to consideration on American soil. It is a pretty piece of presumption for the foreigner to tell the American people what customs shall prevail and how the American Sunday is to be regulated. The sentiment of the American people is able to regulate its customs and fashion its own laws for Sunday observance, while the foreigner has no right to dictate to the American people on either their customs or laws. When the foreigner despises the American life and endeavors to thrust upon us the odious social customs of the land from which he fled, it is time to rise in revolt against this insolence."—Rev. Father Cleary.

Reverend Father, about how many generations of your ancestors were "Americans"? And will you kindly inform us how Sunday comes to be a holy day for Americans? Did the Catholic church originate in America? We all know that it did not and that Sunday is the holy day of that church. The "Sabbath," then, as accepted by American Christianity to-day, is a foreign institution, and as it is such no appeal for it can be made to us on the ground of patriotism. And, Father Cleary, do you suppose that we are all so dull as to forget that, so far as your church is concerned, it is still foreign; that you get all your orders from a foreigner, and that, consequently, you are helping "to thrust upon us" the customs and beliefs of a foreign society—the Latin church? But more than this in regard to the Sabbath laws: Naturalized laymen of foreign birth have equal citizen rights with naturalized and native-born priests, and they, equally with native laymen, may well resent the impudence of priests of all kinds who dare presume to say how the citizen may spend Sunday. The "insolence" is all your own, Sir Priest, yours and your allies'. You have the effrontery to tell Americans that they must keep holy the Sabbath of an Asiatic and Southern European church; that they must trample their own Constitution and deny liberty in order that that church may dictate to them what they may do on the priests' day. The American people are under no more obligation to respect your Sabbath than they are to celebrate the birthday of the Queen of England or the anniversary of the battle of Sedan.

A High-Handed Outrage.

From the Progressive Thinker.

THE TRUTH SEEKER, of New York, a leading Free-thought paper, has been prohibited from passing through the mails in Canada. It is well known that Canada is oppressed by the papish priesthood, and the various churches there are living under conditions that afflicted the sixteenth century. Such an outrage would not be tolerated in this country for a single moment.

Brother Mendum's Perspicacity.

From the Boston Investigator.

We see that the New York TRUTH SEEKER has been excluded from the mails of Canada by the post-office authorities of that country on the grounds that it is a blasphemous publication;—

That this is no more than could reasonably be expected of a Catholic postmaster-general such as now occupies that position in Canada;—

That we hope that our contemporary will test the legality of this action of the post-office department of Canada, in order to ascertain whether or not the freedom of the press is to be preserved in that dominion;—

That this action on the part of the Canadian government is outrageous; and we sympathize with our esteemed contemporary in its struggles for its natural rights.

An Empty Boast.

From the St. Catharines News.

One of the boasts of Canada is that it is a land in which civil and religious liberty is enjoyed to the fullest extent. It is an empty boast, however.

If religious liberty is to be enjoyed, let it be to the full. A man is the guardian of his own conscience, and no one has the right to dictate to him what he shall believe. There are some subscribers in St. Catharines to a paper published in New York called THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is devoted to certain lines of thought which may not be orthodox, in the common sense, and particularly so as regards the Roman Catholic church. These subscribers have been informed by the postmaster here that he has received instructions from Postmaster-General Caron at Ottawa not to deliver their papers. It would be interesting to know on what grounds such action is taken. At the same time there can be found on the shelves of most of the book-stores in Canada any of the works of noted Infidel writers or religious controversialists, and they are freely sold. Some of them are even to be found in the public libraries. Why is a distinction made?

Call for the Annual Congress.

TO BE HELD IN HARDMAN HALL, NINETEENTH ST. AND FIFTH AVE., NEW YORK, OCTOBER 25, 26, 27.

To the Liberals of America, Members of the Freethought Federation and Secular Union, and all Societies organized for the Purpose of maintaining a purely Secular Government:

It is of great importance that Freethinkers should combine. It is of more importance now than at any previous period, for there is more work to do and the work cannot be done by isolated effort. There are vast ecclesiastical combinations organized for the express purpose of overthrowing Freethought, and also of uniting church and state in a more dangerous form than ever before. These questions immediately confront us:

The Taxation of Church Property,
The Bible in the Public Schools,
The Sabbath Laws, and
The Liberty of the Press.

Property to the value of a billion of dollars is exempt from taxation in the American Republic, in many places religious exercises in the public schools are on the increase, and the very foundation of universal education is being destroyed. The conflict in regard to Sabbath laws is now waged both in the states and in the national Congress, and a centralized political power is being established for the purpose of aggrandizing the authority of the church in civil matters; and honest Freethinkers are imprisoned to-day for discussing questions of the utmost importance to human improvement. Against these flagrant and ever accumulating acts of injustice we must unitedly contend. Freethinkers throughout the Union, in every state, county, city, and village, should be in active communication, and ready to meet at any point the encroachments of the church. It is often the case that a Freethinker is alone in his community in the open support of Liberal thought and principles, and for this reason suffers persecutions. Religious bigots assume that they can trample upon the Freethinker's rights with impunity on account of their own vast majority.

When it is well understood that the Freethinkers of this country are joined together and will defend one another at all hazards, the rights of Freethought will be respected and the individual Freethinker will have the power of numbers to support his cause. The theologian is naturally a coward. He persecutes only the minority. He does not trust in God unless God has a big majority. When the theologian realizes that the Freethinker is not a solitary unit, but the representative of a great force, he will not only cease his persecutions, but even welcome him to social equality. A theologian is very considerate towards a powerful party, however much he despises the humble citizen.

There is a great contest before us. We must be an organized party or submit to defeat and ostracism. We cannot fold our hands and do nothing. We must become an intellectual, social, moral, and political power through a generous and permanent comradeship. We can do this only by public meetings, congresses, associations, and a Freethought press. We must use the same instrumentalities that are constantly used by the churches. They have their great gatherings, their synods, their councils, their conventions, and in this way the churches create an immense enthusiasm and exercise a more potent sway. These are human, practical, and far-reaching means, and Freethought must avail itself of such necessary aids.

All, therefore, are urged to come together at the National Congress of the American Secular Union and the Freethought Federation of America, to be held in New York, October 25th, 26th, and 27th, 1895.

It is hoped that there will be a large attendance, and that measures of co-operation, greater advance and usefulness will be adopted and cordially carried out by friends of freedom throughout the country.

The members of the American Secular Union are notified that such amendments to the Constitution will be proposed at the coming Congress as will enable the Union to consolidate with the Freethought Federation of America.

The members of the Freethought Federation are also notified that changes of the same nature will be proposed for its Constitution in order that it may unite as an organized body with the American Secular Union.

It is the general desire that there be one grand national organization adapted to all the needs of the present and future work. Without doubt this will be determined in a wise, conciliatory, and progressive spirit. Let us close our ranks and meet the common enemy, the bigots of the Christian church. We work for the future; we work for humanity; we work for the best interests of civilization, for the liberty and the progress of all. Let us stand bravely by our colors and unite in the common cause. There are vast and profound principles which should harmonize superficial differences. We have no creed to support, but always and everywhere the rights of man. This is the mighty battle ground. Let us rally now as never before, with earnest convictions, courage, and enthusiasm. We cannot evade the issue, neither can the church itself. It is liberty or it is slavery. This is the conflict of the ages, and in the American Republic all that is most precious and ennobling is at stake.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, President.

The Cause in Oregon.

The Seventh Annual Convention of the Oregon State Secular Union was held at Portland, Oregon, Sept. 20, 21, 22, 23, 1895.

The time was unpropitious, preventing very large attendance, but a large amount of business was most satisfactorily dispatched. Long speeches were prohibited; yet all had fullest liberty to present their views, and while each made earnest defense of his opinions and wishes, all, without exception, cheerfully acquiesced in the decisions of the majority. The sessions were prolonged over Monday, making four days, and the most perfect harmony prevailed throughout. In all particulars the convention was a grand success.

Mr. Chas. Hagner, president of the Portland Secular Church, opened the convention with a cordial welcome to the Oregon State Secular Union, which was responded to by good Father W. W. Jesse, president of the Union, in an able and intensely interesting speech.

Among the most important business transacted was the indorsement of the work done by the committee on Lesson Leaves and Sunday-school work the past four months; the committee was re-appointed with the addition of Mr. Pearl Geer, of Silverton, the young superintendent of the Silverton Secular Sunday-school, and now consists of C. B. Reynolds, Miss Nettie A. Olds, and Pearl W. Geer.

Provision was made so that the Lesson Leaves will be printed quarterly, and sent to the superintendents, who can distribute the lessons each week. An explanatory, or key lesson sheet, will be furnished, so that teachers can the more readily conduct the lesson. The carrying out of the plans formulated and approved will necessitate funds. Will all good and true Liberals, who have the Secular Sunday-school work at heart, "take due notice and govern themselves accordingly?" Remit at once to C. B. Reynolds, treasurer, 620 Seventh st., Portland, Or.

The executive committee was instructed to authorize suitable persons to solicit subscriptions to stock and scholarships in the Secular University. This movement is of the utmost importance, since very many who are willing and anxious to fit themselves for lecturers and Secular Sunday-school teachers and superintendents are educationally deficient in some one or more studies. It is to be hoped some of our wealthy friends will contribute to an educational fund for the purpose of helping the worthy and suitable workers in obtaining the necessary education in any branches they lack to make them efficient workers, until the university can be built and endowed.

The much vexed question as to requirements for membership in the Oregon State Secular Union was, after very full and earnest debate, harmoniously and positively settled. Henceforth all contributing members to Secular Churches, Sunday-schools, or other auxiliary societies are, by such membership, constituted members of the Oregon State Secular Union. All others can become members by paying the sum of fifty cents per annum in advance. A per capita tax of five cents per quarter is to be paid to the Oregon State Secular Union on each contributing member of subordinate organizations.

A committee consisting of C. B. Reynolds, Geo. Bailey, and Nettie A. Olds was appointed to draft constitution and by-laws for the Secular Co-operative Insurance Society, with instructions to report to the executive committee of the Union, who were especially urged to expedite the inauguration of said society.

A bill for the amount expended for supplies for Lesson Leaves issued during the past four months was met by prompt contributions of those present, and all pledged themselves on return to their several homes to at once make special effort to secure contributions to continue the Sunday Lesson Leaves, etc., and to remit at earliest moment to the treasurer of the Union, so there might be no break or delay in sending out Lesson Leaves and preparing the quarterly series for speedy issue.

It was ordered that the deed conveying the ten acres for camp meeting grounds at New Era be recorded. There being a very general desire to hold five or six weeks' Secular camp-meeting at the New Era ground next summer, a committee was appointed to examine the condition of the building thereon. The necessary work can be done very cheaply if done at once. Contributions for this purpose are solicited so that the amount already expended may not be lost and the building go to destruction when a very small expenditure will make it a desirable and valuable property.

The officers for the ensuing year are:

President, W. W. Jesse, of Portland.
First Vice-President, Nettie A. Olds, of Portland;
Second, B. F. Hyland, of Corvallis; Third, Mrs. J. E. Hosmer, of Tillamook; Fourth, C. E. Reynolds, of Tillamook.

Secretary, Pearl W. Geer, of Silverton.

Treasurer, C. B. Reynolds, of Portland.

The public entertainment given at Turn Hall on Friday evening was one of the most memorable of the convention, it being a public demonstration of the practical benefits of local organization. Almost the entire program of music and recitation was furnished by the Secular Sunday-school children, showing the results of the labors of Miss Nettie A. Olds in developing the musical and elocutionary abilities of the children. The exhibition gained the hearty applause and encomiums of the audience. The Convention Ball, given by the Ladies' Auxiliary at Labor Council Hall on Saturday evening, was a social triumph and reflected great credit on all concerned. All the committees were composed exclusively of ladies of the Auxiliary, and their duties were discharged with a grace and fidelity that resulted in every one present having one of the most enjoyable evenings of their lives. Our venerable friend, A. K. Olds, of McMinnville, inspired by the geniality of the surroundings—although he has passed his eighty-fifth birthday—was induced to show the young fellows how the beaux cut the "pigeon wing" half a century ago. The grace and agility he displayed stirred the envy of the young men.

The interest of the convention centered in the exhibition of the Secular Sunday-school work, at Turn Hall, on Sunday at 10 A. M., under the personal direction of Miss Nettie A. Olds. It is the Secular Sunday-school work that has given the great impetus to the cause of Secularism in the state of Oregon. The regular course of the Secular Sunday-school was gone through with—the opening songs, the recital in concert of the opening poem, reading of the minutes of last Sunday meeting, formation of classes, lessons and review, calisthenic drill, and flag march. The exercises closed by singing "March Away to Freedom," and remarks by visiting members. Sunday night, at Turn Hall, a crowded house testified their appreciation of the histrionic ability of the Portland Dramatic club, an auxiliary of the Portland Secular Church. At the convention, Mr. J. E. and Mrs. M. B. Hosmer, of Tillamook, announced their desire to devote themselves to the Secular Sunday-school work, and received credentials as lecturers of the Oregon State Secular Union. Resolutions were passed indorsing the action of Assessor Captain Greenleaf for his endeavors to have church property, heretofore illegally omitted from the assessment roll, pay its just taxation.

C. B. REYNOLDS,
Treas. Oregon State Secular Union, 620 7th street, Portland, Or.

The Weekly Union, Catholic, of this city, says that it is in a position to know that at least 30,000 voters of the Catholic church societies and Irish-American associations will be certain to vote against Tammany this year if to vote for Tammany means to raise the Sunday embargo now resting on the city. A few weeks ago we indicated the change of front of the Catholic church, showing that it was preparing to become as determined an opponent of Tammany as it had hitherto been its devoted friend and supporter, and that there was in fact an alliance of the Catholics and the Protestants in the interest of Sabbatarianism. The statements of the Weekly Union are confirmatory—though this confirmation was not needed—of the conclusion we had reached from a careful examination of the evidence then at hand.

The Old Story in Plain English, with Notes and Comments.

The popular opinion in regard to God I believe to be erroneous. It is believed that he is the source of all good, and that every blessing comes directly or indirectly from his hand; that he is kind and merciful—that he has a tender regard for his children, and is more indulgent than an earthly parent can be; that he is clothed with almighty power and infinit knowledge, and knew from the beginning everything that would occur, even to the last tick of time; that he planned from the first everything that would take place, from the falling of a sparrow to the most stupendous operations of nature.

It is believed that he provides the seed-time and brings forth the harvest; that we are indebted to him for the sunshine and the rains and dews which fall from heaven; that there is nothing which the eye can behold or the imagination conceive, which is not the work of his hands. Such are the lessons taught by the church, and from such teaching all must infer that God is good. But if only the good deeds of men were recorded, even the worst men would appear good, for bad men perform many good acts.

With the idea in the mind that God is the author of all things, let us consider conditions as we actually find them here.

Clothed with almighty power and infinit wisdom, he might have provided for us unalloyed happiness; instead of which we are subject to disease and death, our bodies tormented with aches and pains, and in many instances our friends cannot administer to our wants without being in danger of contracting the disease. Every one might have been endowed with a love and regard for his fellowman which would have prompted him to work for the good of all and find delight in promoting the general welfare; instead of which he is filled with hatred and revenge, and enslaves, persecutes, imprisons, cheats, robs, and defrauds, and wages cruel wars, and lays his brother's country waste, and puts to death defenseless women and helpless children who never gave offense to any.

Then we have cancers which eat away our lives by inches—consumption which wastes us away by slow degrees. Some are born deformed and idiotic. Others are placed, by circumstances beyond their control, where they die of starvation. Some die in disasters which no human foresight could prevent. Epidemics depopulate whole cities and countries, and leave only desolation in their track. Lions, tigers, and panthers, and the whole carnivorous family, can live only by preying upon the lives of other animals.

There are birds which can live only on insects, and whose lives must cease when they cease to take the lives of other sentient creatures. The hawk family can live only on other birds and small animals. Many kinds of fishes whose lives depend upon the slaughter of other fishes and animals. Insects which devour other insects—insects which worry and torment and poison larger animals. Rattlesnakes and cobras, tarantulas, centipedes, scorpions, which bite and sting us and hold us in terror and dread. Volcanoes belching forth fire and destruction, and engulfing whole cities. Earthquakes, which destroy the habitations of men, and disrupt and change the physical conditions of entire countries. Drouths follow floods, and floods succeed drouths. Thousands die of famine produced by drouths, and other thousands are swept away by floods. Poisonous herbs and weeds choke out the grain and vegetation upon which we subsist, and insects destroy the grain, root and kernel, and others sting and annoy us.

Thus we find that there is a constant war of the elements—war among animals—they tear and worry and devour each other.

So, taking into consideration all the animals on the earth, man included, the sages have come to inquire whether there is not as much suffering and misery as there is happiness and enjoyment.

With these facts in view, what must be thought of the teaching of the church that God is the author of all things and that he is only good?

Then, after passing through this life with all of its sorrows and afflictions, its losses and bereavements, God has brought a devil into existence to tempt and lure us to commit evil deeds and then torment us in hell forever. Is it reasonable to believe that a God clothed with almighty power and infinit wisdom, and full of mercy, would inaugurate such a system? If God had the wisdom to see and the power to execute, he cannot be regarded as good.

Is a God worthy of our adoration who caused so much suffering when he had the power to make all beings happy? If God is the author of all things, and if everything was brought into existence by the fiat of his power, and if he is the author of all good, so must he be the author of all evil.

Now, if this being is unchangeable, can his purposes be changed by prayer? If he planned everything from the beginning, and everything must take place just as he planned it, can he do something different without changing? If God is unchangeable he must be deaf to our entreaties. He can pay no more attention to our petitions than he would to the growl of a tiger.

And the idea that he has doomed one of his creatures to enjoy the happiness of heaven, and another to endure the torments of hell, is horrible. If he ever brought one human being into existence knowing that he would be consigned to everlasting torment, he is a monster.

How does a place of everlasting torment comport with the idea of a merciful God who had the power to bestow happiness upon all? It is claimed that a certain few will be ultimately wafted to a place of eternal bliss. But why wait until after death; why not make us as happy here as hereafter, and why should this blissful abode be reserved for the few?

Would it not have been more magnanimous and godlike to shower the blessings of heaven upon all the mortals of earth? And if there are to be no tears, no suffering, no dying or parting in heaven, would it have detracted from his glory to give us such conditions here?

If Christians want to pray, why not ask God to change our conditions and give us a better lay here, where we would be sure of the benefit? But there is neither philosophy, or reason in asking an unchangeable God to grant us favors. And the silly habit of praying in our institutions of learning is offering an insult to science in her own chosen temples.

According to the Christian belief, a death has never occurred among all the countless millions who have peopled the earth. The body is only the husk—the shuck; this only has died. The soul, the real man, has not died. It has lived on and lives to day, and will live forever.

If souls live forever they cannot be annihilated; they must be eternal, and what is eternal never was created. So that all of the souls which have animated the bodies of men up to the present time were in existence before man's advent upon the earth, and must have been coeval with God himself. And the souls must be in existence to-day which will animate all the living bodies down to the latest generations. Of all the living souls which must be in waiting to be utilized by bodies yet to be born, might not one be found disengaged, so that we might examine it and get a knowledge of it by our senses, and know for a certainty that there is such a thing in existence? So far as all scientific tests can be applied, the verdict is "not proved."

My opinion is that mind is all the soul that man ever possessed. I do not believe that a new-born babe has any more soul than a horse, for it does not know half as much. All the soul a man has is produced by the action of the brain, and when the brain ceases to act there is no soul to be wafted to regions of eternal bliss or consigned to eternal torment. If a part of the human family could live under water like fish, and a part could stand the effects of fire without injury, and a part could be frozen without being hurt, and if a part was cold-blooded, and a part could live without eating and another part without drinking, and if poisons were a healthy diet for some and death to others, I might be led to believe that there is hell for one and heaven for another.

But we are all begotten alike, all conceived alike, and all born alike, and all subject to the same general laws, and to my mind it seems rational that the fate of one should be the fate of all. I think when a man dies he is dead to all intents and purposes, and that there is nothing remaining for angels to make happy or devils to torment. About God and the soul, heaven and hell, I know not anything and I know of no one who does. These matters are beyond the reach of human ken, and to questions in regard to them there can be but one honest answer, and that is, "I do not know." In the absence of any knowledge, the best we can do is to use our reason and get what little light we can from analogy.

I do not believe that God ever talked with men or wrote on tables of stone or any other tables. It is more reasonable to believe that Moses or some one else did the writing and imputed it to God to deceive a superstitious people and give him influence and make his power felt among them.

I do not believe that God is a printer, or book-binder, or author, or that he has in any way ever been concerned in the book business. And as for God commanding bloody barbarians to wage wars of extermination and kill old and young, even unborn children, the idea would shock a savage. That the people may have been told, and that they believed that God gave such commands, is reasonable, and that a blood thirsty monster like Joshua should pretend that God gave such commands in order to make the people carry out his inhuman designs is equally reasonable. I do not believe that men were ever born who had sufficient foresight to peer into the future and foretell coming events. There is no trouble in prophesying when the people are sufficiently ignorant. The best the wisest can do is to tell what may transpire in the future by what has taken place in the past, but this is not prophesying. It must be admitted that the foremost scientists of the present time possess a scope of vision unknown to the ignorant masses of three thousand years ago. Yet they would be the first to ridicule the idea that any mortal was ever born who had the power of telling even what the next hour might bring forth. Who can doubt that the scientific drift of the present time is far in advance of what it was in the times of the so-called prophets? And yet if any noted scientist should proclaim that he could foretell coming events he would be regarded as a lunatic.

As for the book called the Bible, it is easy to see that men who from childhood have been taught to regard it as the word of God should look upon it with reverence. Whether the book counts for good or evil, whether it is reasonable or ridiculous, makes no kind of difference.

The Mohammedans, Mormons, Persians, Chinese, have their so-called sacred writings and reverence them as Christians do the Bible. All of these books have certain features in common. All contain much that is good, mixed with much that is evil and even ridiculous.

Did God dictate all of these writings? If he did not, man must have been the author of some of them. If man had an object in writing a part of them, might he not have had an object in writing the whole of them? If a part was written by God and a part by man, God ought to have given a rule whereby the genuine could be distinguished from the spurious.

As far as I am informed, there is nothing in these books which would require the wisdom of a God to write. If the Bible was written by God he certainly is not a very dignified or even decent God, and I would not blame him if he denied the authorship of a great part of it in polite company.

These books, purporting to come from the hand of God, contradict each other, and parts of the same book are in plain contradiction to other parts. It would seem like a rational conclusion that these contradictions could not have emanated from a perfect being.

The first thing we read in our Bible is, "God created the heaven and the earth." Christians are taught that all things are embraced in the "heaven and the earth," and are the work of God's hands, and that he pronounced them all "very good."

But the first man and woman that God made and finished to a gloss with his own hands proved a great disappointment. A single act, which God must have foreseen, involved the entire race in ruin and death. God planted a tree in the garden where he put his first pet couple, and the fruit of that tree contained the seeds of sin and consequent ruin of the race.

Did God have foreknowledge? What do you suppose he was thinking about when he planted that tree? Did God create everything? Wasn't his head a little fuddled when he made the serpent and called it a good job?

Cain killed his brother Abel and the iniquity of the people became "very great," and matters went on from bad to worse, until they became so grievous that God could stand it no longer, and he got mad and stamped and stormed and tore his hair, and said, "I'll teach you fellows down there a lesson which you will not soon forget." So he brought on a great flood, which swept from the face of the earth all that he had created except one favorite and his family, and then resolved to take a new start. But a second time he was overtaken with hard luck. The first thing his favorite did after the long wet spell was to get drunk, and his cuttings up were such as to bring disgrace upon his patron and protector. And God was wroth, and he looked fierce and his hair stood on end and his eyes glared and he frothed at the mouth, and he talked to Noah, and he said, "As my soul liveth I have made another blunder. In very deed, I took you to be a man of parts. I selected you from all the bums and dead-beats and God forsaken rascals on all the face of the earth to be my special agent when I made up my mind to bring on that wet spell, and made you captain of that big boat and trusted the whole managing to your care, from the mastodon all the way down through to the monkey and parrot, even to fleas and lice, and now you have played this lousy trick on me. Noah, I am ashamed of you—you are a drunken sot.

You got drunk last night,
You were drunk the night before,
You'll be drunk to-night
And drunk forever more.

Noah, you are a bad egg; there is only one thing to be done, you must go to the gold cure."

At such a turn of things it is no wonder that God got discouraged and felt sorry that he began the creation business in the first place. On account of the wickedness of the world, which he pronounced very good, he openly declared that it "repented him that he created man upon the face of the earth." Everything must have been sadly out of joint to make an unchangeable God repent. Who could have blamed him if he had taken the world by the tail and jerked the whole hell-deserving hotch-potch concern out of existence?

Observations.

I learn through Ed. W. Chamberlain, Esq., that Dr. Batdorf, the Michigan medium who was presented to the grand jury on an accusation of making a fraudulent use of the mails, is out of the toils. The jury failed to indict him. A knowledge of the ground upon which this body turned Medium Batdorf loose would furnish food for thought. Were the members of the jury convinced that he really furnished spiritual information to his correspondents, and is the failure to indict to be taken as an indorsement of mediumship such as Dr. Batdorf practices? I trust not, for that is really not the question at issue. I would rather think that Grand Rapids has enough men to form a grand jury who recognize the principle that the purpose of the postal system is to carry the mails, and that the duty of the officials is neither to smell out unorthodox thought nor to interfere between the sender of a letter or a paper and the person to whom it is addressed. The person remitting a dollar to a fraudulent medium, a lottery dealer, a green goods agent, or any other fake, makes a better use of it than he would if he contributed the amount to the salary of a post-office inspector like Comstock, or any other sneak. The postal system, as aforesaid, is to transport mail matter, and the officials who have turned it into a moral and religious detective agency are the individuals who make a fraudulent use of the mails. If I were on a grand jury having jurisdiction they would be presented for indictment.

Why all this discussion among Sabbatarians about the proper observance of their holy day, and why their hesitancy about the framing of a law and the fixing of penalties for its infraction? On this question I am with the Prohibition party of New York state, so far as it declares:

We call upon the people of the state to repudiate and consign to oblivion any political party that shall propose to submit a commandment of the decalog to the local opinion of corrupt cities.

That is sound. Corrupt cities nor any other cities have a right to decide that a citizen shall or shall not have other gods before Jehovah, or whether he shall take the appellation of the same in vain or otherwise. Local option cannot make the enforcement of Sunday laws just; and the matter of honoring parents, committing murder, adultery, theft, or perjury, or coveting a neighbor's wife, is not a municipal problem. Sunday observance is either an individual affair or it is a universal issue. There is but one authority for the Sabbath, and that is the Bible. And the Bible says this:

"These are the words that the Lord hath commanded, that ye should do them.

THE LAW.

"Six days shall work be done, but on the seventh day there shall be to you an holy day, a sabbath of rest to the Lord."

THE PENALTY.

"Whosoever doeth work therein shall be put to death."

If there is anybody who thinks that the enforcement of laws, the infraction of which involves the infliction of the death penalty, is a local matter, he is not much of a jurist. Furthermore, if there is anyone who imagines that the enforcement of a law is separable from the infliction of the penalty prescribed, he is off his trolley.

I do not suppose that the members of the Republican convention who framed a platform calling for the maintenance of the Sunday law, nor those members of the party who profess to believe in the law of God, know of the existence of this divine statute. Nor is it to be supposed that the members of the Prohibition party know that it is among the commands for whose enforcement they have declared. But this is certain: If, after their attention has been called to the law, they do not either demand its enforcement and the infliction of its penalty, or else repudiate its authority and the authority of all other Sabbath laws, they are miserable hypocrites and cowards.

"I am of opinion," remarks Mr. Walter Scott, editor, of the Leader, published at Regina, N. T., Canada, "that the people will strongly uphold the postmaster-general." Mr. Scott's speculation has all the appearances of a successful guess. The people of Canada would uphold Postmaster-General Caron in excluding Freethought literature from the mails, and the people of the United States would uphold Postmaster-General Wilson in a similar order; for the people of this country, like those of Canada, unite a theoretical belief in liberty with a hankering after the suppression of those who exercise it. I have never seen any reason for reposing the slightest confidence in the judgment of the majority, who are less likely to be right than the minority, and are even more prone to go wrong than legislators and courts. That the comparatively few public officials should occasionally do the correct thing is quite conceivable, but that a majority out of seventy millions should agree upon the truth, all at the same time, is a presumption too violent for calm consideration. That is what gives us pause when the referendum is proposed. In my opinion, the less influence the majority has on the framing and passing of laws touching the liberties of individuals, the better chance there is for those liberties to survive. An honest election, if it were possible to hold one, would be a very ignorant and bigoted election, and I am not sure that we should gain anything by it. An anonymous correspondent from Wairarapa, New Zealand, offers this thought for my consideration: "According to present ideas, a man must know something about pigs before he is allowed to be a judge of them at a pig show, but any fool can judge which man is the best for a public office." It is from somewhat similar premises, I infer, that Mr. Scott reasons that the people of Canada would uphold Postmaster-General Caron.

The "purpose of the sanctuary," that is, the use of the pulpit, may be hard to come at, but the Rev. Dr. Parkhurst has tried to tell us what it is. Says he: "It is not the object of the sanctuary to make scholars or to make thinkers," but "to draw the soul that is in the man, and the great Father-soul in whose temple we assemble, so into relation with each other that they shall touch." All who think they comprehend that process will of course be convinced that they understand what Dr. Parkhurst means, but to me it is a pseud-idea. Dr. Buckley, editor of the Christian Advocate, may or may not think he grasps Dr. Parkhurst's thought, but he indorses it as "a true statement, equally philosophical and scriptural," together with the further assertion that "scholasticism and intellectualism in the pulpit are unholy devils that merit nothing but exorcism."

In the same issue of his paper Dr. Buckley quotes with approval a criticism, by a religious exchange, of preachers who use pet phrases which denote mental laziness rather than close thinking, and adds to it this: "Whoever utters such phrases is not thinking at all while he utters them. His mind is busy with what is to come or is in a state of blank vacuity." Seeing that, as Dr. Parkhurst says, the sanctuary is not to make thinkers, a preacher who talks along without doing any thinking himself would seem to be the right man in the right place, and Dr. Buckley's condemnation of him is not consistent with his indorsement of Parkhurst's contention that intellectualism is out of place in the pulpit. What could more fittingly emanate from a mind in a state of "blank vacuity" than the words quoted about drawing the soul that is in man into relations with the great Father-soul who owns the building where the meeting is held? The word "soul" describes nothing tangible, and neither does the compound, "Father-soul." To bring two things into relation it is necessary, first, that they exist; second, to discover their whereabouts, and, third, to apply some sort of a process calculated to effect their union. Some statistics as to the distance between them would be useful incidentally, and it would be a further advantage to know when the tackle is made, so that effort may be suspended at the proper moment. All these data being absent, Dr. Parkhurst's mind must have been in a state of "blank vacuity" so far as facts are concerned; and from what I know of religious discourse and religious philosophy, I should conclude that Dr. Buckley is sound when he indorses Parkhurst's statement of the object of the sanctuary, but that he is wholly unsound, from a religious view-point, when he implies that the uttered words of a preacher should be the expression of ideas originating in his mind. As near as language can define the thought of a sermon, it should resemble that condition of the cosmos described by the writer of Genesis when he said it was "without form and void." The sound of it as uttered must produce a certain mental agitation in the hearer, but no information should be imparted. The think tank is to be stirred, but nothing put into it. Verifiable facts introduced in a sermon rob it of its spiritual value, and it is no longer a sermon—it is a lecture. Mr. Gladstone has made this point clear. He says that in a sermon we are not to look for scientific precision, but for general statements which admit exceptions. It must aim at moral impressions merely, and be open to criticism in detail. So far as it deals with facts, therefore, it is not to be taken seriously as meaning what it says, while from the scientific point of view it may mean nothing at all. We must establish a differentia between scientific and religious truth, for that which is true in religion may without prejudice be scientifically false. The Living Church, an Episcopalian paper, goes so far as to say that "the facts of theology are beyond human discovery." What, then, is the use of asking the preachers to explain the meaning of their language, or even to use language which has any meaning? The worshipers most impressed by the proceedings are those who listen to the Catholic service, which is conducted in Latin, and the hearers do not understand any of it.

The Rev. Samuel Jones frequently illustrates his remarks with anecdotes more or less decent. Here is one that he gives on the authority of a commercial traveler. On a visit home the drummer aforesaid found his little girl sitting on the floor playing with her kitten. While doing so she said: "Kittie, you are a sweet little thing; I love you and I know who your mommer is. Old pussy is your mommer. But, kittie, I don't know who your popper is, for I never saw him. I expect your popper is a traveling man." Jones applies this story to Ingersoll, whose mother, he explains, is the earth, but whose father, he intimates, is that migratory individual who goes about seeking whom he may devour or seduce. But the application is not very close. I should suppose that even before he repeated the drummer's story for the first time the evangelist might have considered how appropriately the evolutionary ancestor of that anecdote could have been related of the Judean carpenter and joiner who held upon his knee the future lord and savior of the Reverend Samuel Jones.

The voice of the liar who told the tale of paralysis superinduced by blasphemy at High Shoals, Ga., still echoes through the religious press. One Jas. T. Lowe, doubtless a Methodist dominie, writes from Rehoboth to the Wesleyan organ at Atlanta that the tongue of Haguewood was paralyzed while he was asleep after denouncing the sermon of the day on his way home from church. Except that Haguewood's tongue was not paralyzed while he was asleep, and that he had not denounced any sermon, Lowe's account may be true. The only really indisputable assertion of the religious and so-called secular press is that the paralysis, though Haguewood has been subject to it for years, was a "warning providence." I am candid enough to admit that nobody can disprove that any event is a "warning providence." Nevertheless, if there is an impartial God who attends to the Ananiases, why has not the perpetrator of this indecent assault on veracity been everlastingly belted with the club of his honest wrath?

They are holding an exposition at Atlanta just now for the display of the remarkable products of the adjacent back country, of which there should be no scarcity. Visitors from a distance would be interested in exhibits illustrating the latest methods of lynching; explaining improved systems of getting the drop on a political antagonist; exemplifying the proper way of conducting a camp-meeting or concealing a clandestine distillery; and showing at a glance how morality may be maintained and promoted by means of the rawhide and the revolver. The theology of the South, which, according to the New York Independent, is unsung by the fire of the higher criticism, would also excite the curiosity not only of all Northerners, but of the whole civilized world, including Japan, which is heathen. But the managers might secure all these attractions, and yet find their exposition incomplete as a local exhibit, unless somewhere—conspicuous among wonders, miracles, prodigies, marvels, monstrosities, spectacles, and astounding phenomena—the liar who started the Hague wood paralysis yarn was found in a group with the ministers, religious editors, and minor falsifiers of fact who have vouched for the fake in pulpit and press.

Contributions to the Congress.

The full program of the National Congress of Freethinkers will be published in next week's TRUTH SEEKER. It will be a rich and attractive presentation of Freethought principles by our best speakers and writers. It is what is needed at the present time. In spite of many difficulties, the Freethought party was never in a better condition for advance. This Congress is pre-eminently favorable for the combination of our forces. Every Freethinker who is present will add to its power and influence. This Congress is for the agitation and the education of the people. If we wish to have sound politics we must have an intelligent constituency. Broad and deep and thorough must be our methods of reform. Freethought is science and philosophy as well as liberty and justice. It can not succeed without co-operation and organization. The best things in human development are attained by united and universal effort. Let Freethought show its numbers and enthusiasm.

The following are the contributions to our work in addition to those already reported. If each friend will likewise do his share, success is certain.

Published with Regret.

The Ingersoll Secular Society held a special meeting at the residence of Mr. Reuben Rush, 443 Broadway, South Boston, Sunday, Oct. 6, 1895, to consider the action of the Paine Memorial Corporation in ejecting the said society from Paine Hall without notice, and to transact such other business as might be deemed expedient. It was the unanimous expression of the members that the action of the Paine Memorial Corporation was unprecedented in a Liberal community, and unwarranted under any circumstances. A committee was appointed to draft resolutions in regard to the matter, and a committee of ways and means was elected to consider plans for the future, to report at a subsequent meeting. The following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, That while the Ingersoll Secular Society realizes and appreciates the benefits it has received from the Paine Memorial Corporation in the many years it has held its meetings in Paine Memorial Building, we, the members of the Ingersoll Secular Society, heartily condemn the action of the said corporation in summarily ejecting our association from its building, leaving us as a society entirely at the mercy of circumstances, and without a home, or time to procure one in season, for our regular meeting the first Sunday in October.

Resolved, That this action of the Paine Memorial Corporation is unjust, unkind, and discourteous, and totally unworthy of any body, particularly professed Liberals.

Voted, That a copy of these resolutions be sent for publication to the Investigator, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and Secular Thought. Signed,

WM. ROCKWOOD, President,

Why This Paper is Contraband in Canada.

One of Mr. Caron's Church Fellows Tears His Hair Over The Truth Seeker.

From the Montreal True Witness and Catholic Chronicle

Last week we received a marked copy of a New York publication, entitled THE TRUTH SEEKER. From what we can judge of this sheet its promoters are likely to go on for ages in their truthseeking, and certainly they are not liable to find that which they seek. Certainly they are very rapidly moving in the very opposite direction to truth. On the title page, and in large letters, we read the very significant words, "Prohibited in Canada." On glancing at the so-called illustrations, and we suppose the reading matter is intended to correspond with these abominations, we feel grateful to the Canadian authorities for having prohibited the circulation of such a diabolical publication. The editor gives a series of letters that passed between him and the Canadian post-office department; they suffice to illustrate the boorish ignorance of the person who wrote the postmaster-general and to justify most fully the course of the latter in ordering the confiscation of such a periodical. We would not dare reproduce any of the blasphemous language contained in that criminal sheet; and we fail to see how any self-respecting man—Jew or Gentile, Catholic or Protestant, Freethinker or whatever else he may be—could possibly allow such literature (we use the term for want of a better one) into his home.

The editor consecrates a column to the glorification of their special artist (?), one Heston. If the caricatures on the first and last pages are samples of his artistic acquirements, we certainly cannot compliment his friends upon their taste, refinement, or sense of the beautiful. There is neither thought, originality, nor talent exhibited. He draws a room that might be the section of a barn; a number of dilapidated "sun-fishes," supposed to represent the twelve apostles, but so far from suggesting even a remote idea of them that he finds it necessary to state who they are; a miserable and vulgar representation of a couple of old beggars looking in at the door—Our Blessed Lady and St. Joseph are intended to be thus pictured; finally Our Lord, in the middle of the room, easily recognizable by the hair, features, and halo, but otherwise dressed in the generally accepted garments of the tramp in caricature. Under all this we find a text of scripture, suggesting that Our Lord is ashamed of His Holy Mother.

The perpetrator of this infernal piece of villainess has the audacity to demand of the postmaster-general of Canada why this publication is prohibited. He wants to know what his paper contains that is vile and "scurrilous" or "blasphemous," within the meaning of the Post-office act. The reply he received was as exact and as steadfast as his demand was insolent and false. We draw attention to the existence of such a sheet simply to let our readers know to what abominable depths can sink the mind that is entirely perverted, and to beg of our post-office authorities to be more vigilant than ever—for the fact of this copy having come to us shows that others are smuggled into Canada.

From the Mt. Forest Representative.

If there is one thing more than another Postmaster-General Caron deserves credit for, it is prohibiting the infidel paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, printed in New York, transmission by mails in Canada. All we regret is that the postmaster-general's prohibition is not altogether prohibiting the paper from being circulated, for the publisher had the audacity to forward this office a copy of his blasphemous sheet, containing a marked article, in which Hon. Mr. Caron is assailed with the low venom which might be expected from a characterless publication. We trust the prohibiting of THE TRUTH SEEKER in Canada will be rigidly enforced, for, like the devil it serves, there is no truth in it—its name, as well as its contents, being deceptive. It is neither a "truth seeker," a "truth finder," nor a "truth giver," but one of Satan's agencies for disseminating doubt and poisoning the minds of the public against all that is good and holy.

"By This Craft We Have Our Wealth."

The Rich Mine that Caron & Co. Are Defending for the Church.

A thousand pilgrims from Montreal visited the shrine of St. Anne's to-day, under the auspices of the Oblat Fathers.

A woman belonging to St. Peter's Cathedral, Montreal, claims to have been miraculously cured of deafness at the shrine of St. Anne de Beaupre to-day.—Items of News, July 3.

From La Semaine Religieuse.

Miss Paquette, a country school teacher of Ste. Monique, who had been suffering for a long time from an incurable disease, was completely cured while making a pilgrimage to the Shrine of St. Donat de Montcalm. Previous to this no less than ten physicians had declared her case hopeless, and now Dr. Charles S. de Martigny in a letter declares the cure in question to be due to miraculous intervention.

The next case was that of a firm's bookkeeper in a large establishment in this city who in balancing his books tried in vain to discover an error of ten cents in his accounts. During two months he tried both night and day to discover the error, but all to no purpose, and at last the young man in question decided to offer a High Mass in honor of St. Antoine to be followed by a novena during which he recited si quaeris miracula, and during the fifth or sixth day the mistake of ten cents was found. "I attribute," writes the bookkeeper, "this favor to the all-powerful intercession of St. Antoine and I am happy to proclaim it."

From the Montreal Gazette.

The local French [Canadian] newspapers report more miraculous cures said to have been worked at the shrine of La Bonne Ste. Anne, a crippled boy having left his crutches behind him in the church on Tuesday, and Mrs. John Morency, of St. Johnsbury, having been instantly cured the same day of serious illness of four years' standing. The feast of St. Anne was the occasion of very solemn service at the Basilica of St. Anne de Beaupre to-day, which was crowded with pilgrims, over a thousand coming from Massachusetts, Maine, and New York alone. Three steamers arrived there this morning crowded with visitors, and so did several trains from Quebec. Commencing at daybreak Low Masses were said up to 10 o'clock. 66 in all, over 6,000 people communicating. After Grand Mass, at which the vestments presented by Queen Anne of Austria were worn, there was a grand procession of the relics, of clergy and pilgrims. Then there was veneration of the relic. Rev. Lord Douglas, of London, and Mgr. Couroy, of Ogdensburg, were amongst the distinguished priests present.

REGINA, N. W. T., CANADA, Oct. 7, 1895.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER. Dear Sir: Replying to your circular of October 1st, regarding Postmaster-General Caron's statement that "there is no appeal from his decision," and your inference that he can at pleasure ruin all Canadian publishers who offend him, I beg to say that he and you both are mistaken. There is the appeal at the ballot box, which is very effective. In your case, I am of opinion that the Canadian people—rightly or wrongly, I do not judge—will very strongly uphold the postmaster-general.

Yours very sincerely, WALTER SCOTT.

Our Missionary Work.

Several of our good friends have written us that in their opinion the work, "Self-Contradictions of the Bible," should go along with Paine's "Age of Reason," as a missionary pamphlet. Mr. J. R. Perry puts it thus: "As a missionary document the 144 Self-Contradictions will go hand in hand with the 'Age of Reason.' I think any person getting the one will get the other. It is the grubbing process, clearing out the roots and stones, necessary to preparing the soil for good seeds of common sense." And as it is our delight to furnish the implements for this sort of agricultural operations, we are willing to do our part and will send the "Self-Contradictions of the Bible" to those who will distribute it among their Christian friends. FOR A DOLLAR A DOZEN. Or we will send twelve copies to as many different addresses for one dollar.

Now let the friends of Freethought turn to and circulate "Self-Contradictions" as well as the "Age of Reason." Send both books out by the thousand and watch the result. Flood the country with them, and let the Christians know what their holy paper fetish, the Bible, is like and why it is worthless as a guide to any good.

THE TRUTH SEEKER's offer to send eight copies of Paine's "Age of Reason" to eight different addresses for $1, to be used for missionary purposes, is still open. The best results are reported from this method of reaching intelligent believers and giving a new direction to their thoughts.

BLUE HILL, NEB., Sept. 30, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3, for which please send THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year, and the "Pictorial Text-Book." I hope you will continue the pictures in the paper, the Christian Reformer to the contrary notwithstanding. When Rev. E. N. Allen says a mob of Infidels nineteen centuries ago murdered a man (Jesus) outside the gates of Jerusalem, he says what he knows to be a lie; they were sturdy, stanch believers who killed the innocent reformer.

Yours truly, JOTHAM MARTIN.

MR. EDITOR: I hope you will pardon my delinquent subscription. Inclosed you will find sufficient amount to pay up to date and one year in advance. I must have the paper. Hoping that you may frustrate the damnable schemes of the Canadian bigots, I am, always for THE TRUTH SEEKER and Freethought, Canada Will Yet be Free.

DORA, MO., Oct. 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2, for which send the paper as long as the amount lasts. There are a good many Liberals in this part of the country, but they are not able to subscribe for your most noble paper. I am real sorry to know that the postmaster-general of Canada has taken steps to shut THE TRUTH SEEKER out of that country.

ANTON FISCHER.

Is Going to Take in the Dominion.

IOWA CITY, IA., Oct. 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find the remainder of my year's subscription. I do not wonder that "God's servants" want THE TRUTH SEEKER suppressed. They cannot answer the arguments of truth and liberty, but must resort to that old degrading scheme of force. "Truth crushed to earth shall rise again" shall be said of THE TRUTH SEEKER if, for a time, it is overshadowed by the cloud of suppression, but it will come out with the stars and stripes floating over them as their emblem of liberty, and the defeated clergy will be weaker and wiser for their folly. I wish you all success in the fight that is now on, and am sure of your victory in the end.

Yours truly, E. M. ALLEN.

One Standby, Whatever Happens.

WEST MOHERRY, ILL., Sept. 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find renewal to your valuable paper for two years more. I have delayed remitting, thinking that I could get at least one new subscriber. I give away THE TRUTH SEEKER, when I have read it, and have put copies in the post-office—in boxes of those who I felt sure would like to subscribe for it—men who were able and liberal in their views, but when I called on them they made all kinds of excuses. You can imagine my surprise. They all admire the paper, and would be pleased to have it sent to them, but think $3 a big sum.

I have taken THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since it was published in Paris, Ill., and shall continue while I live. I am not quite four score years yet, and think I have a few more years to read it. I am pleased with Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought."

I would like to live to see THE TRUTH SEEKER delivered to every post-office in the United States. Only one comes to this office. My best respects to all interested in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Yours truly, WM. C. HOWARD.

Mortuary—John A. Walthall.

REDMON, ILL., Sept. 25, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2.50 for twelve copies of "Self-Contradictions of the Bible," and the remainder to pay what is due THE TRUTH SEEKER on account of John A. Walthall. That noble, kind, and honest man has gone to rest. "He wakes not in the night to hear the rain." He loved, and lived for humanity; his life was full of duty done, and all who ever knew him will say with me, He sleeps the sleep of the righteous.

John A. Walthall was one of the first and best friends of THE TRUTH SEEKER, rendering material assistance to D. M. Bennett while in Paris, Ill.

Like all true reformers, he never was hampered with an excess of this world's goods, but possessed a bright intellect, a kind heart, and a willingness to industriously employ his wonderfully mechanical brain and hand twelve to sixteen hours a day for between sixty and seventy years—the most industrious and self-sacrificing man I ever knew. If in our endeavor to make others happy we increase our own enjoyment, then John A. Walthall must have been one of the blest. I was away when he died. I think his death occurred August 31st.

MARK ROWE.

They are Helping Themselves.

SNODGRASS, WASH., Sept. 27, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find a V to square up to January, 1896. I have been trying for the last two years to get enough over and above my living to pay up my subscription to the best paper on earth, THE TRUTH SEEKER. I have at last succeeded. I am satisfied that you are in need of it, and would send more if I could.

We have been looking for that great wave of prosperity that the daily papers have so much to say about, sweeping over the country. But it has not reached here yet. It must have got caught in a cyclone, and twisted into smithereens.

As the government does not try to do anything to relieve the distress throughout the country, the producers propose to obtain relief through the Labor Exchange. There are several branches in this state, and it will keep on organizing until there is one in every town. I have read up on it to some extent, and I have become thoroughly convinced that it is the grandest institution on earth or anywhere else. Free-thinkers are always in the front rank for any great reform for the betterment of the human race. Therefore they should investigate the Labor Exchange movement. Anyone wishing to investigate can obtain the necessary books by addressing the Progressiv Thought Company, Olathe, Kansas.

J. S. MARTIN.

Preacher Ahead of the Mother-in-Law.

ROMULUS, MICH., Sept. 22, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Someone was talking awhile ago about marriage ceremonies being performed by justices of the peace. That is right, but when your mother-in-law must have a preacher, what is one to do? That was where she had me about two months ago. I had to consent to the services of a preacher for fear of "what people would say." But I was loaded for him. He was a Baptist of confessedly Agnostic convictions, so it was easy to get along with him. He first showed me a book full of nonsensical ceremonies, padded like a World's Fair Sunday closing petition with religion. I told him my belief was that marriage was a civil ceremony, to which he heartily agreed. I then asked him what he thought of this, pulling a written ceremony from my pocket. He examined it and said, "It is good."

As long as it pleased my wife and myself and the preacher, too, it might be worth a perusal as a successful compromise. Here it is, all of it: "(Addressing groom by name) Do you take this woman to be your wife? Answer: I do. (To bride) Do you take this man to be your husband? Presumably same answer. (To all) If there is anyone present who objects to the completion of this ceremony, let him now speak."

"(After pause.)

"I then, by the authority vested in me by the people of the state of Michigan, pronounce you husband and wife."

How does that strike you as a secular ceremony for a preacher to use? It is all there, too, none of it having got away.

He is the kind of preacher whom it is a delight to meet, to entertain, to travel with, or to attend his church. He is truly ex pluribus unum, if that may mean an exceptional specimen in a great number. I wanted to catch him and retain him as a curiosity. He even opposes putting God in the Constitution. If we can find two or three more like him, I believe the country is safe.

Yours, F. E. ROMINE.

Religion in the South.

BACKWOODS, GA., Sept. 30, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: As I have never seen a letter from Georgia in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I have concluded to write you one. I send you my name and address, but cannot permit you to publish the same, as that would mean pecuniary ruin.

I am located in the "wire grass" region (Lower Georgia), among the tall pines, the Methodists, Baptists, Hardshells, and saw-mills; where ignorance is at a premium and education away down below par, and the "market very weak;" where superstition wears a crown of glory, and reason is a beggar and an outcast; where "belief" and "faith" wear wreaths of laurel, and "science" is a meaningless word.

As I write, I look out of my window. Far away in the west a great ball of fire is slowly sinking below the tops of the dead pines. Their naked branches seem to remind me of the long gone years, when the world, "according to law," stood still. In the distance the sunlight glimmers on the steeple of a little white "god house," whose windows will soon rattle at the approach of the on-rushing vestibule. I don't know whether "God" approves of his windows being rattled or not, but truly "force" is no respecter of windows, whether they be in God's houses, or those of other people of less note.

The people here are all firm believers in God and a flat world. In fact, the county board of education has several times decided that the world is flat, and the aforesaid board of education is a tribunal that is "hard to down." It is said that some three or four years ago, they refused a young man from Massachusetts a certificate to teach school in the county, because rumor had it that said young man had publicly remarked "that he took no stock in either hell-fire or the devil," and "that if Samson ever slew three thousand Philistines with the jaw-bone of an ass, he must have been a Methodist preacher and talked 'em to death."

I went to a "foot wash" some time ago. I wonder how many of your readers ever went to a foot wash? I tell you it would have made old Isaiah snicker. Some of the brethren's feet were pretty rusty. One old fellow had toe nails that looked like claws, and while his feet were being washed the "holy laugh" came on him. His eyes seemed to become set, his lower jaw dropped, his hair stood up like the quills on a porcupine, and while his whole body twitched spasmodically, there issued from his mouth the sound that a person might make while trying to pronounce continuously the word "hat," and leaving off the final letter.

Such is the work of "God." It is sad indeed to look upon it. I am sometimes tempted to believe that of all the freaks and monsters with which the hypocrisy of priesthood has ever filled the skies, "God" is the worst.

I suppose very few of your readers have ever attended a protracted meeting of Georgia Negroes. Their conduct, while suffering from religious excitement, is fully as foolish and ridiculous as that of the whites. One night, not long ago, I went to a Negro protracted meeting. The preacher was a curiosity. He was as black as the ace of spades, and his teeth, which were faultless, and white as snow, were constantly showing, giving him a ghastly appearance. Notwithstanding his limited vocabulary, his descriptiv powers were remarkable. As he stood there in the dim light of the lamps, resembling some being from the regions he was describing, the picture he drew of the final punishment of those who failed to believe was anything else than that calculated to inspire the heart with love and reverence. He described the day of judgment. He told how, at the last, the chosen would be caught up and remain suspended in the air, looking down with pleasure upon the old world wrapping up in flames, and hearing with joy the shrieking and howling of the lost. Indeed, I can scarcely describe the utter contempt and loathing with which he, poor ignorant Negro though he was, inspired me for his "God" and his mercy (?) "which endureth forever." A fiend so infernally atrocious, a monster so savage and cruel, although only a creature of the imagination, fills me with unspeakable loathing and disgust. The congregation sang:

O sinner you can't stand the fire!
O sinner you can't stand the fire!!
O sinner you can't stand the fire!!!

to a wild, weird, and unearthly note. No wonder some of the poor creatures had "fits" and "trances;" no wonder the state asylum is filled with religious devotees. Yet, in the face of all this, Smith's "History of Georgia," which is prescribed by the state authorities for use in the public schools, says that a Negro may be prominent in the church, and that his standing will in no way be impaired by theft; that religion does not in any way serve to check their natural propensity to commit petty crimes. This is a fatal admission, coming as it does from so high a Christian source.

Long may THE TRUTH SEEKER and its noble promulgators flourish; may the number of souls from which it strikes the fetters and shackles of superstition be legion.

A GEORGIA ATHEIST.

Lecture Notes.

PATCH GROVE, WIS., Oct. 2, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Omaha, Nebraska, is a city of one hundred and twenty-five thousand people, a great railroad center, and the key to the Western states. No more progressive place exists west of Chicago, and it was to be expected that I would find there many good Liberals, and I was not disappointed. They have organized a society, and christened it "The Omaha Philosophical Association." Its platform is free for discussion of all questions, but my visit was the occasion of the first Freethought lecture they ever had. J. W. Logan is president, W. M. Victor, secretary, and S. G. Emery, treasurer. Mr. John McArdle made most of the arrangements for the meeting, and although a laboring man, working for a laboring man's wages, he raised all the funds, and did all the rustling after his working hours. This ought to be a lesson for those Liberals of means and leisure who declare it impossible to arrange for lectures. An interesting fact in Mr. McArdle's life is that he and his wife, also a strong Liberal, were united by S. P. Putnam, when the Secular Pilgrim was a Unitarian minister in Omaha. Mr. F. J. Griffin is an active member, and did good work to make our meeting successful. Mr. Victor is a Liberal throughout, and Mr. Logan, though much interested in financial subjects, has been in the past and is now an active Freethinker. The same can be said of Mr. Emery and Judge Bartlett. Mr. W. E. Blinn and Mr. Bushby came over from Council Bluffs. I have noticed a tendency on the part of Liberal organizations to devote their time to the discussion of political and social questions almost to the exclusion of Freethought. This is a mistake; the political question is discussed on every hand, and the people do not want to hear it continually. Liberalism is not often dealt with publicly. In many societies and debating clubs it is a forbidden topic. Hence the people will go to a place where they can hear it. In Omaha, we had about twice the audience they ever had when a political question was discussed, and my experience in Liberal societies almost invariably proves this to be true. No subject should be excluded, but it is a mistake to monopolize all the time with one. Early Monday morning, friend McArdle accompanied me to the depot, and I took the train for Castana, Iowa. Although the locomotive was injured and we had to wait for another, it was not long until I arrived and shook hands with my genial correspondent, Leon A. Hoadley. Castana is an old stamping-ground for Freethought lecturers, for in the time of Franklin A. Day, whose generosity in our cause is fresh in the memory of many who read these words, "the intellectual yeast was always rising." To-day his two sons, Preston and Joseph, take his place. Mr. Hoadley's father was a pioneer Freethinker in this locality, and now his mother and two sisters, as well as himself, help hold the fort. I was billed to give three lectures, and gave two in Joseph Day's hall to good audiences. Some weeks previous the church had secured the hall for one of its side-shows, and they happened to want it on the third night of my lectures. The Adventists very kindly granted us the use of their church, and I gave a lecture on the Sunday question to a full house.

Prominent in attendance each night was Hon. F. F. Roe and wife. Notwithstanding his outspoken infidel opinions he was elected to represent Monona county in the legislature, and by a large majority. Messrs. Aaron Davis, Myron Wylie, Mark D. Hanshot, and Mr. Norcross are strong supporters of Freethought. I was the guest of the Hoadleys, and spent a pleasant day with Mr. Aaron Davis. Mr. Davis in his younger days was a whaler, and has in his possession many mementoes of that now almost extinct occupation. He holds what to many at the present time is a relic, and possibly not a similar document is held by any man in the West. It is an American seaman's "protection paper," certifying that he was an American citizen and thus preventing his being impressed into the English service. I had a short visit with Preston Day and wife. Mrs. Day, though an invalid, has a burning interest in mental emancipation which bodily infirmities cannot quench.

From Castana I go to Orange City and spend a day at the hospitable home of Dr. and Mrs. de Lespinasse. The doctor is a strong individualist, but if all were like him we would certainly have no need for government.

My next appointment is St. Charles, Minn., where I am met by my ever-active and genial friend, B. Peabody. Having been there before, I knew what to expect. St. Charles has a well-developed and firm Liberal element that is not afraid to show itself. Even the ministers are Liberal. Rev. Mr. Smith, of the Methodist church, is a broad-minded man, and Rev. Brown, formerly of the Congregational church, has left orthodoxy for Unitarianism. I gave two lectures—one Sunday morning and the other Sunday afternoon. Mr. and Mrs. James came in from Eyota, and Mr. and Mrs. Johnson from Kasson. I spent a day with Mr. Peabody at his home, amid the enjoyment of books and conversation with "mine host." Nor must I forget my visit with Leonard Knapp. When a pioneer settler of Wisconsin, he had nothing to read but the Bible, and he read it, and from that day to this has been a Freethinker. He knows it almost word for word. He is an admirer of Robert Burns, and delights to read his poems aloud. I was disappointed in not meeting my friend, E. E. Crooks, who has moved to Salt Lake City. Wherever he is Liberalism has a staunch defender.

From St. Charles, my destination is Patch Grove, Wisconsin. A journey of eighty miles down the left bank of the Mississippi brings me to Bagley, where the veteran Infidel, Jas. Hicklin, meets me with a buggy. It is a nine-mile drive to Patch Grove, over hills and rocks, but in two hours we are at the Bidwell house, kept by John Bidwell, an Infidel to the core. I soon learn that Freethought has a history in Patch Grove. Years ago a branch of the National League was organized. The most influential men in the locality were Liberals. A large brick building called the "Academy," which adorns the hill, was built chiefly by Freethinkers. The upper story is used for a school room; the lower is fitted up as a hall, with a stage, and on the wall hangs a portrait of Thomas Paine. Once at a public entertainment, the Methodist preacher turned this picture face to the wall, but it was not only replaced in its original position, but the meddling sky-pilot received a severe rebuke. While the old "stand-bys" of former years are gone, Liberal thought is still in the ascendancy. A county fair and a big revival at Bloomington diminished our audience somewhat, but not to injure the success of the meetings. The first night two Methodist preachers were present, but neither accepted my invitation to criticize. If the condition of the Methodist church, the only one in the place, is indicative of Christianity, it is in a dilapidated state. That and the parson's house are in a falling-down condition—yet it is the only church in the village. Among the hard workers of past years are the Hicklin Brothers, James and Walter. Their names are on the old League Charter. Mrs. Mary Humphry, though advanced in years, and living in the country, came in every night. John and Susan Bidwell are yet in the front ranks. Mr. and Mrs. H. F. Young and daughter are proud to make a stand for liberty. Robt. Collier was an early abolitionist, as well as an Infidel all his life. He lived in Salem, Ohio, when Joseph Barker was there. Mr. Waffenden also carries many years of service in behalf of humanity. FRANKLIN STEINER.

In Eastern Oregon—Katie Kehm Smith's Work and Death.

JOHN DAY, OR., Sept. 24, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: At different times during the last six weeks have I begun writing a letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER, but each time, before I could close, something has happened which caused me to leave my letter unfinished. But the end has come, and there will be no more changes made. Mrs. Katie Kehm Smith, the greatest Liberal lecturer and debater on this coast, died of typhoid fever at my house on the night of Sept. 18, 1895, at half-past nine. She was taken sick on Aug. 8th, and never left her bed again alive. Her husband, Mr. D. W. Smith, arrived at her bedside a few days after she was taken sick, and watched by her, day and night, until life left her. On Sept. 19th, after hurriedly preparing the body to be taken a long distance, Mr. Smith and myself started with it for Wagner, where she had delivered her first lectures and had her first debates in Eastern Oregon, and where her friends were most numerous. On our road we were met by Mr. Wainscott and other Liberals, of Fox Valley, and Mr. Joseph Putnam, of Monument. They had been notified of Mrs. Smith's death, and furnished valuable aid, enabling us to make good time over this mountainous country. They also escorted us to Wagner and attended the funeral. Good Liberals, indeed, to leave their homes and work, on a minute's notice, to assist at the funeral of one whom they had never heard speak and who was known to them only as an honest representative of the Secular cause.

A man having been sent ahead to carry the news to Wagner, Mrs. Smith's friends there had all arrangements made necessary for the burial. Word was sent to Lone Rock to notify the Liberals of that place, and from far and near hundreds of friends were present at the funeral to pay their last tribute to their Liberal friend and lecturer, and by far the largest procession ever seen in that settlement followed to the grave.

Mr. C. N. Wagner, a staunch Liberal, delivered the funeral oration, which was well received by even the Christians, who were present in goodly numbers. Our thanks are due to all the Liberals of that place for their prompt assistance in this hour of need.

Mrs. Smith was buried on Saturday evening, Sept. 21st. The news of her death was somewhat unexpected by her friends at Wagner, as the last reports they received of her illness were favorable and news of her relapse had not reached them.

Mrs. Smith came to Wagner sometime in June, and delivered the oration on the Fourth of July. She also had three debates at that place with a blustering and over-bearing Baptist minister, who was supported by two other preachers. Although the odds in numbers were against her she nevertheless acquitted herself superbly, and over twenty signers to the Oregon State Secular Union were the result of the victory. After this she went to Mitchell, where she had another tilt with the same preachers, the result of which you will find in the inclosed clipping from the Mitchell Monitor. After delivering several lectures at Prineville, Dayville, and other places, she arrived at this place, John Day City, on Aug. 5th. But she already showed signs of having overtaken her strength, and after delivering two lectures here and one at Canyon City, she was persuaded to rest at least one day before proceeding to Prairie City. Her appointment there, as at other places, was canceled shortly afterwards. While Mrs. Smith was with us, she did great work for the Oregon State Secular Union and the Liberal cause in general in Oregon, making converts wherever she went, and it is somewhat strange to the Liberals out here that no mention was ever made of her in any of the published reports from Oregon. Her success in converting Christians to Secularism was almost marvelous. Mrs. Smith died as she had lived, a staunch Infidel and Liberal, and although the story has already been started (as was to be expected) by our Christian neighbors that she recanted and called for ministers to pray for her, I am in a position to know that there is no truth whatever in the report. CHAS. G. CASPARY.

Below will be found the editorials from the Monitor, followed by a quotation from another local paper and the Monitor's comments thereon:

THE AFTERMATH.

Now, that the smoke of battle has cleared away, we can look over the field and make an approximate estimate of the losses on either side in the great contest recently engaged in between the Baptist division of the army of the Lord and His Satanic Majesty's legion.

Of course, and as predicted by the Monitor, a victory was claimed by both the contending parties, and there is where the matter must rest for the present at least. Yet it would seem to us that the status of religion and infidelity had taken on a somewhat different aspect in this community—infidelity having become a little more pronounced and aggressive.

The debate, which lasted some four days, was marked throughout by a vindictive, venomous spirit, not only by the worthy defender of divine inspiration, but also upon the part of some of his followers, who were ever on the alert to show a feeling of hatred toward the opposing side whenever opportunity was offered. This action on the part of the Christian element had a tendency to spur the friends of the "bad cause" up to a spirit of resentment. Under such circumstances, deliberate discussion could not be carried on. Personalities were indulged in, outside issues were dragged in, until, at times, the subject of debate was entirely lost sight of, especially when the learned champion of Christianity would relate some "cock-and-bull story" about the ill treatment he had received at the hands of the Monitor, or would throw open some imaginary ghastly wound which had been inflicted upon his person by some one of Mitchell's bloody cut-throat citizens. All this kind of digression had the effect of showing that the divine man was at least weak in the flesh, as all mortals are said to be. The doctor reminded us in his tactics of debate of the minister who was preaching on the text of man being created in the image of his maker, with all God-like attributes, etc. He became imbued with the idea that he was himself peculiarly Christ-like, and in order to test the matter, he proposed to come down from the pulpit and have the congregation come forward and revile him in all manner of ways, for the space of five minutes. Of course, they came forward and stepped on his bunions, pulled his ears and nose, and did other annoying things, all of which he stood with commendable Christian fortitude. Finally, however, a member of the flock approached with a rotten egg in his hand and commenced tapping it upon his forehead. The odoriferous hen-fruit was broken at last, when the imitator of Christ drew his watch and gave notice that he had just one more minute to stand the Christ-like business, and then he would lick the son-of-a-gun that broke the egg on his face. In the wind up of the great debate of last week, on Friday, a great commotion was created by the ladies of the Women's Christian Temperance Union presenting the learned divine Moore with quite a number of beautiful bouquets. This action on their part was followed by the naughty Infidels bringing in their gifts for the little Infidel lecturer, in such profusion as to almost obscure her from public gaze as she stood among the fragrant display of Eastern Oregon's choicest specimens of Flora's world. In addition to the gift of flowers the little lady received the liberal donation of some $32 in cash.

Now, after having viewed this matter in all its varied aspects, and looking at the results as they are, was not the Monitor right in its advice and counsel to our God-fearing people when it admonished them to let Katie Kehm "say her little piece" and depart hence without let or hindrance? Nothing but a stubborn heart and a perverse nature will certainly attempt to throw any burden of blame at the door of the Monitor.

In our editorial columns will be found an article under the caption of "The Aftermath," in regard to the recent debate. Our readers expect us to say something on the subject and there it is. To some the article may seem a little severe, but to those familiar with the facts in the case, it will be looked upon as just. The Monitor did not seek warfare from the first, and would have gladly held its peace, if public opinion and the public good would have permitted. We have been on the defensive throughout. In one instance, at least, our business interests were attacked. A paragraph in our paper was read to one of our patrons and so perverted as to induce him to come to the publication office with the intention of withdrawing his support. The paragraph was again read to him verbatim as published in the entire edition, and all was satisfactory. The paragraph was in relation to the attack made upon the Monitor and its editor at a religious meeting of the Salvation Army. We shall give no names just now. It is possible that any of our readers can guess who did the dirty work to which we have made allusion.

"Katie Kehm Smith, of Portland, the 'champion' of sectarianism in Oregon, met her match recently at Wagner, in the Lone Rock country, in the person of Rev. J. T. Moore, of Mitchell. Kate has a style peculiarly characteristic of an Infidel. She gives what she calls a history of the origin of religion, quoting voluminously from Paine, Bob Ingersoll, Underwood, et al., proving to the 'satisfaction' (gratification of desire) of her Infidel followers, that all Christians are deluded, ignorant fanatics. She came to Wagner to deliver a Fourth of July oration, and elated at the idea of having so much brain in the country all at once her followers challenged anybody, everybody, to discuss the Bible with her. Reverend Moore accepted, and one who was there informs us that Mr. M. handled the subject so ably, and did the lady up so effectually that there is quite a change in sentiment at Wagner, and the good people there have decided to proceed at once with the building of a church."—Moro Observer. [The above sounds very nice, and is a stereotype of the story brought to this place by one of the principals in the contest, but it was not published as reported. We since learned, and from good authority, that the people of Wagner have no thought of erecting a church edifice at present. No more idea of it than they had before the celebrated debate occurred. The "one who was there," and reported to the Observer, can easily be guessed.—Ed. Monitor.]

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communication for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Misunderstanding.

Pelerene Perry and I fell out
(Or Pelerene he fell out with me);
If I should tell how it came about,
You would know as much as we.

Anyway, I was not to blame
(Though Pelerene laid it all on me).
But right in the middle grandpa came,
And took us both on his nice fat knee.
"What is the trouble with my little girl?"
Grandpa smiled so tenderly
That I looked down and pulled my curl.
And said, "Why, Pelli's mad with me."

Dear grandpa said, with a bigger smile,
"Pelly, my boy, do let us see!
Don't pout your lips in that ugly style;
I wouldn't quarrel, it seems to me!"
Then Pelerene pulled at his sailor knot,
"I didn't," he cried; "she's cross with me."
Then all of us laughed and kissed on the spot,
'Cause nobody really was cross, you see.

—Cora Stuart Wheeler.

A Happy Family.

I know a happy family of cunning boys and girls Who have such round and rosy cheeks and pretty golden curls.
In all that they may have to do they pleasantly agree,
And every one of them is kind and good as good can be.
They never call each other names nor pull each other's hair
Nor find the slightest bit of fault with what they have to wear.
They never cry at night because they have to go to bed
Nor ever frown at any one, no matter what is said.
Not one of them was ever known to try to tease
the cat
Or even have a wish to do a naughty deed like that.
When they are asked to do a thing, they never say, "I shan't."
Because they're sawdust boys and girls, and so, you see, they can't. —Nixon Waterman.

Mr. Hudson's Hobby.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Dear Friend: Please excuse the liberty I take in addressing you in the above manner, but I think all true Freethinkers should be and are friends. I am thirty-four years old and have a very limited education—am able to read plain English, that is all. I have always been a Freethinker, though I did not know there was an Infidel paper printed in the world until, about three years ago, a friend lent me a TRUTH SEEKER. Since that time I have read every column, and I intend to as long as I can raise the stamps to buy it, and if I were able I would have every book the Truth Seeker Company publish, but poverty is in the way, so I can get only a few. I therefore ask it of you, as a great favor, to help me select. I have read "Right Living," Ingersoll's Lectures, "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," Paine's "Age of Reason," "Freethinker's Text Book," "Old Testament Stories," "Brain and Bible," and various small tracts, and I like them all. Every time I read a chapter in them I wonder how people with a college education, with a spoonful of brains in their heads, can look a person in the eye and say the scriptures are inspired by an all-wise creator.

Miss Wixon, I have a hobby and I am sure you can help me out. Though I never believed in the Christian's god I used to think I had a something called a soul, which the lower animals had not, but science has never discovered a soul, and if evolution is a fact we are one with the animal kingdom. Now, I have lived in the wilderness all my life, and many are the wild deer I have slain for pleasure and profit, but I am done killing any animal kind unless it be a savage beast, and I don't know but what they have as good a right to life as savage man. The Christians say God gave them dominion, but where does the Infidel get his authority? Some good doctors have said we could live on a vegetable diet, and for three years I have not tasted meat of any kind, and I feel better and can stand hard work better. I used to imagine I enjoyed taking the life of an animal, but now it is a greater pleasure to see them play in all their natural glory.

Now, Miss Wixon, will you kindly give me your opinion on the subject, and what has been written relating to it? They call me a "crank," a "fool," etc., for not eating meat, but I don't care for that. I want them to answer the question, where they get their right to take life to satisfy their appetite? Can you recommend some good book for a mineral hunter? (Am going to explore the Cascade mountains next summer.) What is the best book on natural history?

I humbly beg pardon for intruding on your valuable time.

Yours for justice and truth,

ED. HUDSON.
Armstrong Creek, Wis., Sept. 28, 1895.

[It is to be acknowledged that man naturally requires little if any flesh food to sustain life. Our friend has demonstrated that he can live very well without it. So can and do many others. But it has become the custom to devour the flesh of animals, and most of the people like to be in the fashion. The teeth of man do not indicate that he is by nature carnivorous. His teeth are not like those of the tiger or dog, nor yet like those of the herbivorous animals, as the cow or sheep. But they are of the same nature as the ape and gorilla's who live on fruits and nuts. A great deal of meat as food generates earthy salts in the blood, and is a frequent cause of rheumatism, neuralgia, and carbuncles. There is, also, much diseased meat in the market, which is a prolific cause of disease. One cannot be too cautious, if he must eat meat, in its selection. An animal infected with trichinae or tuberculosis cannot be wholesome food. The editor of the Corner knows of a once bright little boy who was thrown into convulsions, and has become idiotic, a perfect wreck, through the use of milk from a cow diseased with tuberculosis. It is safe to cook milk thoroughly by boiling, as then disease germs are destroyed. The Brahmans eat no meat, and they number 100,000,000. They denounce our custom of killing and eating animals as monstrous, a great shame to civilization.

We are akin to animals of all kinds. We should be gentle and kind toward them. It is a question whether it is kindness to murder and devour them. In Thomson's "Seasons" we read that—

Ensanguined man
Is now become the lion of the plain,
And worse.
Shall he, fair form,
Who wears sweet smiles and looks erect on heaven,
E'er stoop to mingle with the prowling herds
And dip his tongue in gore?
The beast of prey,
Blood-stained, deserves to bleed, but you,
ye flocks,
What have you done? ye peaceful people, what
To merit death? You who have given us milk
In luscious streams, and lent us your own coat
Against the winter's cold? And the plain ox,
That harmless, honest animal,
In what has he offended? He whose toil,
Patient and ever-ready, clothes the land
With all the pomp of harvest—shall he bleed,
And struggling, groan beneath the cruel hand,
Even of the clown he feeds? and that,
perhaps,
To swell the riot of the autumnal feast
Won by his labor.

The best work for a mineral hunter would be, we think, Dana's "Mineralogy." Dana's "Geology," revised edition, is a standard work and comprehensive, but the work on mineralogy is a smaller book and handy to take with one in his rambles over the mountains. "Nature and Man in America," by Professor Shaler, of Harvard University, is also another good book for a companion over the plains and mountains.—Ed. C. C.]

Ethel's Idea of Thunder.

Little four-year-old Ethel recently accompanied her mother on a visit to friends in Nevada county, and for the first time in her life heard heavy blasting in the mines, says the San Francisco Post. Curiosity soon took the place of fear, and her mother was compelled to explain the process in every detail. She told the little girl how the miners drilled holes in the hard rock, filled them with powder, put in a fuse and, after touching a match to it, ran to a place of safety to await the explosion that would break up the rocks into bits. Ethel was greatly interested in it all, and her mother took her to see the whole process.

A few days afterward a thunder storm came up. At the first roll of thunder Ethel inquired:

"Is that a blast, mamma?"
"No, Ethel, that is thunder."
"Do the men make it with powder?"
"No, my child, God makes it."
"How does he do, mamma? Does he touch it off and run?"

How He Fell.

A youngster who lives out in the Southern part of the city, says the Louisville Commercial, had just been dressed in his clean clothes for the evening, and was out on the sidewalk playing with his little friends, when he fell in the gutter and covered himself with mud and water from head to foot. He went home with his heart full of dread. When his mother saw him she threw up her hands in horror.

"Now, what have you been doing?" she cried.

"I fell in the gutter," whimpered the young hopeful.

"By this time the mother had him in her clutches, and, giving him a good shake, asked:

"How in the world did you fall in the gutter?"

"Sideways," sniffed the youngster.

About the Kaleidoscope.

You have all seen and been amused by one, no doubt. Your great grandparents probably enjoyed them as much as you have done, for they were invented by Dr. Brewster, of London, in 1818. They were popular at once, and could not be made fast enough to supply the demand; 200,000 were sold in three months. The study of the beautiful forms displayed by the kaleidoscope is a great pleasure; they are always new, always changing. It is sad to say that the inventor was defrauded of his rights, and reaped but little advantage from the enormous sales of his toy.

What the Little Folks Are Saying.

Teacher: "As the twig is bent the tree is inclined. Do you quite understand what that means?"

Scholar: "Yes, sir. When bicyclists grow up they'll walk stooping."

The kid had smashed his father's shaving mug and done sundry other damage, when his mother discovered him. "O Freddy!" she exclaimed, horrified, "what will your papa say when he comes home and sees what you have done?" "Well, mamma," he replied, with half a smile, "I don't think I would like to repeat it to him before you."—Puck.

The professor was lecturing on some of the habits and customs of the ancient Greeks to his class. "The ancient Greeks built no roofs over their theaters," said the professor. "What did the ancient Greeks do when it rained?" asked Johnny. The professor took off his spectacles, polished them with his handkerchief, and replied calmly: "They got wet, I suppose."

ROBT G. INGERSOLL

The Field-Ingersoll Discussion. Price, paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

In 1888 the Rev. Dr. Henry M. Field wrote an open letter to Colonel Ingersoll, with the intent to convert him. The letter was published in the North American Review, and was replied to by the person addressed. All our older readers know the value of this discussion. To those who do not remember it we can only say that they should lose no time in procuring a copy if they want a controversial treat.

The Ingersoll-Gladstone Controversy about Christianity. Price, paper, 25 cts; cloth, 50 cts.

When the Field-Ingersoll Controversy closed in the North American Review the Christians felt that their champion had been very badly worsted in argument, and the publishers of the Review engaged the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone to attempt to rehabilitate the Presbyterian creed. He wrote a long letter to Colonel Ingersoll, to which the latter replied at length and, it is generally agreed, completely demolished the greatest controversialist Christianity can produce. These letters are now for the first time available in pamphlet form.

Myth and Miracle. Price, 25c.

This is one of Colonel Ingersoll's best lectures, but never before put into print. Everyone who has heard it will most certainly want it, and those who have not heard it will have a rare treat in its perusal, as something new from the Colonel, which also is something that everybody is looking for.

Which Way? Price, 25 cents.

This lecture is a consideration of the difference between the natural and the supernatural, and some reasons why the former is the best way to go. Perhaps no one of Colonel Ingersoll's orations has won more general applause from enlightened audiences than this. It contains that most magnificent of perorations, his visions—"This was. This is. This shall be." The lecture was never before printed in pamphlet form. It is splendid. Send for it.

SOME PRESS COMMENTS:

We have read some of the passages of the commentary prepared for the "Woman's Bible" by that very accomplished American woman and Biblical student, Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton. They are a great deal more satisfactory than many of the commentaries upon the same texts that we have read in other and more pretentious commentaries. Mrs. Stanton's interpretative remarks are often shrewd and sensible. —[Editorial New York "Sun,"

If the Revision Committee continue this style of exegesis, we venture to predict that there will be sensations in the religious world such as no mere man of our time, no Cummings, nor Colenso, nor Beecher, nor Briggs, has been able to arouse. —[N. Y. "Press,"

The chapter published from the advance sheets of the "Woman's Bible" last week very naturally created a widespread sensation. The "Woman's Bible" promises to be an important contribution to the literature of Holy Writ. —[N. Y. "Recorder,"

The announcement that the proposed "Woman's Bible" will soon be published has stirred up many of the clergy. The work will be simply a commentary on certain portions of the Bible relating to the status of women. —[N. Y. "Tribune,"

An association of "up to date" women is engaged in making a new translation of the Bible. This is great news. —[Charivari, Paris, France.

The "Woman's Bible" is a translation by a joint committee of American and English women and is the most serious labor yet undertaken by the women's rights leaders. —[Albany "Evening Journal,"

The Sisterhood of Advanced Women has decided to take a bold step toward the complete emancipation of the sex. It has long groaned under certain implications of servitude contained in a few passages of scripture, and has, therefore, determined to abolish these disabilities by publishing a "Woman's Bible." —[Pall Mall Gazette,

The most marked step in this iconoclastic direction is the movement to publish the "Women's Bible." It is being prepared by some of the good and advanced women of the day, who are met in their many reforms with the stubborn arguments of some of the passages of the scriptures that tend to justify low ideals. Their aim is to omit the immoral teachings of the Mosaic law and all the unwholesome passages. Expurgated editions of the poets there have been, but it remains for the ingenious new woman to devise an expurgated edition of the Bible. —[Minneapolis "Times,"

The theological world of Chicago is thoroughly stirred by the announcement, published in the Times-Herald this morning, that Elizabeth Cady Stanton and nearly a score of collaborators in the persons of distinguished women, will undertake a revision of those portions of the scriptures dealing directly or indirectly with the relative positions of man and woman, and will publish the result of their labors in a new Bible, which is to be known as "The Woman's Bible." —[Chicago "Post,"

PIANOS, PIANOS!

After years of earnest study and experiments, Mr. Adam Schaaf, of Chicago, one of the oldest and most experienced piano manufacturers of this country, has produced what is believed to be the most perfect Upright Piano ever constructed. The instrument is thus described:

"The volume of tone is fully equal to any of the best Square Grand Pianos, while the quality is of the most exquisite musical character—pure, sympathetic, and in the highest degree pliable. Its durability and its capacity for standing in tune, is unparalleled in the history of piano-making. In a word, this piano is made to stand, not merely as an ornamental piece of furniture (it is finished in the most artistic and handsome style), but as a musical instrument—not for a day, but for a lifetime."

These pianos received the highest honors at the World's Fair; Mr. GEORGE STOK, Judge of Awards, the best living authority on pianos, reporting as follows:

"This exhibit deserves an award for excellent tone quality, sustaining power, well planned scale, and excellent action, with easy, prompt touch. Material and workmanship are superior."

The distinguished Pianist and Composer, SIGNOR FABIANI, of the Paris Conservatory, says:

"I have used the Adam Schaaf Pianos, and have critically studied their merits, compared them with those of the best American and European makers, and I find them unsurpassed for quality and variety of tone, responsiveness of touch, elegance of appearance, and reliability in every way."

Having made special arrangements with the manufacturer, who is our personal friend, to introduce these superb pianos, we are prepared to offer them to TRUTH SEEKER readers at the above marvelously low prices—from $50 to $150 less than dealers ask for inferior instruments. Every piano is warranted for five years, and the purchaser is not required to pay for it until delivered. We will pay the freight to any station within 1,000 miles of Chicago. Full description of instruments sent on application.

If you or any of your friends contemplate buying a piano it will be to your interest to correspond with us.

Gems of Thought.

THE law is sacred. Yes, but rebellion may be sacred too.—George Eliot.

FOR truth has such a force and such a mien, As to be loved needs only to be seen.—Dryden.

THE miracle to be accounted for is the incredulity of the Jews, not the resurrection.—Diderot.

ONE fact of human nature ought not to escape the preachers. The way to get people to church is not to forbid them everything else on Sunday with the idea of forcing them to go.—New York World.

LET us reverently, but honestly, look the question in the face. Divorced from matter, where is life? Whatever our faith may say, our knowledge shows them to be indissolubly joined. Every meal we eat, and every cup we drink, illustrates the mysterious control of mind by matter.—Tyndall.

PATRIOTISM is nationally what egoism is individually—has, in fact, the same root; and along with kindred benefits brings kindred evils. Estimation of one's society is a reflex of self-estimation, and assertion of one's society's claims is an indirect assertion of one's claims as a part of it.—Herbert Spencer.

IF a man, holding a belief which he was taught in childhood or persuaded of afterwards, keeps down and pushes away any doubts which arise about it in his mind, purposely avoids the reading of books and the company of men that call in question or discuss it, and regards as impious those questions which cannot easily be asked without disturbing it—the life of that man is one long sin against mankind.—William Kingdon Clifford.

CLING fast then under all circumstances to self-ownership. Refuse all bribes for its sake. Accept nothing which will weaken self-ownership in you or in any other man. If the politician of any party comes to you and offers to make your position better, to render you any service, to build up any public system, by placing restrictions either upon yourself or upon others, refuse his offer. He has no true commission to do these things. He has no commission to dispense good and evil and to make you dependent on himself and his gifts. His gifts are an impertinence and a knavery. The one service and the only one he can perform for you is to increase liberty, to get rid of large bits of his own handiwork, and to surround self-ownership and the consent of each person as regards his own actions with efficient protection.—Auberon Herbert.

HYPOCRISY has always hated laughter, and always will. Absurdity detests humor, and stupidity despises wit. Voltaire was the master of ridicule. He ridiculed the absurd, the impossible. He ridiculed the mythologies and the miracles, the stupid lives and lies of the saints. He found pretense and mendacity crowned by credulity. He found the ignorant many controlled by the cunning and cruel few. He found the historian saturated with superstition, filling his volumes with the details of the impossible; and he found the scientists satisfied with "they say." Voltaire had the instinct of the probable. He knew the law of average, the sea level; he had the idea of proportion, and so he ridiculed the mental monstrosities and deformities—the non sequiturs—of his day. Aristotle said women had more teeth than men. This was repeated again and again by the Catholic scientists of the Eighteenth century. Voltaire counted the teeth. The rest were satisfied with "they say."—Ingersoll.

PREHISTORIC archaeology is a new science. I can remember when neither its name nor its methods were known to the most learned anthropologists. But it has already taught us by incontrovertible arguments a wonderful truth, a truth opposing and reducing to naught many teachings of the sages and seers of past generations. They imagined that the primal man had fallen from some high estate; that he had forfeited by his own falseness, or been driven by some hard fate, from a pristine Paradise, an Eden garden, an Arcady; that his ancestors were demi-gods and heroes, himself their degenerate descendant. How has prehistoric archaeology reversed this picture? We know beyond cavil or question that the earliest was also the lowest man, the most ignorant, the most brutish, naked, homeless, half-speechless. But the gloom surrounding this distant background of the race is relieved by rays of glory; for with knowledge not less positive are we assured that through all hither time, through seeming retrogressions and darkened epochs, the advance of the race in the main toward a condition better by every standard has been certain and steady.—Prof. D. G. Brinton.

Not for Parsons.

SEE: "Rev. Hooper Rupp preaches a special sermon this evening on 'Divas.' Won't you come, Robert?" He: "No; I'm sick and tired of this moral reform business."—Puck.

MR. HAYTON: "If their suit is worth fifty dollars, as you say, I don't see how you can afford to sell it for six-ninety-seven!" Mr. Isaacs (confidentially): "Hark, mein frendt, I dells you somedings! I was a goot Catholic, undt der briest says I must do penance; so I sell's you dot suit at a brice vot nearly bankrupts me!"—Puck.

Two Kentuckians quarreled while trying to swap horses, and immediately shot each other to death. Incidents like these make the disappearance of the horse a desirable consummation. We suppose there was never a horse-trade yet that did not draw the inherent dishonesty of the swappers to the surface with the strength of a powerful plaster. Horse-trading has emptied pulpits and left no church-officer the right to pass the contribution-box. It is amazing that the professional reformers did not prohibit him ages ago.—Judge.

FIRST BROTHER (at Ocean Grove): "Good morning, brother! What a perfectly divine Sabbath morning! What a truly religious feeling pervades this holy spot! It was a heaven-born idea for the founders to look the gates on the Sabbath morning, and thus shut out sin and worldly business." Second Brother: "Amen, brother! Amen! But whither dost thou journey?" First Brother: "Oh, I'm going over to Asbury Park to purchase milk and Sunday papers! Where do you go?" Second Brother: "I'm going over there, too. I want to get some bread for breakfast."—Puck.

CAN Judge Gaynor permit this? We have his word for it that he is "in the hands of Providence," and yet here are a number of his friends trying to remove him from that protecting embrace and arranging a meeting to be held on Monday evening, at which a boom for Gaynor for mayor will be launched. This looks serious, and the judge should realize the importance of preventing his friends from interfering in the mysterious ways of Providence. That he has some grasp of the situation is shown by his plaintive remark to a reporter of the Brooklyn Eagle yesterday. "I wonder," said he, "if I will ever get any one to believe it," referring to his statement that he could not convince people that he "did not want to run for office two years ago," that he "did not want to run for office one year ago," and that it was useless for him "to try further to do it now." Perhaps not, judge; we don't know. But when your friends try to take you bodily out of the hands of Providence, it is time for you to call a halt. How would it do to issue an injunction against the Gaynor boom?—Tribune.

The general reader has probably had a surfeit of apocryphal specimens of "English as she is wrote," answers by school-children to questions in history, etc., but the following samples are genuine, and worthy of preservation. They are taken from recent Sunday-school examination papers, and were quoted last month before the Presbyterian Commission of Victoria by Mr. Wishart the examiner in connection with the "Allan B. Quest": Question: "What is effectual calling?" Answers: "Calling two or three times at once, or else calling all the time." "The work of God's grace whereby we are enabled to live more unto sin and die unto righteousness." "The work of God's grace whereby we are removed into another world." Q. "What is urged in the Tenth Commandment?" A. "Not to be thankful for what we've got." "To do everything without covetousness, and look upon ourselves with full contempt." Q. "Give a proof text showing that we should pray for what is required for the support of life." A. "We should pray that Christ would be kind to our parents, deliver us from evil, dinner, breakfast, bread, and butter, and other requisites." Q. "What two classes of men came to see the child Jesus at Bethlehem?" A. "Wild men of the East." "Wise men of the East offered Jesus the franchise" (frankincense). Q. "What cheering words did the Lord speak to Paul at Corinth?" A. "You shall never see my face again." Q. "Who was the first martyr?" A. "Martin Luther." "Agrippa." Q. "What were his last words?" A. "I am the light of the world." "Be sure and kill David." Q. "What would have saved Sodom from destruction?" A. "Ten righteous persons." "Water—they had no fire brigade." Q. "Why did God command Abraham to offer up Isaac?" A. "Because he was not a good man, and did not keep the Sabbath." Q. "Name three ways in which the Sabbath was broken in Jerusalem in Nehemiah's time." A. "They married infidels, worshipped asses, and trod wine presses." "Hawkers ran about the streets."—"X," in "Harbinger of Light."

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings, that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them: we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

SPECIMEN PRESS NOTICES.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinker's Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

Send us a new subscriber and get the book free of all expense to you. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us $3 and get the book and the paper for one year.

Cheap Tracts for Distribution to Start Christians Thinking.

If you want terse, trenchant reading matter, to act as "Eye-openers," in doing "Missionary Work," convenient to hand to neighbors, friends and all inquiring persons, send for a supply of these valuable little evangelists of truth.

They range in price from one to ten cents each. They are so low in price that thousands of generous hearted persons can afford to buy them for gratuitous distribution. Too many of them cannot be spread broadcast over our land. Sent, post-paid, by mail.

ROBT G. INGERSOLL

The Field-Ingersoll Discussion. Price, paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

In 1888 the Rev. Dr. Henry M. Field wrote an open letter to Colonel Ingersoll, with the intent to convert him. The letter was published in the North American Review, and was replied to by the person addressed. All our older readers know the value of this discussion. To those who do not remember it we can only say that they should lose no time in procuring a copy if they want a controversial treat.

The Ingersoll-Gladstone Controversy about Christianity. Price, paper, 25 cts; cloth, 50 cts.

When the Field-Ingersoll Controversy closed in the North American Review the Christians felt that their champion had been very badly worsted in argument, and the publishers of the Review engaged the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone to attempt to rehabilitate the Presbyterian creed. He wrote a long letter to Colonel Ingersoll, to which the latter replied at length and, it is generally agreed, completely demolished the greatest controversialist Christianity can produce. These letters are now for the first time available in pamphlet form.

Myth and Miracle. Price, 25c.

This is one of Colonel Ingersoll's best lectures, but never before put into print. Everyone who has heard it will most certainly want it, and those who have not heard it will have a rare treat in its perusal, as something new from the Colonel, which also is something that everybody is looking for.

Which Way? Price, 25 cents.

This lecture is a consideration of the difference between the natural and the supernatural, and some reasons why the former is the best way to go. Perhaps no one of Colonel Ingersoll's orations has won more general applause from enlightened audiences than this. It contains that most magnificent of perorations, his visions—"This was. This is. This shall be." The lecture was never before printed in pamphlet form. It is splendid. Send for it.

SOME PRESS COMMENTS:

We have read some of the passages of the commentary prepared for the "Woman's Bible" by that very accomplished American woman and Biblical student, Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton. They are a great deal more satisfactory than many of the comments upon the same texts that we have read in other and more pretentious commentaries. Mrs. Stanton's interpretative remarks are often shrewd and sensible. —[Editorial New York "Sun."]

If the Revision Committee continue this style of exegesis, we venture to predict that there will be sensations in the religious world such as no mere man of our time, no Comings, nor Colenso, nor Beecher, nor Briggs, has been able to arouse. —[N. Y. "Press."]

The chapter published from the advance sheets of the "Woman's Bible" last week very naturally created a widespread sensation. The "Woman's Bible" promises to be an important contribution to the literature of Holy Writ. —[N. Y. "Recorder."]

The announcement that the proposed "Woman's Bible" will soon be published has stirred up many of the clergy. The work will be simply a commentary on certain portions of the Bible relating to the status of women. —[N. Y. "Tribune."]

An association of "up to date" women is engaged in making a new translation of the Bible. This is great news. —[Charivari, Paris, France.]

The "Woman's Bible" is a translation by a joint committee of American and English women and is the most serious labor yet undertaken by the women's rights leaders. —[Albany "Evening Journal."]

The Sisterhood of Advanced Women has decided to take a bold step toward the complete emancipation of the sex. It has long groaned under certain implications of servitude contained in a few passages of scripture, and has, therefore, determined to abolish these disabilities by publishing a "Woman's Bible." —[Pall Mall Gazette.]

The most marked step in this iconoclastic direction is the movement to publish the "Women's Bible." It is being prepared by some of the good and advanced women of the day, who are met in their many reforms with the stubborn arguments of some of the passages of the scriptures that tend to justify low ideals. Their aim is to omit the immoral teachings of the Mosaic law and all the unwholesome passages. Expurgated editions of the poets there have been, but it remains for the ingenious new woman to devise an expurgated edition of the Bible. —[Minneapolis "Times."]

The theological world of Chicago is thoroughly stirred by the announcement, published in the Times-Herald this morning, that Elizabeth Cady Stanton and nearly a score of collaborators in the persons of distinguished women, will undertake a revision of those portions of the scriptures dealing directly or indirectly with the relative positions of man and woman, and will publish the result of their labors in a new Bible, which is to be known as "The Woman's Bible." —[Chicago "Post."]

PIANOS, PIANOS!

After years of earnest study and experiments, Mr. Adam Schaaf, of Chicago, one of the oldest and most experienced piano manufacturers of this country, has produced what is believed to be the most perfect Upright Piano ever constructed. The instrument is thus described:

"The volume of tone is fully equal to any of the best Square Grand Pianos, while the quality is of the most exquisite musical character—pure, sympathetic, and in the highest degree pliable. Its durability and its capacity for standing in tune, is unparalleled in the history of piano-making. In a word, this piano is made to stand, not merely as an ornamental piece of furniture (it is finished in the most artistic and handsome style), but as a musical instrument—not for a day, but for a lifetime."

These pianos received the highest honors at the World's Fair; Mr. GEORGE STECK, Judge of Awards, the best living authority on pianos, reporting as follows:

"This exhibit deserves an award for excellent tone quality, sustaining power, well planned scale, and excellent action, with easy, prompt touch. Material and workmanship are superior."

The distinguished Pianist and Composer, SIGNOR FABIANI, of the Paris Conservatory, says:

"I have used the Adam Schaaf Pianos, and have critically studied their merits, compared them with those of the best American and European makers, and I find them unsurpassed for quality and variety of tone, responsiveness of touch, elegance of appearance, and reliability in every way."

Having made special arrangements with the manufacturer, who is on personal friend, to introduce these superb pianos, we are prepared to offer them to TRUTH SEEKER readers at the above marvelously low prices—from $50 to $150 less than dealers ask for inferior instruments. Every piano is warranted for five years, and the purchaser is not required to pay for it until delivered. We will pay the freight to any station within 1,000 miles of Chicago. Full description of instruments sent on application.

If you or any of your friends contemplate buying a piano it will be to your interest to correspond with us.

The God Is the Image of His Worshipers.

As are the worshipers, so is the god. What they love he loves, and what they hate he hates. He is their magnified but not distorted reflection. If they are cannibals he is a cannibal. If they are cruel he is cruel. If they are Covenanters he is a Covenanter. If they would rob, imprison, and slaughter non-observers of their Sabbath, he will do the same, exceeding their ferocity only because of his ability to torture endlessly. That they would rob, imprison, and slaughter the "Sabbath-breakers" and "blasphemers" is proven by the fact that they think their god would do it. In their thinkers are necessarily born all his thoughts. In their hearts burn all the passions and hatreds that find expression in his edicts of vengeance. If the people in their collectiv capacity do not suppress "Sabbath breaking" and "blasphemy," they will themselves be unable to escape "the penal judgments" of God, says the Christian Reformer (see page 681), and the literature of theocracy is saturated with this poison. But not only may we rightfully infer what the theocrats would do from what they say their god will do, but we have their own specific affirmations in evidence against them. For instance, on February 24th of this year, Rev. Mr. Omelvina, Presbyterian, said in a sermon at Petersburg, Indiana:

"If the government continues as it has for the last twenty-five years in disregarding the Sabbath, it is the duty of the Presbyterians and Methodists and all the rest of the Lord's people to defy it and destroy it off the face of the earth; to rise up as one man and put it down."

The uncompromising anti-theocratic position of THE TRUTH SEEKER has forced the organs of the god-in-the-Constitution party to act very incautiously, as it seems to us. They could advocate the incorporation of the chief Theistic and Christian dogmas in the national Constitution and the enactment and enforcement of the most rigorous Sunday laws, and not run much risk of frightening the masses, for the masses have not very acute powers of analysis, and were quite likely to be lulled to sleep by the sophistical protests of the theocrats against a union of church and state. They could also with comparative safety proclaim their adherence to an antiquated ecclesiastical conception of marriage and divorce and could champion various tyrannies in the names of temperance, purity, morality, and the rest, trusting to the obtuseness of the voters to prevent the latter from seeing through these almost transparent disguises of theology. But when they drop their masks and demand the suppression of a Freethought paper on the ground that it is "blasphemous," they in effect say that from now on they intend to fight openly for the union of the state and the church. They can no longer shuffle; they can no longer darken the waters with the cuttlefish ink of false pretenses; they can no longer with their moralistic shibboleths deceive any but imbecils. "Blasphemy" is a theological crime, and it cannot be made anything else. In defending blasphemy laws, jesuitical casuistry is a sword of lath. Even the few "no-danger" Liberals and the indifferent multitudes cannot fail to perceive that there is a heresy hunt afield when the clerical hounds are baying on the track of "blasphemers."

Now it is to be seen whether on any part of the North American continent it is possible for any government to maintain itself while gagging the press on the frank and specific charge of "blasphemy." Will any government but that of Canada dare attempt to enforce the decrees of the church censors? So long as the issue was certain to be made sometime, we are glad that it is made now. Better now than after the theocrats are entrenched behind a Christianized, prostituted Constitution. This premature attack on THE TRUTH SEEKER may, and we believe will, make much more difficult the task of the Sabbatarians and other theocrats. The revelation of their most cherished desires and intentions comes too early, for them. We believe there is a limit to the gullibility and tyrannical impulses of the American people. We believe that that limit has been reached. Until this hour the champions of "the movement in favor of ignorance" have had matters pretty much their own way. They have succeeded in most of their schemes because they were able to conceal their ultimate purposes from the eyes of all but the sentinel Freethinkers and a few others; the most monstrous usurpations and invasions have been acquiesced in because the people were uncritical, and credulous of fair professions of devotion to "morality," "purity," and the rest of the personal virtues. But when it comes to interfering, undisguisedly in the interest of the church, with the freedom of the press and mails, we cannot doubt that there will be a new alignment of forces. It is too incredible to believe that a majority of the inhabitants of this country are ready to give up their long-boasted liberty of speech and press at the dictation of any combination of churches, when the demand is made honestly in the name of religious dogma, as it is at this moment. The Catholics in Canada and the Covenanters in the United States have been indiscreet; in their eagerness to crush Freethought and Secularism they have come out of the shelter of their intrenchments of deceptiv moralism into the open plain of candid theocracy, and their ranks are exposed front, flanks, and rear. We must make the most of this bad strategy, but we must not depend too much on it for victory. There is more than a skirmish before us.

THEY FEAR ARGUMENTS AND FACTS.

It is significant that while THE TRUTH SEEKER reprints their attacks upon it, the Christian Statesman and Christian Reformer do not reproduce our replies. We are glad to let our readers see what the autocrats have to say in their denunciations, but they do not venture to put our arguments before their readers. If they dared let both sides be heard, they would not be so eager to suppress THE TRUTH SEEKER, for that willingness could come only from confidence in their own position or from a sense of justice at least partially developed. The intellectual and moral bias that keeps our defense out of their columns is the same intellectual and moral bias that impels them to clamor for the denial to us of the privileges of the mails and for the prohibition of the publication of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Cowardly and intolerant in one thing, they are cowardly and intolerant in all.

"Prohibited in Canada," which we print on the first page, is not the badge of our shame, but the badge of shame of the bigot Caron; and all, including the Pennsylvania theocrats, who approve his despotic act, by that approval make that shame their own insignia. "Michael Servetus was burned by John Calvin" is a statement of fact which reflects no discredit on Servetus, but it is an indelible brand of dishonor on the narrow brow of Calvin, the mental progenitor of the editors of the Statesman and Reformer. When Dr. McAllister and his associates say that "THE TRUTH SEEKER seems to glory in its shame," they conveniently forget that it is the time-honored prerogative of the victim of intolerance to "glory" in his martyrdom, and that the succeeding ages always build the monuments to the martyrs, not to those who made them martyrs. There are stones raised in Scotland to honor the memory of the Covenanters who died in defense of such religious liberty as they could conceive, and now their degenerate successors in America are in the forefront of those who would make martyrs of the men and women who are pleading for greater light and a wider liberty. No, Sirs, the shame is yours, not ours.

The stupidity of tyrants is chronic and phenomenal. After all their defeats through all the centuries they still imagine that they can crush thought and stifle aspiration. The plant, weighted down by the stone, will, so long as life lasts, struggle upward to the light and air. Growth is imperative. It will never take "No" as a final answer. The priest or the king or Demos may imprison or kill the originators or acceptors of a new idea; he or they together may do this for ten or a hundred or a thousand years, but in the end defeat will come. One or a score of civilizations may have been crushed in the repressiv process, but the thought lives after the murderers of men are dust. Thoughts are born of organization and circumstances, and while man lives in a world of conditions the suppressed thoughts will recur in old or new forms, in spite of all priests and emperors and mobs. The Reformer realizes that to deny us the right to circulate THE TRUTH SEEKER in the mails might help to increase the demand for it, but, like every tyrant and would-be tyrant before him, the Covenanter editor fondly imagines that sterner and more radical repressiv measures would result in the suppression of the evil thing. To pursue this policy to its logical end means the establishment of the Inquisition, with all its instruments and instrumentalities of torture and death. Just as in the case of prohibitory laws, when one "blasphemy" law fails a more drastic one will be enacted. THE TRUTH SEEKER is not suppressed and is not likely to be very soon, but the assault upon it is a timely notice that the progressive elements have to face the same old vindictiv and unscrupulous foe that burned Bruno and hanged the "witches" on Gallows Hill. There can never be religious liberty where Christianity is dominant. It is the most intolerant religion that ever cursed the world, and the nation that gives it political power is doomed.

WE ARE EXAMINING THE CREEDS OF MEN, NOT OF GODS.

The Christian Reformer says that THE TRUTH SEEKER's "weekly aim is to cast reproach upon Christ and his religion." Whatever clergyman wrote that knows very well that the statement is not true, for we have already disposed of that claim of the proscriptivists. Knowing nothing of "Christ" or of a religion established by him, we cannot throw reproach upon him or it. Our work is to point out the weaknesses and falsities of the religious system which the Christian church avers was founded by a man-god some nineteen centuries ago, and to resist to the utmost of our strength the endeavors of a meddling church to still further curtail the liberties of the people of the United States. When the Christian Reformer proves beyond the possibility of reasonable doubt that the New Testament teachings are really the teachings of a man named Jesus Christ our criticism thereof will reflect upon his ability or character, as the case may be, but until that time comes we are really criticising the human writers, translators, councils, and other individuals and bodies responsible, as we are very sure, for the Bible as it has come to us, these criticisms extending to the ministers who are now expounding it to the people. Our clerical antagonists are very eager to put themselves in the places of their god and savior; they are always ready to insist that when they are attacked God and Jesus are, and the worst of it is that they think they have a perpetual commission to judge and hand over to punishment these "enemies of God," who, after all, are merely the critics of priests.

The ministers have a very infantile conception of law and the duties of officers. They wonder "that any responsible officer of our government who may see a copy of the paper" "does not immediately take steps to stop its publication." Dr. George and his fellow conspirators do not seem to know that there is no law in this country for the suppression of papers; that the most that the "authorities in New York city" could do would be to arrest the publisher if they could find any law that they thought he had violated. But arrest is not conviction, and even if the publisher were sent to prison, that would not "suppress" the paper, unless it ruined its business, which certainly would not follow in the case of THE TRUTH SEEKER. A dozen editors and publishers might go to prison and yet the paper live and prosper. We shall be enlightened if our loving brethren of the cloth will point out any law of New York under which the paper could be "suppressed" or the publisher prosecuted. As to the Comstock postal statute, that is a menace to all journals dealing with domestic and physiological questions, but THE TRUTH SEEKER is not working in that field and we have no fear, for ourselves, of that unconstitutional statute. So our suppression by the "national government" cannot be accomplished "without any delay," as the Statesman confidently asserts that it can. You will have to wait, good gentlemen.

Even if it were true, which it is not, that we are "reviling God and his word, and ridiculing the savior," it by no means follows that we would be "corrupting the morals of the community." Presuming that the morals of individuals are meant, it is to be said with much emphasis that ridicule of sacred books and ghosts is not an immoral action nor necessarily provocative of immoral actions in others; and even if the opposite were true, it is no part of the business of government to forbid such ridicule. That is what the Chinese have been doing, and now all the "Christian nations" are called upon to "avenge" the murdered missionaries. It makes a great deal of difference whose ox is gored. It is no part of the duty of the "civil authorities" to protect the citizen against "blasphemy" and heresy. Thanks to the fathers of the republic, who, fortunately, were not Covenanters, we have no "constitutional provisions" for the punishment of "the crime of blasphemy," and the "suppression" of the journals which dare call in question the fictions retailed by priests at so much per year.

BLASPHEMY UNKNOWN TO OUR SUPREME LAW.

The Christian Statesman, citing the opinions of numerous authorities in law in support of its dictum that blasphemy is an offense under our laws, declares that "this first essential point is simply beyond controversy." This remains to be determined. The English common law is supposed to govern the decisions of our courts only in the absence of positive constitutional or statutory enactments. It is upon this English common law that the theocrats depend to secure the suppression of blasphemy, except in a few states which still retain the blasphemy statutes of their earlier days. But is it not clear that in a country which has no state religion the courts cannot take cognizance of alleged affronts offered to the deities and sacred books of any religion? Our Constitution explicitly forbids Congress to make any law "respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." So far as any laws which Congress otherwise might enact are concerned, this effectually protects the citizen of the United States against prosecutions for blasphemy, and it also safeguards the freedom of the press, including, of course, THE TRUTH SEEKER. Again the Constitution supersedes the common law, and hence as citizens of the United States we are likewise safe from attack for the offense of blasphemy under the common law. But at this point we are met with the proposition that the constitutional prohibition of religious legislation restrains Congress alone, leaving the state legislatures free to set up a state church if they wish and persecute to their hearts' content. Possibly the courts would have sustained this view prior to June 16, 1866, but subsequent to that date they would have been compelled to take account of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution, section 1 of which has this prohibition:

"No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States."

Absolute freedom of opinion and expression in matters of religion is secured to each citizen of the United States by the First Amendment to the Constitution. This is one of his "privileges or immunities." Therefore, when the states are forbidden by the Fourteenth Amendment to make or enforce any law abridging these privileges or immunities, they are in fact forbidden to make any law recognizing the alleged "crime of blasphemy" or enforcing the common law recognition of that offense. This would seem to be conclusively the precedent-inspired opinions of Cooley, Shaw, Story, and the rest to the contrary notwithstanding. In the last "blasphemy" case tried in this country, that decided by Judge Parker in Kentucky, and a part of whose decision we quoted in our last previous answer to the theocratic organs, it was held that the crime of blasphemy was unknown to the law of that state, and for the reason already advanced by us and waved aside by the Covenanter advocates, that is, that where there is no state church there is no state punishment for the rejection of the dogmas of any church, which is all that constitutes the "crime of blasphemy." We believe that Judge Parker's decision would be sustained in the higher courts.

"TO THE ANNOYANCE OF BELIEVERS!"

Until we are reasonably sure that our legislatures may enact and our courts enforce blasphemy laws, we need not devote much time to the consideration of the definitions of blasphemy, nor wear ourselves out trying to discover whether THE TRUTH SEEKER answers to the description of a "blasphemous publication." The definitions given by Justice Story and Judge Cooley have no application to the arguments of Freethinkers of any school, as we have already clearly demonstrated in this and preceding articles. Only Theists can "blaspheme" God; only Christians can "blaspheme" Christ. In other words, only believers owe obedience and respect, for to all others the objects of worship are non-existent. Analogously, only citizens can be guilty of treason to a human ruler, although aliens may wage war upon him directly, for he is a tangible existence and they know him or know of him as such. In the case of the gods and christs, however, no attack is made by the Rationalist upon these dream-children of the theologian, he being concerned only with the claims put forth and the arguments made by men like unto himself. And right here is the real source of all blasphemy laws; in every age priests have found themselves out-argued by skeptics, and the one reason that they could give to which the skeptic had no sufficient answer ready was brute force. The antiquated definitions quoted by the jurists named show this plainly enough. The gravamen of the offense of THE TRUTH SEEKER and other propagandists of Freethought is "the annoyance of believers." Argument against or ridicule of his philosophy or superstitions "annoys" the Christian. Just as the Sunday worshiper is "annoyed" because a train is carrying the mail on the first day of the week on the other side of the continent, so he is "annoyed" when the Rationalist disproves the alleged divinity of his "savior," or Watson Heston pokes fun at the canards recorded in the Bible. But he never sees the other side of this "annoyance" business. The mission of his church is to argue and ridicule all other religions and Rationalism out of the world, but he would be horribly shocked if the "heathens" or the Freethinkers should resort to blasphemy laws to check its propaganda.

The common law upon which Justice Story based his opinion in the Girard Will case is superseded by the First and Fourteenth amendments to the Constitution, as heretofore shown.

"Any ordinary jury in any of our courts" might indeed do as the Statesman asserts, but then it is to be remembered that our present system of selecting juries is admirably adapted to the procurement of orthodox jurymen. That system makes ignorance almost absolutely essential to service on a jury. With juries properly constituted, drawn by lot from the whole body of the people of the given jurisdiction, and judges of the law and the fact, the enforcement of blasphemy statutes would be practically impossible except in a few out-of-the-way pagan corners. The jury represent the whole electorate, and an electorate unanimously in favor of blasphemy laws would be very hard to find in this age of enlightenment.

SOME FRATERNAL SUGGESTIONS.

We hope that Brother McAllister, or McOrory, or whichever one of the other editors is giving that "trumpet no uncertain sound" will not rupture a blood-vessel by his windy exertions; he will find it a long and difficult task, we imagine, to induce the authorities of this city to attempt the "prohibition of the publication" of THE TRUTH SEEKER. As before said, they will first have to find some law under which to proceed before they can "suppress the blasphemous sheet." Would it not be a good plan to convene the synod of the Reformed Presbyterian church and have it enact the much-needed statute? But we suppose that that will not be possible until after we get God and Calvin into the Constitution. However, it may be possible for the two Covenanter papers to be moved to New York, in which event some of the editors might be transformed into "authorities" by means of the alchemy of a "reform" municipal ticket. Then the real entertainment would begin.

Seriously, what would become of civilization if such men as Postmaster General Caron and the editors of the Christian Reformer and the Christian Statesman could control the politics of the world for even one hundred years? They are ambitious to secure this control and they are working adroitly and systematically to this end. It will not do to underestimate their strength, as the many Sabbatarian victories won during the last year and the situation in Canada bear ample witness. It is essential to understand that whoever gives aid and comfort to the various invasive schemes now prominently before the public is playing directly into the hands of the theocrats. All the societies and parties fostering these schemes are, directly or indirectly, tributary to the National Reform Association. They are all recruiting for it. Every step they induce our legislators to take is a step in the direction of God and Christ and Bible in the Constitution. Theocracy, not Secularism, profits by their triumphs. Our work is laid out for us by the priesthood of superstition, now, as ever before, the greatest obstacle in the way of progress.

The New York Sun asks in a not encouraging voice: "If the Canadian people support him [Postmaster-General Caron], what remedy is there short of a long agitation, with a doubtful conclusion? None that we know of; but better an almost hopeless agitation than that silent submission to outrage that never achieved anything. The Sun is not yet denied circulation in Canada, and may not feel called upon to pull an oar in this contest; but THE TRUTH SEEKER is denied such circulation, and, for our part, we intend to agitate, with determination if not with hope, until the mails are free or we are beyond the need of them.

The Christian Advocate says that it is reported that during the Christian Endeavor convention in Boston a saloon-keeper put the sign, "Christian Endeavor Punch," in his window. A policeman ordered it removed. The saloonman denied and defied the power of the officer.

"The policeman's reply was simply: 'If you have no better sense of propriety than that, the police commissioners have a sense of propriety which will forbid them issuing you a license another year.' It came out instantly."

From which it appears that the police are empowered to decide on the "propriety" of tradesmen's signs and to secure their removal by threats of destroying the dealer's business. This suggests some interesting possibilities.

"Philosophy is good enough in its place, but it is a poor match for hunger, thirst, and passion. For hunger there must be bread, for thirst, water, and for the mastery of passion the grace of God."—Religious Telescope.

Our Disciple contemporary forgets that as man must find or provide the bread and the water, so must he, by education, by study and application of cause and effect, and by the development of character, obtain the ability and the desire to keep passion within the limits of rational appropriation to beneficent service. Like hunger and thirst, it may spur to unwise as well as to wise use. "The grace of God," that is, the fervor of religious faith, stimulates to emotional exaggeration and hence tends to weaken self-control, while the study of science not only clarifies the mental vision, but puts a restraining hand on passionate extravagance.

"We are not desirous of having anything to do with such trashy literature as this. I think the postmaster did perfectly right in excluding your paper from CANADA, the less it is circulated the better for it is not fit for a sensible person to read. Especially a Canadian "Canadian Editor."

We have printed the letter of our anonymous correspondent just as he wrote it, presuming that he knew what he wanted to say and how to say it, as certainly must be true of a Canadian editor who thinks that THE TRUTH SEEKER is "trashy" and "not fit for a sensible person to read, especially a Canadian." If we only knew what paper he edits we might be better able to judge of his qualifications for passing on the trashiness of literature, but as we cannot compare his paper with ours we have to content ourselves with the general assertion that the contents of THE TRUTH SEEKER compares very favorably, as regards timeliness, truthfulness, and solidity, with the contents of the average newspaper of the ordinary type. But the meat in this nut is this: If trashiness is to shut papers out of the mails, how will the ruck of newspapers, religious and political, get to their subscribers? Is our "Canadian Editor" ready to pay express charges on his sheet? And what business is it of Postmaster-General Caron that some papers are intellectually less weighty than others? We had supposed that postage was paid on the basis of avoirdupois weight, not mental.

"It is much more easy to disbelieve than to believe. This is obvious on the side of reason, but it is also true on that of the spirit; for to disbelieve is in accordance with environment or custom, while to believe necessitates a spiritual use of the imagination."—Prof. Geo. J. Romanes.

It is easier to disbelieve than to believe the tales of the priest, because the evidence is all on the side of disbelief. That is, for the properly educated man; for the ignorant man, the evidence often appears to be the other way. This fact emphasizes the vital importance of scientific education. It is not true that "to disbelieve is in accordance with environment or custom." All established theologies are supported by environment and custom, and even new theologies are more helped than hindered by them, for new theologies are merely old theologies reorganized—in their essentials of belief in the gods, in good and evil spirits, in life after the dissolution of the body, and in future states of happiness and misery, they are closely akin. As between theology and Rationalism, it is the former that is buttressed by environment and custom. One thing we will admit, that to believe may necessitate a "spiritual use of the imagination," for that implies only the wandering of the untrained fancy into the realm of the unknown, where one guess is as good as another.

Gail Hamilton (Mary Abigail Dodge), the well-known writer, was some months ago very sick and it was not thought that she could survive the attack. But she recovered, and about the first work she did was the preparation of a paper which she recently had read in the Congregational church at Hamilton, Massachusetts. Describing her prostration at Washington and her subsequent experiences, she said that her brothers, Stanwood and Brown Dodge, both of whom are dead, one of them having died less than a year ago, "appeared to her and conversed with naturalness. She sometimes felt that she would like to speak and inquire if she were really in the other world, but found it impossible to enunciate syllables." This is from a newspaper summary of her narrative. It is difficult to understand how a person of Gail Hamilton's natural ability and education can mistake subjective sensations for objective realities, especially in this age of psychological investigations. It is now a commonplace truth that when the rest of the body is sick the brain often passes out from the control of the will, and the impressions registered in its earlier and more plastic state dominate all later and present ones. When the normal person is in normal health those impressions are below consciousness, and are called up only by association or in a conscious effort to remember. It is strange that intelligent people should so often attach more importance to the "visions" of a diseased and perhaps dying brain than they do to the conclusions of the same brain or others of equal or greater strength when in a state of health. The dying person "sees" those whom he has loved or hated and the places with which he is familiar, and "hears" the voices and the music that in years past left their records in the sensitive cells of his brain. The phonograph is unwinding its endless scrolls, the kinetoscope is flashing its millions of impressions, and the dulled senses catch here and there a note, or envision now and then a picture from the galleries of the Past.

The pastor of Grace Episcopal church, Rev. Dr. William R. Huntington, preached on a recent "Sabbath" on the Sunday law question. This he did at the request of the New York Sabbath Committee. He declared that the essence of Sabbath observance "consists in the setting apart, in the name of God [italics ours], of one-seventh portion of time as time is reckoned by days, for absolute immunity from toil." Whether this one-seventh of time should be the first or seventh day he said was immaterial; "the discovery of the sphericity of the earth has made all wrangling about that point absurd." Now this is rank heresy, for the true believer and acceptor of the Bible as the word of God has nothing whatever to do with considerations involved in the discoveries of scientific men. Dr. Huntington knows that God set apart one-seventh of time for rest and worship—at least, he says that he knows this. But how does he know it? Clearly his only source of information is the Bible—the Bible, which he, as a Christian minister, is bound to accept and obey. The Bible writers knew nothing of a spherical earth and nothing of the modern Christian pretense that any one-seventh of time would do just as well as Saturday. The Bible distinctly says that the seventh day is the Sabbath, not the seventh portion of time, and probably there is no one who has a more lively appreciation of this fact than Dr. Huntington himself. If it be true that the Christian need not care which day, Saturday or Sunday, is observed, it is pertinent to ask the persecutors of the Seventh-Day Adventists what grounds of complaint they have against these people. As they observe one-seventh of the time, Saturday, as a Sabbath, why are they fined, imprisoned, and put in the chain-gang for working on Sunday? When Dr. Huntington talks of "absolute immunity from toil" on the Sabbath day, does he forget that he draws his large salary in return chiefly for the work he does on the first day of the week? Does he forget the Sunday services of his sexton, his ushers, his organist, his choir singers? Did he never take thought of the coachman and outriders of his fashionable parishioners, nor of the horses whose lines they hold under the summer sun or in winter's cold, through the hour or more of his preaching? Are his house-servants excused from all work on Sunday? Hypocrisy is the deadliest vice of our time, as it is the most prevalent and fashionable.

For many months this speech has been out of print and unobtainable. By permission of the Colonel and his publisher we have now put it into a neat pamphlet, with fancy colored cover, and a portrait of the speaker. We have included also the "Vision of War," which many have desired to have in compact and cheap form to hand to friends. The price of the pamphlet is ten cents. The "Declaration of Independence" is the centennial oration delivered July 4, 1876, at Peoria, Ill., and the "Vision of War" is an extract from a speech delivered at the soldiers' reunion at Indianapolis, in September of the same year, beginning, "The past rises before me like a dream."

A Paine Exhibition in London.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER—Sir: Our "Thomas Paine Exhibition" will open in South Place chapel, London, on December 2d of this year. I shall be glad if you will make this known, so that those who possess relics of Paine and his American friends may send them to us. The articles should be addressed to "The Paine Committee, South Place chapel, South Place, Finsbury, London, E. C., England." An account of any expenses incurred by those sending loans should be sent to me. The articles will be safely returned to the owners. I may say that we have all of the usual engravings of Paine, but would be glad of any caricatures. Portraits are desired of Elihu Palmer, Colonel Fellows, Steven Grellet, William Carver, James Cheatham, Abner Kneeland, Elias Hicks, Colonel Ingersoll; and we should like to have a picture of Paine's house at New Rochelle, and his house at Bordentown, N. J., if such pictures exist. Autograph letters of Paine, or of his friends (contemporaries), would be very useful, and the utmost care will be taken of them. Those who lend us articles should write their names and addresses with distinctness, so that they may appear in our catalog. The time is getting rather short, and I trust you will give us prompt aid in this matter.

Yours very truly,
MONCURE D. CONWAY.

Lectures and Meetings.

J. E. REMSBURG has finished his work in Texas and now goes to the Dakotas. He will start East about the first of December.

The Old Story in Plain English, with Notes and Comments.

II.

The centuries came and went, and all things seemed to have a general hellward tendency. Every human being brought into existence was doomed to eternal torment. For there was no way on earth or among men whereby one soul could be saved. One would think that a merciful God would cease to bring sentient beings into existence when every one was doomed beforehand to pass an eternity where the fire is not quenched and the worm dieth not and the smoke of their torment ascendeth forever.

Finally, after mature deliberation, he came to the conclusion that bringing human beings into existence only to be tormented forever was not the proper thing for a God to do, so he matured a plan whereby one out of a thousand might stand some chance for escape. There was a young Jew girl who had a child whose reputed father was Joseph, but whose real father was a ghost. The plan as perfected was that everyone who would believe that this son of a ghost was a real God, and at the same time only a ghost, as old as his father, and his father no older than he, and that there was no difference in age, power, or wisdom between God, the child, and the ghost, could be saved. So twelve men were singled out to preach the new scheme of deliverance. They were to be neither naked nor clothed, barefoot nor shod, and were to travel without a cane, and to take neither gold nor silver nor even shin-plasters. Thus equipped they were to sally forth and warn the people against the wrath of God and tell them how they could secure celestial quarters and escape the awful punishment which all had been subjected to since the snake whispered in the ear of Mother Eve in God's little garden spot.

But I forgot to mention that this child of a ghost was born with flesh, blood, and bones like any other child, and showed no signs of its ghostly paternity. It had nursing sore mouth and an awful time cutting teeth, and poor Mary, who had no experience in raising ghosts, was greatly alarmed when he had the colic, and as catnip was scarce the young ghost gave the young mother no end of worry.

The child grew up like any other boy, but owing to the inefficiency of the schools or the oversight of the father ghost, his education was sadly neglected. He betrayed no marks of his ghostly progenitor, only occasionally he vanished out of the sight of his mother, and she was in sore trouble to find him. Although Joseph had been side-tracked by the ghost, yet he manifested greater interest in finding him than his ghostly father did. It is said that during his absence he was confounding the doctors in the temple. No doubt he did confound them, for he has been in the confounding business ever since. He learned the trade of yoke and plow making with Joseph, and became very proficient. It is said that he could make the best yoke and plow of any man in the land. Great Scott! what would Barnum not have given for a sample of those yokes and plows from the hands of that ghostly mechanic? But, like many another misguided man, he left this useful occupation and turned preacher. That's where he got the pin in the wrong hole.

The people did not like his sermons; his language was offensive. He called the people a generation of vipers, children of the devil, and said they could not escape the damnation of hell. Religionists are always intolerant, and like the New England fathers, knowing that the dead cease from troubling, they strung him up after the most approved fashion, as they would any other malefactor, as they considered him.

"Was it for crimes that I have done
He groaned upon the tree?
Amazing pity, grace unknown,
And love beyond degree."

Christians say that this son of a ghost was crucified on account of their sins. There is no doubt about the magnitude of their sins, but how they could sin backward for two thousand years is not apparent.

The sins of the people have about as much to do with the crucifixion of Christ as they have with the death of Julius Cæsar. Christians have put hundreds to death, actuated by the same spirit which crucified Christ. God had nothing to do with the transaction. If Christ was crucified in accordance with God's will, then Judas was only an instrument in the hand of God, and every Jew will be admitted to heaven with exclusive privileges. God must have been imbued with the most savage instincts to contrive to bring human beings into existence for thousands of years when he knew that every soul would be used as fuel to feed eternal flames. Why this plan of salvation was not matured earlier, so as to have saved all who had been born for the last three or four thousand years, is not apparent.

The twelve who were chosen to promulgate this scheme of salvation could talk to comparatively few people; yet there were then thousands consigned to eternal torment every day. Now, does this look like a scheme designed by a merciful being possessed of unlimited wisdom and power? The fate of millions depending upon the efforts of twelve men! Does this not look more like a human arrangement than it does like a measure with almighty power and wisdom behind it?

If this had been God's plan, the means adopted would have been commensurate with the object to be obtained. It has been nearly two thousand years since the twelve were sent out, yet there are millions who never heard of this plan of salvation and never will, and the consequence is an eternal exhibition of fireworks in the lower country. With God all things are possible, yet this slipshod plan seems to be the best he could devise.

After the son of the ghost was born and the redemption scheme had been fully perfected between God, the son, and the ghost, could not some means have been devised so that the minds of all might be impressed with a knowledge of and belief in this universal redeemer, and not have their salvation depend upon what twelve men could do?

Suppose an epidemic was likely to sweep all the people from the country, and a sure remedy should be discovered, would it not be considered the height of folly to send out twelve men to tell the people, when it was well known that not one in a hundred could be informed, and that ninety and nine would die? Would not the press and steam and electricity be brought into requisition, and would not the desired information be spread to the remotest parts of the country as on the wings of the wind?

God could command all of these appliances; why did he not use them? If the state of civilization of two thousand years ago is considered, it will be seen that the means adopted to spread the glad tidings were just such as might be expected. Learn how the people of that period drew their water, spun and wove, plowed, sowed, harvested, and ground their grain, and you will be satisfied that God had no more to do with spreading this goose-spell or gospel than he did with the bungling utensils and implements of that period. Then the idea of God getting so mad that he could not recover his equanimity until he killed himself is too silly for serious thought; and all this because a woman ate a banana two thousand years ago, when God planted the tree and knew she would gobble the fruit just as sure as a minister will go to a circus where he is not known. God knew the consequences of that banana, and instead of taking precautionary measures which would have prevented the necessity of his committing suicide, put the temptation directly before her. Does this not seem more like a legendary tale than the work of an all-wise God?

Recently a building collapsed in the city of New York, and a number of men were maimed or killed. The priest was sent for and went through some farcical maneuvers before they took their final departure. Does anyone of rational mind believe that these hic-hoc horum tricks performed by the priest over the body of a dying man have anything to do with his final destiny? Does it make any difference whether a wafer is put upon his tongue or his toenail? Did God ever institute such a nonsensical ceremony? No, and it would never be practiced if it did not bring grist to the ecclesiastical mills. Does God require one to be plunged under water and to eat bread and drink wine and call them the body and blood of a man who died two thousand years ago, or be damned? Is it not about time to dispense with this old fetich and be governed by common sense?

I do not believe that God ever had anything to do with the actions of men, or that he is partial to a few and will punish the many. I do not believe that he ever appeared to men, or talked with them, or manifested himself to them in any way. Or that he meddles with the affairs of men, or that he cares whether men help and assist each other, or whether they cut each other's throats in the strifes of war. If he had anything to do with the affairs of men he would not allow millions of men to be slaughtered in war, nor would he suffer countries to be devoured by floods, or parched by drouths, nor ships to be sunk at sea freighted with human lives, nor epidemics to rage.

If a man falls upon a rock, God will not soften the rock, whether he be Christian or heathen. It is said that Christ walked on the water, but he never gave that power to anyone to save him or her from drowning. Lightning has no choice between a church and a theater, and sometimes puts a man's light out when he is on his knees. If God would like to prevent these calamities and cannot, then he lacks the power. If he can prevent them and will not, then he is not good.

The truth is, we live in a world which is governed by law, and all the superstitious notions which ever swayed the minds of misguided men, and all the gods which have been fashioned in the minds of men, cannot change one of these laws. If a stone be cast into the air it will return to the earth, and all the gods, big and little, cannot prevent it.

It is said that when Christ was crucified the sun was darkened. That may have been so, but all can rest assured that it was not eclipsed by a dying man. When men get off their knees and cease mumbling to a being which has no existence save in the imagination of men, and study the laws of nature more closely, they will learn that their silly twaddle affects nothing either on earth or in heaven. Until these laws are better understood men will be imposed upon by all manner of supernatural shams and be governed more by superstition than by reason.

Some years ago, after midnight, I aroused some of the people of the village to witness a grand display of the aurora borealis. "Behold the hand of God," said one. "What a grand display of Almighty power," said another. "Can a man look upon that scene and not be impressed with an idea of the existence of a God?" said a third.

There was no more display of God's power in that phenomenon than there is in a cloud or curl of smoke. Though the cause may not have been understood, the thinking mind would say, "Though I do not understand the cause of the appearance, the cause exists, and I see only the result, as I do of many other causes which the wisdom of man will yet discover." But ignorance is prone to put the same imaginary power behind every phenomenon not understood.

From a mite to a molehill, from a molehill to a mountain, from a mountain to a world, from a world to a universe, no action, no change, can take place except in obedience to law.

If water be poured on a grindstone in motion, the water will fly off in the direction in which the stone is turned, and the drops will revolve in the same direction. If the motion of the stone be reversed the water will fly off and the drops will revolve in the opposite direction from what they did before. Every drop of rain which falls from a cloud, every shot which falls from a tower, is governed by the same law which causes a world to revolve on its axis. The motion of every feather and every leaf which flies in the air is governed by law. I have spent hours in watching the motions of leaves as they fall from the trees in autumn. One sails away in the breeze like a hawk poised on level wings, another rolls over and over in the air, another plunges straight down and whirls around and around like the screw of a steamer. I have watched the descent of those leaves and examined them closely. The one that sailed away without turning had a smooth flat surface like a piece of paper. The one that rolled over was curled. The one that plunged down head first with a whirling motion had a heavy head and stem with two flanges turned in opposite directions. Take a large feather and throw it up into the wind a hundred times, and it will show a similar motion every time. Cut the feather in two, and throw up the halves, and see how the motion of the butt of the feather will differ from the motion of the top, and each will differ from the motion of the whole feather.

Such experiments and a thousand others which may be tried will satisfy the reasoning mind that we live in a world of law, and that there is no God in it at all. Study the laws of nature more, shout and sing and pray less, and you will be a wiser and better man.

On the route to the Siberian mines is a station beyond which the friends and relatives of the prisoners are not allowed to go. Here they take their final farewell. Daughters hang upon the necks of their fathers, wives cling lovingly to husbands, and mothers for the last time embrace their sons. Oh! the tears and the sorrow, the tender hand-shakes and heart-breaks that that station has witnessed. Then these poor condemned ones are starved and whipped in the mines until the last trace of independence and manhood is blotted out. They get so benumbed that they take no note of time. They forget the day of the month and week and their age, and even their names. We have in this country at the present time thousands of people who are out of employment and on the ragged edge of starvation. There are families of father, mother, and little children who know not in the morning where they will be at night—perhaps in some barn or nestled away under some straw stack, if some human monster does not deny them that poor privilege. Then think of a mother begging for a mouthful of food to appease the hunger of a starving child. Starving herself, yet more than satisfied to be able to give her starving child a mouthful of food. Oh, if there is a God who has the power to abate these evils and prevent the sufferings of mortals on this earth, and will not do it, then I hate, curse, execrate, and abominate that God with every fiber of my being.

Religious Toleration in Maryland.

There are two facts that conspire to make the history of religious toleration in Maryland of surpassing interest to the student of American history. One is that the lord proprietary was a Roman Catholic; the other is that Maryland, it is claimed, was the first of the original thirteen colonies to establish religious toleration by statute.*

Confronted by the history of centuries of intolerance in other countries, Roman Catholics turn with satisfaction to the history of Maryland, and point to it with pride, as an evidence of the tolerant character of "the church."

After exhausting the very meager materials found in the Old World with which to support the papal claim that "the church" is tolerant, Cardinal Gibbons says:

Turning to our own country, it is with no small degree of satisfaction that I point to the state of Maryland as the cradle of civil and religious liberty, and the "land of the sanctuary." Of the thirteen original American colonies, Maryland was the only one that was settled by Catholics. She was also the only one that spread aloft over her fair lands the banner of liberty of conscience, and that invited the oppressed of other colonies to seek an asylum beneath its shadow ("Faith of Our Fathers," p. 272; edition of 1893).

There are, at least, two fatal errors in this paragraph: first, Maryland was not settled exclusively, nor even principally, by Roman Catholics; and second, religious liberty was never established in that colony either by Catholics or by Protestants. The act of April 21, 1649, was an act of toleration merely, providing that "no person within this province, professing to believe in Jesus Christ, shall be in any ways troubled, molested, or discountenanced, for his or her religion, or in the free exercise thereof." ("History of the United States," by Bancroft, vol. I, part I, chap. 10, p. 168)

The same act provided that "whatsoever person shall . . . deny the Holy Trinity, or any of the persons thereof, shall be punished with death." And that "whatsoever person or persons shall from henceforth use or utter any reproachful words or speeches concerning the blessed Virgin Mary, the mother of our Savior, or the holy apostles or evangelists, or any of them, shall in such case for the first offense forfeit to the lord proprietary the sum of five pounds sterling or the value thereof. . . . And every such offender or offenders for every second offense shall forfeit ten pounds sterling or the value thereof. . . . And every person or persons before mentioned offending herein the third time, shall for such third offense forfeit all his lands and goods, and be forever banished and expelled out of this province ("Archives of Maryland Assembly," vol. I, p. 244. See also Bancroft's "History of the United States," vol. I, part I, chap. 16, pp. 168, 169).

It will be readily conceded that this was very far short of religious liberty; it was simply toleration for believers in the Christian religion. It is true that it was far in advance of any other colony at that time except Rhode Island,† but it was not religious

*The statute to which reference is here made was passed by the Maryland assembly in 1649, thirteen years after Roger Williams and others who had suffered persecution in Massachusetts had established, at Providence, as Arnold says, "a pure democracy, which for the first time guarded jealously the rights of conscience by ignoring any power in the body politic to interfere with those matters that alone concern man and his maker." It was not, however, until March 14, 1643, six years before the act of toleration was passed in Maryland, that the "Patent for Providence Plantations" was issued, prior to which time the legislation of the colony was without royal sanction.—See "Patent for Providence Plantations," and foot note to the same, in "Charters and Constitutions," vol. 2, p. 1594.

†Roger Williams was expelled from Massachusetts in January, 1636. "Within two years," says Bancroft, "others fled to his asylum. The land which he occupied was within the territory of the Narragansetts. In March, 1638, an Indian deed from Canonius and Miantonomah made him the undisputed possessor of an extensive domain" ("History of the United States," vol. I, part I, chap. 15, p. 254.)

This, it should be remembered, was eleven years before the Maryland act of toleration. Moreover, Rhode Island had religious liberty from the first day of its settlement; and five years before the Maryland act of toleration, Williams published and defended in England his views of religious liberty. Bancroft says:

"The principles which he [Williams] first sustained amid the bickerings of a colonial parish, next in the general court of Massachusetts, and then introduced into the wilds of Narragansett Bay, he found occasion, in 1644, to publish in England, and to defend as the basis of the religious freedom of mankind" (Id., p. 255).

liberty. In practice it did not secure even toleration to all believers in Jesus Christ. "The Quakers were persecuted in Maryland as badly as in Virginia and Massachusetts." For example: "In 1658, Joseph Coale and Thomas Thurston, preachers belonging to that body, were treated with great severity by the authorities and compelled to flee the country" ("History of the United States," by Edmund Ollier, vol. I, p. 77; published by the Cassell Publishing Co., New York).

But let us consider briefly the question to whom belongs the credit for a measure of religious toleration in Maryland.

As before stated, Maryland was not settled by Roman Catholics but very largely by Protestants. The charter was issued on the twentieth day of June, 1632, to Cecil Calvert, the second Lord Baltimore. The following November, Leonard Calvert, brother of the proprietary, sailed from the Isle of Wight with two hundred colonists to effect a settlement in Maryland.

The vessels, the Ark and the Dove, sailed by way of Fortune Island, Barbados, and St. Christopher's, and did not reach Maryland until March, 1634. After cruising about in the Chesapeake Bay and the Potomac river, they dropped anchor in St. Mary's river.

Leonard Calvert gained the good-will of the natives, who were preparing to abandon that particular locality, and purchased from them for some cloth and a few axes their right to the soil. Bancroft says:

Upon the 27th [of March, 1634], the emigrants, of whom at least three parts of four were Protestants, took quiet possession of the land which the governor had bought ("History of the United States," vol. I, part I, chap. 10, p. 161).

It is probable that the relative proportion of Catholics and Protestants in Maryland remained about the same, and though the government was in the hands of the lord proprietary, who was a Catholic, it would have been quite impossible for him, even had he desired to do so, to have denied toleration to so large a majority of his subjects. Bancroft says:

In the mixed population of Maryland, where the administration was in the hands of Catholics, and the great majority of the people were Protestants, there was no unanimity of sentiment out of which a domestic constitution could have harmoniously risen (Id., p. 166).

This was about the time of the conflict in England between the Parliament and Charles I., and Lord Baltimore had to look well to his rights in order to retain any authority at all. Leonard Calvert, the proprietary's deputy, went to England in 1643 to consult with his brother, Lord Baltimore, about affairs of the colony. Claybourne was still claiming Kent Island, and the Presbyterians, Episcopalians and Puritans, who formed a large proportion of Lord Baltimore's subjects, were restless under the power of a Catholic, and were desirous of establishing Protestantism, so-called, as the religion of the colony.

In 1645, a petition was presented to the House of Lords, asking that the government of Maryland might be settled in the hands of the Protestants. For some reason this petition was not acted upon, and the "politic Lord Baltimore," says Bancroft, "had ample time to prepare his own remedies. To appease the Parliament, he removed Greene [the Roman Catholic governor], and in August, 1648, appointed in his place Wm. Stone, a Protestant of the Church of England" (Id., p. 167). A very significant fact in this connection is that Lord Baltimore required Governor Stone to take and subscribe the following oath:

I do further swear I will not by myself, nor any other person, directly trouble, molest, or discountenance any person whatsoever in the said province, professing to believe in Jesus Christ; and, in particular, no Roman Catholic, for or in respect of his or her religion, nor his or her free exercise thereof within said province, so as they be not unfaithful to his said lordship, or molest or conspire against the civil government established under him (Id., p. 168).

This shows very clearly that instead of being in a position to dictate to others in matters of faith, had he been so disposed, Lord Baltimore was apprehensive lest religious toleration might be denied to his co-religionists; as, indeed, there was a manifest disposition in the colony to do, and as the charter would have warranted, for at that time popery was outlawed in England.

It was in April of the following year that the act, already referred to, establishing religious toleration, was passed. Bancroft says: "To quiet and unite the colony, all the offenses of the late rebellion were effaced by a general amnesty; and, at the instance of the Catholic proprietary, the Protestant governor, Stone, and his council of six, composed equally of Catholics and Protestants, and the representatives of the people of Maryland, of whom [only] five were Catholics, at a general session of the assembly held in April, 1649, placed upon their statute books" ("History of the United States," vol. I, part I, chap. 10, p. 168), this act of toleration.

It is not our purpose to deny that Lord Baltimore himself was a liberal-minded man; and it is very probable that he entertained charitable feelings toward Protestants. But even had this not been the case, his environment and the circumstances under which he received and held his charter were such that he could not well have taken any other course than that which he did take in securing for his subjects religious toleration. England was at that time Protestant, so-called, and the charter granted Lord Baltimore by Charles I. established in effect the Anglican Church as the church of Maryland. It gave the lord proprietary authority to found "churches and chapels, and places of worship in convenient and suitable places within the premises; and of causing the same to be dedicated and consecrated, according to the ecclesiastical laws of our kingdom of England."*

Speaking of this phase of the charter, Bancroft says: "Christianity, as professed by the Church of England, was established [by the charter]; but the patronage and advowsons of churches were vested in the proprietary; and, as there was not an English statute on religion in which America was specially named, silence left room for the settlement of religious affairs by the colony" ("History of the United States," vol. I, part I, chap. 10, p. 158). But it would have been in flagrant violation of the charter to have established Roman Catholicism, for an express provision of that instrument was that all acts concerning religious establishments were to be "according to the ecclesiastical laws of our kingdom of England."

It will be seen at once that it was quite out of the question for Lord Baltimore to establish the Catholic religion in Maryland;† he did the only thing that was possible for him to do under the circumstances to secure even toleration for those of his own faith; he established religious toleration for all who professed faith in Christ; and the fact that representative Catholics appeal to the history of Maryland, in proof of the tolerant spirit of Catholicism, demonstrates the paucity of such evidence.

But even if all that is claimed for Maryland were true, it would by no means establish the claim that is made in behalf of Rome. Cardinal Gibbons himself states the principle which dominates Rome everywhere. He says:

Many Protestants seem to be very much disturbed by some such argument as this: Catholics are very ready now to proclaim freedom of conscience, because they are in the minority. When they once succeed in getting the upper hand in numbers and power, they will destroy this freedom, because their faith teaches them to tolerate no doctrine other than the Catholic. It is, then, a matter of absolute necessity for us that they should never be allowed to get this advantage.

Now, in all this, there is a great mistake, which comes from not knowing the Catholic doctrine in its fullness. I shall not lay it down myself, lest it seem to have been gotten up for the occasion. I shall quote the great theologian Becanus, who taught the doctrine of the schools of Catholic theology at the time when the struggle was hottest between Catholicity and Protestantism. He says that religious liberty may be tolerated by a ruler when it would do more harm to the state or to the community to repress it. This is true Catholic teaching on this point, according to Becanus and all Catholic theologians ("Faith of Our Fathers," pp. 268, 269).

This is indeed, as the cardinal states, "the true Catholic teaching upon this point," and it ought to be universally recognized as such by Protestants. When Rome grants toleration she does not do it as a matter of principle, but as a matter of policy; and as a matter of policy, partial religious toleration was established in Maryland.—American Sentinel.

*"Federal and State Constitutions, Colonial Charters, and other Organic Laws of the United States," compiled under the order of the United States Senate, by Ben: Perley Poore, p. 812. The original charter is in Latin, but an excellent translation of a portion of it may be found on page 72 of "The Relation of Religion to Civil Government," published by Putnam's Sons, New York.

†The "America Cyclopaedia," article "Calvert," says: "It does not appear that Lord Baltimore, or any of the settlers, had any intention on founding the colony of proclaiming absolute religious freedom, and one of the first acts of the assembly of 1639 was to make the Roman Catholic religion the creed of the state." We have not verified this statement, but the assembly of 1640 declared that the "holy church, within this province, shall have and enjoy all her rights, liberties, and franchises, wholly and without blemish." See Bancroft's "History of the United States," vol. I, part I, chap. 10.

It is requested that friends make a special effort to be present at first session of Congress Friday morning. This is important. Invite all friends. Seats free.

Special to Freethinkers of New York and Vicinity.

It is hoped that every friend who can will be present at the first session of the National Congress of Freethinkers, which will open with an address by Samuel P. Putnam on "Rome or Reason: Which?" This will give the key-note to the Congress and outline its great and important work. We must learn the lessons of history. The experience of the past must be our guide for the future. Do not fail by your presence on Friday morning, October 25th, to help the cause of reason, of humanity, of Freethought. If we can do nothing else, we, at least, can give the cheer and eclat of an enthusiastic audience.

An Appeal.

I hope that every friend of the Freethought cause will contribute something to the work of the Congress and of the coming year. Give what you can. Every little helps. There are the Wise and the Fleckten cases. We must be prepared to defend and maintain our rights, in these, our comrades, who stand for principles of the first importance. We must have money for law expenses, for the publication and distribution of pamphlets, for Congressional work at Washington. We purpose to use every cent to the best possible advantage, and make our small means effectual. Do not be discouraged because you can give but little. If all join forces, we can have a fund at our disposal by which we can push the fight. We must do this, if we would have Freethought in this republic. The aggressions of the church are becoming greater every day. The church is busy with its many organizations. It is constantly on the move. The question of free speech, free press, and free mails is thrust upon us. We cannot be indifferent. Let the ranks close, and let us do our level best. Send all contributions to E. C. Reichwald, of Chicago, or to me, care of the Truth Seeker Company. S. P. P.

Important Notice.

I have not had time to answer the kind and generous letters which I have received from many friends in support of the Congress and its work.

I have been crowded with business and my correspondents must excuse me from not acknowledging by personal letter their good words and gifts. All contributions will be published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I desire especially that those who have forwarded funds to me, or to Mr. Reichwald, Treasurer, will see that their names and amounts are published in THE TRUTH SEEKER; if not in the list, do not fail to let me know at once. The following are the further contributions to the work.

News and Notes.

COLUMBUS AND CINCINNATI.

I found a good company of Liberals at Columbus and lectured on Sunday afternoon, October 6th, as no hall could be procured for an evening meeting. A fair audience was present, considering the limited means at our disposal for advertising. I believe that Columbus, the capital of the great state of Ohio, with a population of 125,000, could be made a center of Freethought work. But it requires time and patience, and some one to take the lead. I met quite a number of staunch friends: Dr. J. B. Schueller, J. J. Burdge, Frank Montgomery, Mr. Joseph Simpson, Samuel Goodman, Charles Augustus, J. H. White, Mr. Pomeroy, Dr. Fox, Adams and others. I must thank Mr. and Mrs. Simpson and their daughter, Miss Ora Simpson, and Mr. and Mrs. Burdge, for their generous hospitality to the pioneer worker, and for their aid to make his labors successful in this important field. Mr. Joseph Simpson's father was a Freethinker in England in the early days of George Jacob Holyoake, about 1840, and was obliged, on account of the Christian boycott, to emigrate to this country. Freethought, therefore, is the inheritance of this family. Mr. J. J. Burdge is a contributor to THE TRUTH SEEKER. He was formerly a schoolmaster, but the Christians were opposed to his scientific teachings and wanted religion and the Bible in the schools. On account, therefore, of the honesty of his convictions he was obliged to seek other means of support; but fortunately, although he did not have the Lord on his side, he had native genius and tact, and could labor both with hands and head; and he is thousands of dollars ahead on the pecuniary side of the matter, besides the possession of independent brains. He has made for himself a place in the world from which all the slaves of superstition cannot dislodge him. He is well informed, a student of science and history, and thoroughly understands the principles of freedom and progress. I enjoyed my few days' visit with him. The time passed pleasantly along, with intellectual and social pleasures.

Mrs. M. M. Lyndol is an all-round active worker. She believes in reform with every fiber of her being. If there is anything to be done for Freethought she is ready to do it. Dr. J. B. Schueller is one of the most influential citizens of Columbus, and has the open hand and heart for the unpopular cause. Frank Montgomery I met years ago, when the first Freethought lecture was given at Columbus, and he is as hospitable and true as ever.

On Sunday morning I attended the funeral of little Emily, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. H. White, six years old. She died suddenly, being severely sick only a day or two before the sad event occurred. It was a deep affliction for the parents, to have the light of home thus darkened. Many friends gathered around when the last offerings were made of memory and love. Only human sympathy can shed its beauty and hope in such experiences of bereavement. In the beautiful sunshine we passed to the final resting-place in the city of the dead. We placed the silent form in earth and covered it with flowers. So must we meet death with mutual courage and devotion, not to forget, but to make its darkness shine with tender stars of affection and remembrance. To our good and true friends, who are ever faithful to the cause, we give our deepest sympathy and respect.

Our Spiritualist friends use the hall in which I spoke afternoon and evening, and I was pleased to hear my radical comrade of Chicago, Professor Lockwood.

Through the kindness of Mr. Simpson I was enabled to visit the great state penitentiary. This has a population of 2,000 criminals—a city in itself. There are great workshops here, and many forms of industry are going on. It furnishes an interesting panorama of compulsory morality. The chaplain here has the biggest audience of any in the city, and, as he says, all are under conviction. This is a model theological heaven. I did not see many signs of intelligence among the prisoners. The idle room, where those who have nothing to do loaf all day, is about as near to hell as anything I ever saw. Such empty faces I never witnessed. I think a little physical suffering would be a relief to this awful stupidity. In comparison the hardest labor is paradise.

From Columbus I go to Cincinnati, and here is always a big and hearty welcome. The forces are at the front. George E. Light, Secretary Allen, Mr. and Mrs. Foster, Silverman, and dozens of others, so many that I cannot name them all, add to the pleasure and the enthusiasm of the hour. I have an appreciative audience and lecture on "Freethought in England," which proves to be a very fruitful subject, and arouses quite a discussion, in which even Liberals differ, for Liberals are not supposed to agree on everything. It gives quite a zest to the debate to have these conflicting ideas, which are the result of honest investigation and not of blind submission. The rattling fire, pro and con, was illuminating and electrifying. I always enjoy Cincinnati. There is plenty of life there.

I am arranging for a Freethought campaign in Ohio the coming December and January. I hope the Liberals of the Buckeye state will make a general rally, and have one or more lectures at every possible point. There are thousands of Liberals in Ohio who ought to be organized for the work. If every friend will do his share, all is well. Agitation and education are the needs of the hour. I want to hear from every friend who is interested in our advance movement. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Observations.

In his speech on the Declaration of Independence, Colonel Ingersoll is generous enough toward the papacy to make the following admission: "The Catholics of Maryland were the first people on the new continent to declare universal religious toleration. Let this be remembered to their eternal honor." The piece on "Religious Toleration in Maryland" on another page of this paper has a tendency to tame the enthusiasm which I once felt over the matter to which the colonel refers; but if any Protestant should be inclined to sneer at the emptiness of Catholic professions of toleration, I would refer him back to the words of Colonel Ingersoll, who, in the same speech, further says: "Let it be remembered to the disgrace of the Protestant government of England, that it caused this grand law to be repealed." Catholics complain that the Free-thought orator is not fair with them, but in this instance he has given them more credit than they deserve. In establishing religious toleration in Maryland the Catholics made an arrangement analogous to that which the hen suggested to the horse while picking up oats under his nose. The hen agreed that if the horse would not tread on her toes, she would try to avoid stepping on his. The priests knew that, in the game they were playing, the odds were with the Protestants, and that at any moment there was liable to be a horse on them.

Protestants, as well as Catholics, are willing to be understood as favoring greater liberty than they intend to concede, and their professed "liberty of conscience in the interpretation of scripture" is a twin deception to the Catholic's "religious toleration." The Reformation, during which so many Christians abjured the errors of Rome and embraced those of Protestantism, is thought to have been conducted on a platform whose central plank was "freedom of private judgment," but truth compels the historian to say that this fair-sounding phrase meant only the freedom of the Protestant to judge and reject the doctrine of the Catholic church. A man might use his reason, too, in deciding what certain scriptural passages meant, but he was not at liberty to reject any of them as untrue. The one thing that both papists and Protestants agreed upon was the suppression of unbelief. The Reformation gave us an infallible book in the place of an infallible pope, and the persecution of freedom of thought went gaily on.

And if Catholics and Protestants are deluded in the belief that either one church or the other favors liberty of thought, the citizens who think that his right to disbelieve is guaranteed by the civil Constitution and laws is equally hallucinated. There is no such guarantee, though the right to "worship God" according to the dictates of individual conscience has been so construed. I have never seen a law or a constitution that granted the right not to worship God at all. The fact is that no civil or religious statute acknowledges the existence of the Freethinker; he is de bonis non—goods not administered upon—and is at the mercy of religious and judicial whims.

"Our New Humanity," a quarterly publication of marked ability from Topeka, Kan., is a neoterism in magazine literature. It is for woman, but proud man may read it with profit and humiliation. To the head of a family it is as an agricultural report to the farmer, and contains much information about the preliminary requisites to a good yield—not necessarily a generous yield but a prime one—of children. The popular carelessness concerning this matter of cultivating the race is confessedly great. The question of demand is ignored, and no attention is paid to seasons, to the adaptability of soil to product, nor to the manner and quality of the seeding. The little human weeds that spring up in the household nursery patch are a volunteer crop. The contributors to "Our New Humanity" think that more system might be introduced into this branch of industry. In view of the conspicuous scientific tone of the magazine, it is difficult to account for the generous recognition accorded by the editor to the sentiment of love between persons differentiated as to sex; for love is a totally unscientific and perpetually disturbing element in the human economy. The tilling of the stirp under the influence of this aberration of the intellects would find its parallel in agriculture if the husbandman were to plow with a cannon and plant with a shotgun. "Our New Humanity" contemplates marriage as a habit in which it is undesirable to be confirmed.

Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., contributes to the magazine an instructive article on "Paternal Impressions." It is a matter productiv of more or less curious inquiry why the bachelor president of the Liberal Club has never put himself in a way to make independent observations in this interesting branch of biology.

The Iowa State Bystander is a weekly newspaper published by Negroes at Des Moines, and it is full of unvarnished good sense, especially on the religious question. The editor rebukes the colored people of the city because only fifteen of them went to hear Ingersoll lecture, while three hundred attended a minstrel show. "Hon. Robert G. Ingersoll," he reminds them, "never delivered a lecture without saying something in opposition to oppression of all kinds. Ingersoll took Negro lecturers to his own home and made them welcome, while ministers of the gospel refused to have anything to do with them." Yielding space for a little "plain talk" on religion, the Bystander advises the poor washerwoman who has made a dollar at the tub to sink the coin in her own pocket rather than give it to a presiding elder, who is a "useless and expensiv luxury." Itinerant preachers are condemned, because their tramping about gives them opportunities to lead women astray, as the white preachers do. Finally, the Negroes, says the editor, giving a parting caress to preachers generally, "support too many rascals who are ignorant and too lazy to work." If the colored brother will confer with his white neighbors they may inform him in a burst of confidence that they are in the same fix.

To Mr. C. Dutton, Grand Mound, Ia.: The Sledge-hammer is at hand. Your proposition that the government issue money as it needs it to pay running expenses—presumably to be received back in taxes and canceled—is open to the objection that it is based on common sense, and therefore is fated to be unpopular. Give the public some scheme that is wilder than any in vogue, and the world will extend the glad hand; but introduce for general acceptance a plan that is feasible on its face, and you shall become acquainted with the marble heart. Let us get from off our knees before the throne at Washington, and do a little private rustling. I would call your attention to the Labor Exchange, which is endeavoring to work out the financial problem without the aid of the government. Most of our money transactions are with our neighbors, and it is a great deal easier to make some arrangement with them for the medium of exchange than it is to revolutionize the government. Voting on national questions is as futile as praying to God; and an individual or group of individuals providing themselves with the necessary medium are more practical than the mere voter to the extent that the worker is more likely to get what he wants than the man who only prays. Our government finances are going to seed, as you can see, and it is time that something else was sprouting. The Labor Exchange is a promising germ.

In an article on the deceased Professor Huxley, the animate Professor Michael Foster writes as follows in Nature: "Future visitors to the burial-place on the northern heights of London, seeing on his tombstone the lines—

'And if there be no meeting past the grave,
If all is darkness, silence, yet 'tis rest.
Be not afraid, ye waiting hearts that weep,
For God "still giveth his beloved sleep,"
And if an endless sleep he wills—so best'— will recognize that the Agnostic man of science had much in common with the man of faith." Apparently that is true. Future visitors to Huxley's grave, reading the Theistic inscription upon his tombstone, will observe that he shared the common lot in having a family of such unscrupulous piety that they could not even leave him to the eloquent silence of death, but must make him seem to voice sentiments that he never held while living. Some men of faith doubtless have wives who do not respect their opinions—and in this regard Professor Huxley "had much in common" with that class.

GEO. E. MACDONALD.

The Attack Renewed.

From the Christian Reformer.

Since the discussion of the blasphemous character of THE TRUTH SEEKER in these columns that paper has been excluded from the mails in Canada. The Editor and manager of THE TRUTH SEEKER wrote to the post-office department in reference to the matter, and in his reply the secretary said: "The postmaster-general cannot quote the date of the issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER to which his attention was called, nor specify the particular article, or articles, which, at the time, seemed to him more especially open to the charge of scurrility or blasphemy. He had no hesitation, however, in deciding—and his opinion was supported by that of the minister of justice—that, on account of the character of its contents, the paper was one which, under the law, ought to be excluded from the mails of this country."

This prohibition is being used by the paper to advertise itself. It prints the badge of its shame on the first page above the heading, in bold type, "Prohibited in Canada." The post-office authorities of that country have set a good example to our own postmaster-general. But this action does not reach far enough. The paper is no doubt being sent into Canada, and there may be a larger number of copies distributed by other agencies than ever went through the mails. And it is probable that the exclusion of the paper from our own mails would increase the demand for it among a certain class of readers. Curiosity to see the prohibited sheet would lead many to purchase it. All in all the publishers would no doubt regard exclusion from the mails as a most acceptable gratuitous advertisement. And they would be content to seek other means of distribution if only the demand for the paper were largely increased.

The only radical cure for the evil is the suppression of the publication on the ground of its blasphemy and its injury to the public welfare. The fact of its blasphemous character is beyond all question. Its weekly aim is to cast reproach upon Christ and his religion. The only wonder is that any responsible officer of our government who may see a copy of the paper with its profane ridicule of the Lord Jesus Christ does not immediately take steps to stop its publication. And once more we call upon the authorities in New York city to deliver themselves and the city and state and nation from this burning disgrace.

Where does the guilt of the blasphemy of this publication rest? Primarily, of course, on the publishers. They send it out week by week on its errand of reviling God and his word, and ridiculing the savior, and thus corrupting the morals of the community. But the civil authorities are placed in office for the purpose, among other things, of protecting the people from all such injuries. And if they permit the continued commission of the criminal and injurious acts, the guilt of the said crimes and injuries passes over also to them. And if, in their sovereign place back of the officers of the government, the people permit such dereliction of official duty, the guilt of the blasphemy rests finally upon them. As the real sovereign under God the people are bound to lay down in fundamental law such rules of conduct for the government as will keep it in harmony with the divine law. And if from the want of necessary constitutional provisions, or from the failure to demand the faithful execution of them and of statutes resting on them when they are enacted, the crime of blasphemy goes unchecked, the sovereign people are in the last analysis responsible for it. They are the depositories of the rightful authority of civil government. If they do not use that authority faithfully for the ends for which it is given they are responsible to God himself, and he will hold the sovereign people to a strict account. The individual blasphemers may escape punishment from the government, but the unfaithful people will not escape the penal judgments of him who proclaimed amidst the thunders of Sinai the law which reads: "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain; for the Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain."

From the Christian Statesman.

Our charge against THE TRUTH SEEKER of New York has stirred up the wrath of that journal. It denies the charge, as a matter of course; and affirms besides that there can be no such crime as blasphemy where church and state are not united. We do not think it necessary to reprint the citations already made from Judge Cooley's authoritative work on "Constitutional Limitations," nor to give once more the references to other recognized authorities in American law, such as Bouvier, Burrill, Bishop, Wharton, Chief Justice Shaw of Massachusetts, and Justice Story of the United States Supreme Court. Those and other high authorities, too numerous to mention, define blasphemy as an offense under our laws. This decision has been given over and over again in our courts which recognize no union of church and state as existing among us. This first essential point is simply beyond controversy.

The second point is equally clear. THE TRUTH SEEKER is a blasphemous publication. It could not be more accurately described than it is in the standard definitions of blasphemy. For example, Justice Story, in the celebrated Girard will case, said that the divine origin and truth of Christianity are admitted in our law, "and therefore it is not to be maliciously and openly reviled and blasphemed against to the annoyance of believers or the injury of the public." Judge Cooley defines blasphemy as "contumelious reproaches and profane ridicule of Christ;" and again, as "purposely using words concerning the Supreme Being calculated and designed to impair and destroy the reverence, respect, and confidence due to him as the intelligent Creator, Governor, and Judge of the world."

Every issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER comes under all these definitions. Its aim is to scatter abroad contumelious reproaches and profane ridicule of Christ. In the most shocking pictures, with texts of Scripture underneath them, it heaps ridicule and contumely on the Savior. It maliciously and openly reviles and blasphemes against Christianity and its divine author to the annoyance of believers and the injury of the public. It purposely uses both pictures and words "to impair and destroy the reverence, respect, and confidence due to God as the Creator, Governor, and Judge of the world." Any ordinary jury in any of our courts with the legal definition of blasphemy and sample copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER taken at random from its issues for months and years before them would pronounce its publishers guilty of blasphemy.

Since our arraignment of this sheet for blasphemy about a month ago it has been excluded from the mails of Canada. The character of the sheet was brought to the attention of the Canadian postmaster-general, A. P. Caron, Esq., and the secretary writes in reply to an inquiry from a subscriber who no longer received his paper: "He [the postmaster-general] had no hesitation in deciding—and his opinion was supported by that of the minister of justice—that on account of the character of its contents, he paper was one which, under the law, ought to be excluded from the mails of this country." In the same connection it is said that the paper is "open to the charge of scurrility and blasphemy." THE TRUTH SEEKER seems to glory in its shame, and parades on its first page in large type above the title, the words, "Prohibited in Canada." It says, however, that it "still reaches its friends in Canada, and will continue to reach them until there is some other turn of the machine." We hope the Canadian government will prove equal to this new emergency.

And now we again give the trumpet no uncertain sound, and call upon our authorities to do what the post-office authorities of Canada have most righteously done. The guilt of the awful blasphemy of this paper will be shared by the United States government, if, after attention is called to the character of its weekly contents, the administrators of our post-office continue to distribute it throughout the land.

This is the present urgent duty of our national government. And this can be done without any delay. But the civil authorities of New York city have a further duty resting upon them. And that is the prohibition of the publication of the paper which week by week defiantly tramples under foot the law of the commonwealth. Here, again, the principle holds good that when the executors of the law tolerate crimes which the law was intended to prohibit they become guilty of the crimes themselves. The only way for the officers of government to clear their skirts is to suppress the blasphemous sheet.

MR. EDITOR: You will remember that I pledged myself to get a subscriber or pay the price of a year's subscription extra. So please find $3 within, for which send THE TRUTH SEEKER and "Pictorial Text-Book" to Mrs. Hattie Lothrop. I feel very glad to get a subscriber. Have also set a great many Christians (who did not know why they were Christians) to thinking very seriously. None of them can even begin to answer the Freethinker's argument. You will find twenty-five cents in stamps to pay for five copies of "The Bible God Disproved by Nature."

Canadian Government Disgraced.

NAUGATUCK, CONN., Oct. 9, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find five cents, for which please send me sample copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am going to subscribe, and I want to find how much the price is. I see by the New York Sun that your paper is excluded from the mails in Canada. It is a disgrace to the government.

CLARENCE CURRIER.

The West Extends Its Arms.

LEVON, UTAH, Oct. 3, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Herewith find $5 to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for two years. There is a great opportunity here in the West for Freethought if some of our leading Liberals would give us a call. To Ingersoll would be tendered an ovation such as a candidate for the presidency could not command, even from members of his own party. Yours for progress,

GEO. LARSON.

Every Little Helps.

NEW HAVEN, O., Oct. 10, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me pamphlet: "Woman: Four Centuries of Progress," by Susan H. Wixon. I want to pass it around to the women here. I wish I had more means to spend for reading matter. I am trying to do all I can for the spread of Freethought here; I give away all the books and papers that I get to any who will read them.

Yours in truth and liberty,

THOS. S. CHARITY.

Not a H Holiday Parade.

TERRE HAUTE, IND., Oct. 9, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose you herewith $2, which pays up back subscription. Hope you can knock out those infernal Canadian bigots. Of course it's blasphemy to them; anything is if contrary to their religious prejudices, but, then, we have to fight such bigotry everywhere. The Sunday closing is just one phase of the fight, and if I am not mistaken there's hot work ahead.

FRANK D. BLUE.

Wants to Help Most Effectively.

CHICAGO, ILL., Oct. 4, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose you $1.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I have often proposed to myself that I would pay what I had used up of my subscription and stop my paper. But I could not see how that would help you. I want to keep it as long as I can, and when I cannot afford to take it any longer I shall be very sorry, indeed.

Will send you the balance in a few days.

Very truly yours, JNO. HUDSON.

That is What We are Here For.

GREEN COVE SP'GS., FLA., Sept. 26, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Just arrived here, having been away a long time, and find my TRUTH SEEKER comes regularly, though I am sadly in arrears. I inclose you $3, which will bring it up to Nov. 1, 1895, and will remit you later for subscription in advance. I have looked over a few of the late papers and find you are yet hammering away at and trying to enlighten the "Christians." Keep up the good work and believe me, I remain, Very truly yours, JOHN M. HOWARD.

From the Land of the Theocrats.

LITTLE COOLEY, PA., Oct., 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3, which please credit on my subscription. I expect to read THE TRUTH SEEKER while I live, if the theocrats do not succeed in suppressing it. It is worthy of every man's support. That there is a person in America who considers its pages "indecent," "scurrilous," or "blasphemous," passeth my comprehension. But any adverse comment upon the sacred myths of the past has always been thus looked upon by the pious pilots to the skies.

Yours truly, F. M. MORTON.

God-Crazy People Always Dangerous.

CANAL DOVER, O., Oct. 7, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $12. You will give me credit for $6 for two years for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and give Mr. S. P. Putnam the other $6 to be applied to expenses of the Freethinkers' Convention. I hope the superstition of Canada will not succeed in barring your paper from that priest-ridden country, but this attempt is only a repetition of history. God-crazy people are liable to do anything, because their brains are subservient to their hearts; Jehovah says the heart is very wicked, and I believe this holds good in the Christians especially. Wishing you success,

Yours, S. TOOMEY.

More Subjects for Heston.

FOREST GROVE, OR., Sept. 27, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find postal-order to pay up my TRUTH SEEKER to January. Of course you have heard of our great loss, the death of Katie Kehm Smith. She was the life of the Liberal cause in Oregon. We keep the Freethought library open, and will, probably, also run the Sunday-school this winter. At the present all the ungodly are off picking hops. We are glad that Our Put. has landed, and not been swallowed by a whale. Tell Heston he has not illustrated the threshing machine spoken of in Isaiah xli, 15, 16. Also Jesus being hung on a tree (Acts v, 30; x, 39; Galatians xi, 3-13; 1 Peter ii, 24).

Yours truly, M. R. CHENEY.

An Awkward Question in a Daily.

ANAHEIM, CAL., Oct. 2, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: In the Los Angeles Herald of September 15th, is asked the question, "What is God?" This paper is a daily and weekly and has a very large circulation. I am a subscriber and can say I never before found so direct a question in it regarding God. I was surprised to see the answers as given by most of the Los Angeles reverends. I firmly believe the questioner is not satisfied with their opinion. I would like to see your answer published in "Letters of Friends," not only on the subject, "What is God," but also where is heaven? What is the devil? Where are hell, soul, spirit, ghost, and goblins? [The answer to these questions is very short. These things exist only in the imaginations of believers in them.—Ed. T. S.] My own answer is that all are superstitious beliefs created by the action of the brain in man without forethought and reason.

Although my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER has not expired, I desire to renew it for another year. Inclosed find $5 50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER with premium ("Pictorial Text-Book") and the pamphlets named.

R. LUEDKE.

A Rhode Island Well-Wisher.

WOONSOCKET, R. I., Oct. 4, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I beg you many pardons for not remitting before. I have no excuse to offer except it is that I did not have the dust to send. I appreciate your kindness in sending me the best of all papers just the same; would not have found any fault if you had stopped my paper when the subscription expired, but should have missed it very much. I hope I may be able to take and pay for it as long as I live. Please find inclosed $3. I would like to be able to send you a thousand times as much to carry on the battle against the would-be destroyers of our liberty, but as I cannot I will hope that you will come off more than victorious.

WM. SLATER MOURY.

Is Better Satisfied than Caron.

UNDERWOOD, MINN., Oct. 8, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1 to apply on subscription. We farmers are hard up at present; and please accept my thanks for carrying me as far as you did—it is not the first time, and I don't suppose it will be the last. I have taken your paper for about ten years, and hope to stay with you a good many years more. It is the only Freethought paper I take. There are other good papers in that line, but there is only one E. M. Macdonald. G. M.'s Observations are very interesting reading, too, and Heston's pictures are very handy for people who can't read; with a little explanation they will open the eyes of old people who have never seen before.

Yours truly, KRIST WILSON.

A Common Misapprehension of "Infidelity."

CHICAGO, ILL., Oct. 6, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 to pay on subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year. I find it most difficult to make the acquaintance of the right sort of "Liberals." A number of addresses have been given me as those of Infidels, but they are found usually to be a mild kind of Christian, or of a misguided class of Infidels who send their children to Christian Sunday-schools, and do not wish to be exposed in their deceit, even to their children.

I am now directing my work among the colored citizens of this city, and, singularly enough, it promises better results. It is rare, indeed, to find a doubting Thomas among those people, but he is generally a radical when one is found.

Yours truly, E. G. TAYLOR.

Many of These Big Collections This Year.

WACO, TEX., Oct. 7, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I hand you $1 for eight copies of the "Age of Reason" for distribution to Christians, with the hope that it may be the means of setting them to thinking and eventually get them "converted."

I have just read your item in this number of THE TRUTH SEEKER in regard to the camp-meeting in Maine and the giving of jewelry, etc. The same thing happened at the Holiness camp-meeting in August. The extremists gave their jewelry, etc., amid tears and shouting, and a good time generally. Some one aptly remarked that the collection would have made a very good commencement for a "pawnshop."

With best wishes for yourself and THE TRUTH SEEKER, I am, yours truly,

WILL A. KIRK.

He Approves Anti-Theocratic Work.

COCOANUT GROVE, FLA., Oct. 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: While sending you $4.50 for a year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER and "Cosmian Hymn-Book," I would also send the assurance of my genuine appreciation of the good and effectual work being done by the paper. The pictures speak plainer than words and are, I believe, more effectual often in causing people to think.

I like your constant method of keeping strictly to business and fighting the encroachment of unjust laws on the rights of Freethinkers and Liberals in compelling them to pay for the support of churches, by the exemption of church property from taxation; teaching religion in school-houses that all are compelled to support, also restricting the rights of Liberals to Sunday recreation and amusement. All to enable priests and preachers to do more work and earn more shekels on their business day.

It seems to me that constant agitation and work must eventually bring redress and justice.

SAMUEL RHODES.

Let Your "Think Fixtures" Work.

SANTA ANA, CAL., Oct. 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $3.50. Please extend my subscription one year, and send "Old Testament Stories," as per advertisement. I am sorry I could not come to the front with my renewal sooner, and I thank you for sending the paper regularly, just as you did before my subscription expired.

The Rev. J. H. Allen proves by astronomy and God that the earth is just 5,666 years old, and Prof. J. L. Wortman proves by geology and Adam that man existed on this earth at least 1,500,000 years ago. The reverend gentleman and God differ with the professor and Adam 1,494,334 years. Now the question arises: Which party produces the most credible evidence? Are both theories correct with that string of seven figures between them? I would answer both questions in the words of our Colonel: "He that hath brains to think, let him think."

The only thing necessary to make any man, woman, or child see the utter absurdity and inconsistency of the clergy and their book, is to take off the fetters from their brains and give their "think fixtures" a chance to work.

I am sincerely yours for "truth."

They are Already United.

HAVERHILL, MASS., Sept. 29, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I write you from Massachusetts, the state in which the "cradle of Liberty" is supposed to rock, to inform you that Massachusetts liberty is like the "Flying Dutchman," a myth—a delusion of the first water.

The American Protective Association was organized principally to keep church and state separate, but at present the order is controlled by religious cranks of the "believe or be damned" stripe. It is a great school, and I believe will work out all right in time.

Liberals and truth seekers are numerous enough, but are not aggressive enough for their own protection. A little persecution, which they are sure to have in the near future, will do them good. If Ingersoll and other Freethought advocates would fix up a plan for a social organization similar to the church, and for education in and protection of their rights, it would be a great boon to the oppressed for conscience' sake, and would, I believe, maintain the rights of a free people.

Church and state must be separated, not "kept separate," as it is termed now, for they are already united and viciously at work. But the days of church oppression and religious persecution are numbered. If they carry things too far they will find two can play at the same game, and it needs no prophet to foretell the outcome. Religion of to-day puts one in mind of a late snow in the spring, around under the walls and fences, while the great fields, where the sun shines, are being plowed and planted with good seed.

Yours for liberty, E. E. DEMERITT.

An Answer to Dr. McAllister & Co.

SULTAN, WASH., Oct. 6, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: We assure you that we fully understand the situation of THE TRUTH SEEKER in Canada, also what certain Christian papers in the United States have published regarding your very able and noble effort in behalf of religious freedom and full liberty for all mankind. We know you must have money to carry on the publication of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and we have really suffered in our mind for the reason that we could not spare the money to pay our subscription. The editorials in any number of your paper are worth a year's subscription, while it would be very hard to set a price on those splendid and instructiv letters of Mr. Samuel P. Putnam. "News and Notes" will be read more extensively in the future and with deeper interest than they are at the present time. Who can set a price on "Observations?" Wherever the blow is aimed, it falls on priest or church with telling effect. Without a doubt THE TRUTH SEEKER is the most instructiv paper of this age, and it is for this reason that it is being persecuted by the followers of the mythical God-Christ. My family and myself have held fast to $3, and were intending to send the same to THE TRUTH SEEKER. We have a fine property here, yet we found it impossible, during the last two years, to sell anything for cash. The times now have a more cheerful appearance, and we expect to soon do more for your paper than we have yet done. My family are all girls—seven of them, two married, and five at home. Mrs. Peak, my wife, wants me to tell you that if THE TRUTH SEEKER is in any manner persecuted, you can depend upon substantial help from us. You will find inclosed $3 to apply on subscription, and will soon send you more. We will stand firmly by The Truth Seeker Company, and you will please excuse this roughly-written letter, while we remain, Fraternally yours, R. B. PEAK.

That's the Way to Talk to Them.

LORAIN, O., Oct. 6, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: An accident occurred here to-day that well illustrated the tender and loving mercy of God. At the laying of the corner-stone of a Catholic church, a platform was built on which the people might stand to witness the ceremony. It broke down and seventeen people are now in the hospital and about seventy injured; one little innocent babe killed, and they say seven more will die. This is from latest reports, and is as near correct as I can learn, as we all know it is hard to learn the truth from eye-witnesses, and two persons seeing the same occurrence will give contradictory accounts. Had it been a gathering of disbelievers, hundreds would have said it was a just punishment on them sent by God for their unbelief. About six months ago this same church was burned down and the women of the house where I roomed, being awakened by the fire gong, came and called my room-mate and me, telling us that St. Mary's church was on fire. As soon as I learned the cause of the commotion, I went back to bed, saying: "That being the case, my assistance is not needed, for it is God's house, and if he don't want it to burn he can put out the fire much easier than I can;" and later, when they wanted me to contribute for rebuilding, I said: "Why, if God made the earth in six days he can certainly build churches much easier than I can, and if he had wanted that one he would not have burned it down." This kind of logic could not be reasonably answered, so they invariably ended by saying, "Oh, you are one of those unbelievers!"

Lorain is a place of some 12,000 population, and has an orthodox mayor. He wants to have all business stopped on Sunday, and just a short time ago a Hebrew was arrested and fined $10 and costs for selling a thirty-six-cent shirt on Sunday. This is outrageous, and I think there will be a change in the mayoralty the next election.

We think of having Rensburg here to lecture in November, as we learn he will be through these parts. It is going to be hard to find a hall suitable for the purpose, and I do not know whether we will be successful or not.

Wishing you well, I am, yours truly,
HARLAN C. WILLIAMS.

More About "The Labor Exchange."

BAY CITY, MICH., Oct. 8, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I notice recently an item in THE TRUTH SEEKER concerning The Labor Exchange, and thought perhaps your readers would appreciate a short letter about it.

Early in 1890 G. B. DeBernardi and others presented a petition to the circuit court for one of the counties of Missouri, asking that a benevolent association called The Labor Exchange might be organized, and in March the petition was granted and the association duly started forth. This is the parent body or Central organization, the balance of the association consisting of "branches" established wherever fifteen or twenty people can be found who prefer co-operation to competition as a social and business system.

One dollar is asked of each member as a life membership fee, which is devoted to paying certain expenses which cannot be paid with the sort of currency provided by the association.

This currency is issued as follows: A member produces some article, or does some work for the branch in its business; he brings the article to the branch, or performs his labor, and the branch issues to him a "certificate of deposit" showing that he has deposited so much labor, or so much value in the article, at the going market price, for example: One day's work at $1.50, or one pair of shoes at $2. The member has an account opened with him, and under the obligation and agreement entered into when they become members, all members will accept such certificate in payment for labor or articles, and it is intended to circulate similarly to money among all the members. It may circulate outside the membership if accepted but such is not the intention, so not conflicting with United States laws. Although issued only to members, the certificate may be presented for redemption at the branch by anyone, when it is canceled on being redeemed by the branch turning over to the person presenting it goods which it may have on deposit, or can readily get for such person. As it is issued to the member individually, he must indorse it like a check before disposing of it, and it is negotiable in the same manner as a check. Small change is provided for up to $5, which, when it returns to the branch, is not canceled, like the certificates.

A producer deposits what he has produced, and the branch, by its manager, issues him certificates, thus there is always a demand for products at the market value, and if one can make anything, he can have circulating medium, or money. It thus encourages the unemployed. Non-producers who have their income in United States dollars can "produce" in this way: By buying for cash goods at wholesale and depositing same in the branch, thus getting reasonable prices for themselves and their fellow co-operators.

But the details cannot be gone into in this letter. I will be pleased to give further information on the subject, however, or it may be had by applying to The Progressive Thought Co., Olathe, Kansas.

Yours, A. B. LENNOX.

THREE RIVERS, MASS., Oct. 10, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: So it is prohibition in Canada, eh? Where will it be next? Prohibition possibly in all the New England and Western states? Well, now, that would be pretty rambunctious. We would lament very much to be deprived of our congenial pabulum, especially after having feasted upon so many choice and delightfully blasphemous morsels. Faith! and if it be blasphemous to state our disbelief in the holiness of the Christian's champion book, let us then one and all make the most of our present opportunities. The Society for the Introduction of Impious Literature has been doing a great work of late. It has freely circulated the cleverly illustrated TRUTH SEEKER among those worthy families who love their enemies, and believe Mary remained a virgin although she was the mother of Jesus. Holy Moses! what an all-powerful odor of sanctity was stirred up thereby! Those pictures, bless 'em, went straight to the spot with killing effect. Great Jupiter and Jove! how those devotees did squirm! Their skin was tender, and they excitedly exclaimed, with bated breath, Blasphemous! sacrilege! horrible diet! They wanted to suppress the paper instantly, and wipe it out. Finally, they eased up a little and described some of the interesting remarks occurring in the paper. Their indignation was exceeded only by their vituperation, which was laughable in the extreme. Their feelings must have been terribly lacerated, but, don't ever know, "whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth." If the Pharisees will read THE TRUTH SEEKER through it ought to teach them a lesson or two regarding their flimsy Christianity. All churches contain a few gullible jays who are sorely grieved to observe that the spirit of the Lord fails to touch the minds of the fin-de-siecle youths. The jesuitically intellectual pulpit pounder even up matters, however, by touching them for a 5er or 10er occasionally. It is all for the Lord and the Lord loveth a cheerful giver. We must lay up treasures in heaven by filling the church coffers. We do not begrudge them their paltry gold and silver, for God knows the times are hard and the ministers are having a devilish hard time of it checking the extraordinary increase of skepticism, disbelief, and Higher Criticism that is sweeping over the land. Nothing is good or bad but thinking makes it so. Cotton Mather, D.D., a very learned man, familiar with fourteen languages, took for his text, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live." And now, dear young ladies, will you believe it possible? A few days afterwards the grim Pilgrims with Cotton's sermon ringing in their ears ran across a witch. She was a poor lonely widow, about three-score-and-ten, living in the wilderness. Forthwith they yanked her out of her humble cabin and away they went with another victim for the juggernaut. By ministerial discourtesy she was termed an old hag and, being possessed by old Satan, was also a she-devil. The judges who condemned her to be strung up by the neck were no hoodlums or Mohawk Indians, but we despise them just as much as though they had been.

Salem witchcraft and Salem priestcraft showed the marvelous gullibility of the Lord's chosen children at that period. We are somewhat advanced since those bewitching events happened. Are we to attribute our advance and our progress to Christianity or to Freethought? It does seem as though the credit were more due to the latter than to the former all through history, as we interpret it. We trust that THE TRUTH SEEKER artist will depict some of the early methods of propagating theology. The early methods were muscular; the present are taffy and marshmallow, figuratively speaking, and all owing to their decline in power and influence. A picture showing John Huss and Bruno being hustled off by fire, or some scene of Saint Bartholomew's massacre, ought to make an impressiv picture. A redskin massacre ain't in it with a venomous white-skin's massacre. While these historical pictures might be somewhat harrowing to our Christian fraternity, never mind, let us jibe them with shafts of wit and ridicule, and see if they love their enemies.

LORD HARRY CHESTERFIELD.

HENDRICKSON, MO., Oct. 8, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Thirty years ago there was not an outspoken Liberal among my acquaintances in Southeast Missouri. Being at that time, and all the time since, engaged in the practice of physic, my acquaintance was and is extensive, over an area of some five counties. Outside of a half dozen law libraries and my own, consisting of some three hundred or four hundred volumes, there was not a single library in the whole area above referred to. Enter whatever house you might and, as a rule, you found a Bible, a song-book, and an almanac. Under extraordinary circumstances you found the "Life of Christ" and Fox's "Book of Martyrs," and this ended it. Among this people you found the most intense religious feeling. In fact, it was but very little short of insanity. Camp-meetings, and other "distracted" religious gatherings, were held and protracted for weeks, and the nights were made hideous by the yells and groans of the poor, ignorant men, women, and children. Hell was uncapped, and the souls of the damned, writhing and rolling in the lurid flames of boiling sulphur, were made visible to the distorted vision of these poor deluded mortals. And they were in dead earnest. They were totally ignorant of letters; in fact, the great mass of them could neither read nor write. Their preachers were but little better informed, yet they were possessed of a large measure of boldness, hypocrisy, and duplicity. The long-eared animal upon which Balaam rode had not a more powerful voice, even admitting that he had more brain, than many of these chosen mouth-pieces of the Lord. Every word in the Bible was written by the finger of God. The Bible did not only contain a revelation from God, but it was a revelation of God. If anything was found in the Bible, it was true—verbum est, notwithstanding its absurdities. These poor ignorant mortals did not know that books had been voted out of the sacred canon, and that, in after years, they had been voted in again; that verses and chapters of that holy book had been changed, curtailed, and lengthened to suit the occasion—omnia ad dei gloriam. These deluded mortals did not know that "the New Testament of our Lord and savior Jesus Christ" was not written until more than two centuries after the death of Jesus, or until two centuries after he is said to have died, because it cannot be proven that he ever lived or died. He was Alius nullius in law, and fraus pia in fact.

Yet with all this and these, I see in a recent copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER that some fanatics, with more piety than patriotism, with more bigotry than tolerance, with more superstition than reason, with more falsehood than truth, desire and urge the government to lay its heavy hand upon that noble, truthful, logical, and able sheet, and crush the life out of it. Why? Can't you answer it, Mr. Fanatic? Can't your God defend his holy cause? Have we invoked the government to stop you from uttering and circulating a lot of slush which is and has been filling our insane asylums with your disciples? There is not an Infidel in this country but would shoulder the musket to defend your rights under the Constitution of this nation. They would shoulder them as quickly to defend their own rights—and don't you forget it. It is to be regretted that fanaticism and intolerance force men to claim rights and privileges they cannot accord to others. Such men as these above referred to seem totally unable to see that their course is calculated to destroy all religious liberty, and bring swift destruction upon themselves. If their aim is to destroy this government, I want to whisper to them that that little game was attempted some thirty years ago, and failed. Better not try it again. One important article in our creed is: Grant to every man the rights and privileges you claim for yourself. This is founded upon the Golden Rule, which was hoary with age before Jesus was born, or the Christian religion thought of. Hoping THE TRUTH SEEKER may continue to live, grow, and spread until the last vestige of superstition, bigotry, and intolerance shall be swept from among men, I have the honor to be your friend,

H. C. DAVIDSON.

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures. This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

Ten copies	$1.00
Fifty copies	4.50
One hundred copies	8.00

Independent Editors Discuss Caron.

A Cordial Hope Expressed.

From the Canton, S. D., Daily Advocate.

The Truth Seeker, a journal of Freethought, published at New York, has been denied the privilege of the mails in Canada, and the publisher is warning to his chosen theme in good shape. When a country becomes so bigoted that a publication of that character is denied the privileges accorded religious papers, it is high time for the people to pause and think. This is not the age of suppression, but the age of broad, free thought, not only in religious lines but others as well. The Truth Seeker is not, perhaps, a paper which everyone would care to read, but it contains nothing which is obscene in any sense of the word. The Advocate hopes to see The Truth Seeker win in its fight against the tyrannical postmaster general of Canada.

Sound on the Main Issue.

From the Hope Valley, R. I., Advertiser.

The Truth Seeker, a "journal of Freethought and reform," has been denied the privilege of the mails by the postal authorities of Canada. Its publisher appeals to the editors throughout the United States for vindication, and sends a copy of The Truth Seeker as an example of its belief and its teachings. The copy before us contains a picture of what the publisher evidently intends to be his idea of a Christian. In one hand is a murderer's knife, in the other an incendiary's brand, while on his back is a bundle containing vices and crimes, and he is restrained from destroying humanity only by superstition and cowardice. It does not need to say that The Truth Seeker is badly in need of the truth. It is hardly worth while to point out its beliefs on the character of Christians. The day has gone by when the church should endeavor to defeat the aims of such publications, for the enlightened people of this day and generation do not need to have it pointed out that the man who calls himself a seeker after truth and proves it by misrepresenting his neighbor is hardly to be accepted as a safe guide. So far as permitting The Truth Seeker to use the mails is concerned, we are not in favor of censorship on the part of the government.

[We are afraid that the Advertiser's editor is a careless reader. Under the cartoon which he criticizes (Oct. 5th) is the line "Condemned by their own declarations—what keeps some Christians from committing crime." This alone should have shown him that the picture was intended to show, not our "idea of a Christian," but certain Christians' idea of themselves. Turning to the editorial pages our critic would have found, under the head of "The Cartoon," an explanation thereof, beginning with this sentence: "The Christian often declares to the Freethinker: 'If I believed as you do, I would lie, rob, murder, or commit any other crime.'" The cartoon was meant to show this sort of Christians just how they appear to others. There are many of them, as every Freethinker who has engaged in argument with Christians can bear witness.]

The Jewish Press on the Outrage.

From the Chicago Occident.

It seems that our Canadian neighbors are in dead earnest in prohibiting any and all publications which may not be in strict conformance with the notions of that dominion. Thus quite a lively correspondence has been exchanged between the publishers of The Truth Seeker of New York and the postmaster-general of Canada in reference to The Truth Seeker's exclusion from the Canadian mails. We have always inclined to the belief that English authorities were liberal in disseminating literature. The sweeping allegations of the Canadian postmaster-general are too vague and smack altogether too much of medieval censorship. M. Caron is either a full-fledged Jesuit or a rampant papist. His attempt to suppress the organ of Freethought will only enhance its circulation a hundredfold in all the British possessions.

From the American Israelite.

The Truth Seeker of New York city, which styles itself "A Journal of Freethought and Reform," has been prohibited from circulating through the mails in Canada by Postmaster-General A. P. Caron at Ottawa. The law forbids the carrying in the mail of any publication that is scurrilous or blasphemous, and leaves it to the judgment of the postmaster-general to determine whether or not it is so. From his decision there is no appeal. Practically the law is the same in the United States. Without entering into the merits of the case, we have no hesitation in saying that the law is a bad one. The refusal to carry a newspaper in the mail, a daily possibly excepted, is tantamount to suppressing it. This is taking away a citizen's property, and to do this without due judicial process is in violation of the fundamental principles of our government and the Canadian as well. . . . As the law is now it gives the postmaster-general the power to forbid the circulation of any existing paper through the mails or refuse the registration necessary for transmission at newspaper rates to any new venture. This is greater power than should be in the hands of any man, and is liable to abuse. Under the law there is no remedy. . . . The law as it stands is ridiculously unjust and not in accord with the spirit of either people. It should be amended at once, in Washington and at Ottawa.

A Scurrilous Transaction.

From the Progressive Thinker.

One of the most novel incidents of recent times, approximating to Russian tyranny, is that of the postmaster-general of Canada, in prohibiting the transmission of The Truth Seeker, of New York city, through the mails, because, it was alleged, it is of a "scurrilous or blasphemous character."

The postmaster-general of Canada is a Roman Catholic. He is determined his creed shall not be assailed, nor its follies exposed. Without inquisitorial powers to imprison, torture, and burn heretics and unbelievers, he does the next best thing—silences opposers by denying them access to the people. Canada has heretofore been classed with free governments. Now it must take rank with those of the Middle Ages, which were the tools of the pope, and were used to advance his power.

The last half century has been prolific in lessons adverse to attempts to restrict the expressions of honest thought in the interest of error. Forty years ago the pro-slavery party, by unparalleled acts of violence, gained control of the territorial legislature of Kansas. It thought to silence opposition to its favorite institution by legislation, so it passed an act, section 12 of which we copy from its statutes:

If any free person, by speaking, or by writing, shall assert or maintain that persons have not the right to hold slaves in this territory, or shall introduce into Kansas, print, publish, write, circulate, or cause to be introduced into this territory, written, printed, published, or circulated in this territory, any book, paper, magazine, pamphlet, or circular, containing any denial of the right of persons to hold slaves in this territory, such person shall be deemed guilty of felony, and punished by imprisonment at hard labor for a term not less than two years.

No prosecutions were made under the law, so violent was popular opinion against it, though a proslavery mob collected in an adjoining state, in defiance of law, destroyed the Free State printing-offices, one of which, the Herald of Freedom, was soon revived, and its circulation was more than quadrupled in consequence. Four years later, all the fool laws were repealed, and the party so anxious to cripple the freedom of the press was retired to perpetual obscurity.

If Mr. Caron, the present Catholic head of the post-office department in Canada, shall persist in his action, it can only be for a limited period. He will pass away, and a better man, imbued with nobler and more liberal principles, will succeed him. Instead of curtailing the circulation or influence of The Truth Seeker, it will double and quadruple them, and we have no question it will survive, increasing in power, until a wiser generation shall come upon the stage, and ridicule the follies of the petty tyrant who foolishly thought to do the Holy See a favor.

Mr. Caron's Extraordinary Decision.

From Secular Thought.

The attack by the Canadian post-office authorities on the New York Truth Seeker shows very clearly that, though nominally a free country, like our big neighbor to the south, we, like it also, are living under laws which render it easy for officials to violate every principle of freedom. Several papers in the States have been refused the use of the mails on a mere question of opinion; and many editors and others have been imprisoned and fined for expressing their religious views. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that Canadian officials, who are certainly not vastly superior to those in the pay of Uncle Sam, either in honesty or in their notions of justice, should imitate their friends across the line, and should attempt by an arbitrary use of power, to forcibly suppress opponents whose arguments, they cannot answer. Were the Canadian people really a nation of freemen, they would not submit for an hour to such tyrannical proceedings; but unfortunately, while the Catholic half of the people will follow implicitly the orders of their priests the Protestants will in the main be glad to see a troublesome opponent squelched, no matter at what sacrifice of freedom. They forget that, if the hand that wreaks this petty vengeance is sustained, they themselves may before long suffer from its attentions.

We need not enter into the matters that have led the postmaster-general to suppress our New York contemporary. We cannot imagine that any reason could be assigned for suppressing it that would not apply with almost equal force against any Freethought journal. If it be the weekly cartoons that are so very objectionable, then we might ask, Is it worse to paint a picture than to describe its every detail? If it be our contemporary's often rather unusual—well, say bluntness; shall we get Oscar Wilde out of prison and install him as our Canadian Inspector of Newspaper Aesthetics? We do not say that we greatly admire many of Mr. Heston's cartoons. Some of them are comical enough, but others are simply grotesque; they neither point a moral nor adorn a newspaper. But neither we nor the post-office people are called upon or are entitled to decide such questions for other people. A large number of our friends approve them and wish to receive them, just as many others approve and wish to receive their weekly quota of the stuff that appears in the "religious" papers. The question is, Has anybody the legal right to decide this matter, and to confiscate the journals for which subscribers have paid?

The correspondence which has passed would seem to show that Sir Adolph Caron, our postmaster-general, claims to hold the office of Canadian Grand Inquisitor and Irresponsible Literary Autocrat; at whose decision men are either to change their opinions or submit to the confiscation of their property.

If this interpretation of the law be correct, there can be no reason why Sir Adolph Caron should not suppress Protestant publications, many of which, in our view, are far more blasphemous (if such a crime as blasphemy exists) than anything ever issued from the Freethought press; and all of which are heretical and blasphemous according to the Roman church. We would suggest that, in order to preserve intact the state of moral—and religious—purity now existing in Canada, a large placard should be put up at each customs port of entry—

NOTICE.

AMERICAN FREETHINKERS AND FREETHOUGHT AND LIBERAL LITERATURE NOT ALLOWED TO ENTER THE HOLY LAND OF CANADA.

For the present, this will not apply to Protestants or to Protestant publications; or to Bank Cashiers, Preachers, Sunday-school Superintendents, and others with pockets full of Boodle.

The absurdity of the postmaster general's decision is exemplified in the fact that it makes no allowance for the reform of the delinquent journal. Even if Editor Macdonald felt inclined to amend his ways, and issue a sheet specially prepared to suit the views of Postmaster-General Caron, he would have no opportunity of doing so. The decision is as the laws of the Medes and Persians. "There is no appeal!" Supposing The Truth Seeker should issue an edition specially expurgated for the innocent Canadian market, would not Sir Adolph listen to an appeal? Truly, we are a mighty free people—as far, that is, as our post-office autocrat will allow us to be so.

Our Missionary Work.

Several of our good friends have written us that in their opinion the work, "Self Contradictions of the Bible," should go along with Paine's "Age of Reason" as a missionary pamphlet. Mr. J. R. Perry puts it thus: "As a missionary document the 144 Self Contradictions will go hand in hand with the 'Age of Reason.' I think any person getting the one will get the other. It is the grubbing process, clearing out the roots and stones, necessary to preparing the soil for good seeds of common sense." And as it is our delight to furnish the implements for this sort of agricultural operations, we are willing to do our part and will send the "Self Contradictions of the Bible" to those who will distribute it among their Christian friends, FOR A DOLLAR A DOZEN. Or we will send twelve copies to as many different addresses for one dollar.

Now let the friends of Freethought turn to and circulate "Self Contradictions" as well as the "Age of Reason." Send both books out by the thousand and watch the result. Flood the country with them, and let the Christians know what their holy paper fetish, the Bible, is like and why it is worthless as a guide to any good.

THE TRUTH SEEKER's offer to send eight copies of Paine's "Age of Reason" to eight different addresses for $1, to be used for missionary purposes, is still open. The best results are reported from this method of reaching intelligent believers and giving a new direction to their thoughts.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

When Jimmy Comes from School.

When Jimmy comes from school at 4
J-e-r-n-s-a-l-e-m! how things begin
To whirl and buzz and bang and spin,
And brighten up from roof to floor!
The dog that all day long has lain
Upon the back porch wags his tail
And leaps and barks and begs again
The last scrap in the dinner-pail.
When Jimmy comes from school.

The cupboard latches clink a tunc,
And m'ther from her knitting stirs
To tell that hungry boy of hers
That supper will be ready soon,
And then a slab of pie he takes,
A cork and a quince or two,
And for the breezy barnyard breaks,
Where ever's thing cries: "How d'ye do?"
When Jimmy comes from school.

The rooster on the garden fence
Stirs up and down and crows and crows,
As if he knows, or thinks he knows,
He, too, is of some consequence.
The guineas join the chorns, too,
And just beside the window sill
The red bird, swinging out of view,
On his high perch, begins to trill.
When Jimmy comes from school.

When Jimmy comes from school, take care!
Our hearts begin to throb and quake
With life and joy, and every ache
Is gone before we are aware.
The earth takes on a richer hue,
A softer light falls on the flowers,
And overhead a brighter blue
Seems bent above this world of ours,
When Jimmy comes from school.

Some Popular Truths About Snakes.

I see in your issue of October 5th a short article headed, "Some Popular Errors About Snakes." Now we think that your correspondent, whoever he is, has made a splendid strike and has done complete justice to the heading of his article, because any more erroneous statements than he makes about snakes, prairie dogs, and screech owls we have never seen in print. See how inconsistent he is. He admits that all accounts in books, newspapers, magazines, and by people innumerable, state that the prairie dog, the rattlesnake, and the screech owl live together in one hole. This statement he denies in toto and brings up a little incident that he witnessed in Texas to support his denial.

Now let reason have a show. Which would most likely be true, all that we have seen in books, newspapers, magazines, and written by people innumerable, or his statement and that of Mr. S. S. Bowman, to whom he refers for support?

Then in the incident he refers to he says that the prairie dog was half-grown and about the size of a common house rat. It must have belonged to a breed of very small dogs, for of the millions of them that I have seen on the plains between Missouri and California a full-grown one was as big as four house rats.

Another error, he says he saw stated in books, is that snakes charm or mesmerize their prey. He does not seem to have much faith in books and what people say. Now in this I know he is as badly mistaken as in the other, because I have seen the woods rattlesnake charm a bird and take it right off the limb of a tree. I killed the snake after he had got the bird in his mouth and was about to swallow it. That I have seen and done. He does not speak of the woods rattlesnake at all in his article. Perhaps he does not know there is such. But there is, and it is much larger than the prairie rattler. I have killed some which measured over six feet, while the prairie rattler is seldom over four feet.

Now in order to make myself understood it will be well to explain just a little. Ten years of my early life, or from 1846 to 1856, was spent out on the plains between Missouri and California, including both those states. That gave me a splendid opportunity to witness the sights then to be seen in the Western world. I would like to describe in detail—and will, if it would be acceptable—some, at least, of those curiosities for the benefit of the Children's Corner, because they will certainly prove interesting, not only to the children, but to any who may chance to read them. It is, remember, nearly fifty years since I first went out there. It was when the Indian, the buffalo, the deer, the elk, the wolf, the prairie dog, rattlesnake, and screech owl were in all their glory; and for any man to tell me that the three latter did not burrow together in one hole only exposes his ignorance of such things. The prairie dogs lived in what we then called dog towns—that is, there would be several hundred acres of prairie land thickly covered with small mounds of dirt about eighteen inches in diameter at the base, running up twelve to fifteen inches high, and about six inches at top, or just room enough for the occupant to sit comfortably. The entrance was near the top and invariably on the south side of the mound. These dog towns would sometimes be as much as ten miles apart, but often closer, and in every town you would find the rattlesnake and screech owl. They lived together and burrowed together, for I have not only seen thousands, but millions of them go in the same holes one right after the other. How they had their apartments divided off I do not know. I often wish that I had investigated. When one would approach the hole, and all three were there, the dog would go down first, then the owl, then the rattler. I never saw them quarreling or fighting; they seemed to live happily together.

But I am making my article too long, so hoping this will be interesting reading for the children, believe me,

Yours truly, JOEL M. BERRY.
National Military Home, Ohio.

[Both of our correspondents may be right. Mr. Berry saw the owls, prairie dogs, rattlesnakes living together as one family in the old days of a then wild country. But as civilization advanced it swept over the wilderness and the prairies, and even the above-mentioned creatures felt its touch and power and resolved themselves into separate families, each after its own kind. It may be so.—Ed. C. C.]

Robin Hood.

No character is history, ancient or modern, is more famous than Robin Hood, the merry outlaw of Sherwood Forest. "He was a valiant outlaw," declared an eminent historian, "living free and bold in the green forest, waging frank and open war against sheriff and law." In the sixteenth century he still had his commemoration day, and it is related of Bishop Latimer that he was unable to preach, even to empty pews, because it was "Robin Hood's day," and he was denied even the satisfaction of obtaining his church keys. They assumed possession of the church to turn it into a theater. It was not, however, Robin Hood, but yeomanry, that England loved. "God haffe mercy on Robin Hodys solle and saffe" all god yeomanry." That is how many of the old ballads end. Sir Walter Scott gives a charming account, in "Ivanhoe," of this Nottingham hero, and King Richard's romantic friendship; his loyal and commendable determination to repeal the vigorous forest laws when gaining ascendancy to the British throne. This, however, he was unable to carry out, basely and cruelly thwarted by his unnatural brother, who succeeded through cunning artifice and successful assistance from his knights, etc. (though strenuously opposed by Sir Ivanhoe), in displacing and murdering the genial king. And Robin Hood's free, untrammelled life offered a tempting allurements to the troubled heir; he was wont to stay with Hood many hours at a time.

"In somer when the shawes be sheyne,
And leaves be large and long,
Hit is fulle mery in feyne forests
To hear the foulis song."

They loved the blithesome summer-time. Merry Robin then delighted in exercise of bow and spear. New friendships were thus formed, and free exchange of blows always prepared the way for good fellowship. It was then "Little John's" loyalty was tested. He was 7 feet high, and conquered the valiant Robin, who liked him for it, though it was often the source of kindly jest:

"Ah, John, by me thou settest noe store,
And that I fairly finde;
How oft I send I my men before
And tarry myself behind?"

"It is no cummin a knave to ken,
An a man but heare him speake,
And were it not for bursting my bowe,
John, I thy head would breake."

Robin often enjoyed a friendly set-to with valiant shepherd-boys and simple townfolk skilled in use of arms.

"Oh that were a shame," said jolly Robin,
'We beine three and thou but one.'
The pinder* leapt back then thirty good foot,

'Twas thirty-good foot and one.

"He leaned his back fast unto a thorn,
His foot against a stone,
And then he fought a long summer's day,
A summer's day so long."

And Robin did not always gain the advantage.

"I pass not for length," bold Arthur replies;
'My staff is of oke so free;
Eight foot and a half, it will knock down a calf,
And I hope it will knock down thee.'

"Then Robin could no longer forbear.
He gave him such a knock,
Quickly and soon the blood came down,
Before it was ten o'clock."

"Then Arthur soon recovered himself,
And gave him such a knock on the crown,
That from every side of bold Robin's head
The blood came trickling down."

"Then Robin raged like a wild boar;
As soon as he saw his own blood:
The bland was in haste, he laid on so fast,
As though he had been cleaving of wood."

"And about and about and about they went,
Like two wild boars in a chase,
Striving to aim each other to maim,
Leg, arm, or any other place."

"And knock for knock they lustily dealt,
Which held for two hours and more,
Till all the woods rang at every bang,
They plied their work so sore."

"Hold thy hand, hold thy hand," said Robin Hood,
'And let thy quarrel fall;
For here we may thrash our bones all to mash,
And yet no coyn at all."

"And in the forest of merry Sherwood, Hereafter thou shalt be free.'
'God a mercy for nought, my freedom I bought,
I may thank my staff and not thee.'

"Who are you, then?" asked Robin.
'I'm a tanner,' bold Arthur reply'd,
'In Nottingham long have I wrought;
And if thou wilt come there I vow and swear
I will tan thy hide for nought.'

"God a mercy, good fellow," said Jolly Robin,
'Since thou art so kind and free;
And if thou wilt tan my hide for nought,
I'll do as much for thee.'

* Man skilled in pinning sheep in the fold.

It only needed this evidence of superiority in Arthur's skill with staff and spear to enthrone him forever in the affection of "bold Robin." Now that blow, having been exchanged, they join hands in friendship, singing merrily, in the words of Ritson:

"Then Robin took them by the hands,
And danced round about the oke-tree,
For three merry men, and three merry men,
And three merry men we be."

Whether such a character really existed or not, is doubtful. There is a lamentable absence of documents to establish the fact, historians tell us, and yet, in the chronicles of twelfth century deeds, "bold Robyn Hood's" exploits stand out clearest of all. This is one of the mysteries where tradition and history, curiously intermingled, leave unsatisfactory evidence in statistics, and plenty of store for romance and conjecture.

Gems of Thought.

IN the entire list of English and French kings not one has been eminent for ability, virtue, and peaceful administration.—John S. Hittell.

It is indeed most wonderful how error, once enthroned, will oftentimes perpetuate its way, even in the very sunlight of truth.—Ex-Gov. Sylvester Pennoyer.

PAIN is the correlative of some species of wrong—some kind of divergence from that course of action which perfectly fulfills all requirements.—Herbert Spencer.

ATTACKED on every side, he [Voltaire] fought with every weapon that wit, logic, reason, scorn, contempt, laughter, pathos, and indignation could sharpen, form, devise, or use. He often apologized, and the apology was an insult. He often recanted, and the recantation was a thousand times worse than the thing recanted. He took it back by giving more. In the name of eulogy he flayed his victim. In his praise there was poison. He often advanced by retreating, and asserted by retraction.—Ingersoll.

No man's belief is in any case a private matter which concerns himself alone. Our words, our phrases, our forms and processes and modes of thought, are common property, fashioned and perfected from age to age; an heirloom, which every succeeding generation inherits as a precious deposit and a sacred trust, to be handed on to the next one, not unchanged, but enlarged and purified, with some clear marks of its proper handiwork. Into this, for good or ill, is woven every belief of every man who has speech of his fellows. An awful privilege, and awful responsibility, that we should help to create the world in which posterity will live.—Professor Clifford.

THE weakness of even an old and ridiculous argument is worthy of new exposure, so long as it deceives any rational being. I think that is the point which should decide whether we, as Freethinkers, ought or ought not to attack an error or an argument. An argument which really has ceased to deceive may well enough be treated with indifference; but the very weakest that could be used should be an object of attack so long as it has power to impose upon sensible people. An argument is nothing of importance except in its effects. It is its practical part which should decide us to attack its theoretical, and to expose in it whatsoever is calculated to mislead.—Joseph Symes.

THE brawn of social order is in relationships spontaneously formed and seen in their proper limitations. There is no forced bond which will evoke the social conscience. There is no free conscience which violates others for self, society for the individual. The free conscience makes free and respects freedom. Outward sobriety will follow inner will. Men will walk self-poised by powers from within. Turn the next page after trust—freedom appears. Take down the scaffold when the building is done. New York is saved from destruction not by anything done at Albany, not by the reign or the rule of Tammany, but by self-regulation and common amenities passed from each individual soul to each other.—Horace L. Traubel.

I AM not so much concerned, however, with what seems to me the shallowness and inconsequence of the Optimistic position as with its bearing on social conditions. What must this be? There can be but one answer, I think. Its effect upon the conscience of society must be that of a soothing cordial. For centuries the church has stilled the cry of the millions for a share of this world's goods with lavish promises of celestial bliss, and the House of Have, holding this earth fast in its grip, has been content to run a bare chance for the life to come, while generously conceding to the House of Want an undisputed claim to the whole continent of the blissful hereafter. It was an arrangement by which those who did not get earthly turkey accepted the other kind of bird as the best dish under the circumstances.—William Johnson, in Conservator.

Is there a man who pretends to live luxuriously housed up; screened from all work, from want, danger, hardship, the victory over which is what we name work—he himself to sit serene, amid down-bolsters and appliances, and have all his work and battling done by other men? And such man calls himself a nobleman? His fathers worked for him, he says, or successfully gambled for him; here he sits; professes, not in sorrow, but in pride, that he and his have done no work time out of mind. It is the law of the land, and is thought to be the law of the universe, that he, alone of recorded men, shall have no task laid on him, except that of eating his cooked victuals and not flinging himself out of window. Once more I will say, there was no stranger spectacle ever under the sun. A veritable fact in our England of the nineteenth century.—Carlyle.

Young Swift: "No, I wasn't aware of it, but then I haven't been training with the same crowd you do."

ONE Sunday recently a deacon who had charge of a collection plate saw an old lady drop a penny into it and pass into the church. In a short time she reappeared, and taking a penny from the plate, went out. The deacon, calling her back, asked for an explanation of her conduct. "Oh," said she, "I am in the wrong church."—St. Louis Humorist.

THE Scotch Archbishop Foreman, in the sixteenth century, was such a poor Latin scholar that when he was obliged to visit Rome he found great difficulty in conforming to some of the customs of the pope's table, to which he was invited. Etiquette required that the Scotch bishop should take part in uttering a Latin benediction over the repast and the illiterate guest had carefully committed to memory what he believed to be the orthodox form of words. He began with his "Benedicite," expecting the cardinals to respond with "Dominus," but they replying "Deus" (Italian fashion) so confused the good bishop that he forgot his carefully conned phrases and "in good broad Scotch" said: "To the devil I give you all, false cardinals," to which devout aspiration pope and cardinals who understood only their own language, piously replied "Amen."

THE meanest thing I ever heard of was done by a young man with a good education. I will tell you about it. His name was Howard P. Duncan, and I knew him very well. We were educated together and graduated on the same shingle, I was about to say. But he had more ingenuity than I. He could make the tutor believe that the moon was made of green cheese, whereas I could not make the same faculty believe what it already knew. If I said the earth was round like a ball and slightly depressed at the poles, for the first time there would be a feeling of doubt in the minds of my instructors. But Howard, after delivering the valedictory, went forth into the world for himself. He felt a certain repugnance to industry which showed that his blood had a slight aristocratic tinge. He tried two or three easy professions, but finally turned his back toward them all. He was offered a situation at $41 per month to teach, but turned bitterly on his heel and said, with some asperity, that "he would rather pump thunder in hell at five cents a clap." Those were his very words. That remark was the index to the man's whole character. He would say things at all times that other people afterward bitterly regretted. Finally, he developed a new disease, and his autopsy was very promising. For this reason he was greatly sought after by the medical colleges. He was offered over $100 for his remains. But he hung out. His boyhood home had offered him $500 to go away and remain, to which his father had offered to add $800. He asked my advice, and I told him to hang out for $1,000, for I felt sure it would be given. This proved to be true. I helped to make up the amount. Finally, he got five of the ablest medical colleges above $100 and sold his carcass to each of them. Then, stricken by remorse, he came to the mercy seat, thinking that it would be just the thing for a sedentary man, embraced Christianity and three or four of the most desirable workers in the Ladies' Auxiliary, became a missionary, went to the tropics, and a week after he landed the chief had him up at his house for dinner.—Bill Nye.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

It is affirmed that England will maintain her rights in Venezuela by force if necessary.

FIFTY persons were drowned on Oct. 18th by the upsetting of a ferry-boat near Cairo, Egypt.

THE English mission chapels at Changpu, Fokien province, China, have been destroyed by rioters.

THE Secretary of the Interior of Sal Salvador has forbidden the press to make collections for the Cubans.

THE great exodus of Canadians to the United States is almost if not quite a political issue in the Dominion.

IN the South Carolina Constitutional Convention, Senator Tillman's inalienable homestead proposition was voted down.

THE price of wool is going up because of the scarcity and the increased demand, which latter in its turn is due to the business revival.

THE Spanish authorities in Cuba are regularly sending political suspects to the penal colony dungeons at Centa, on the African coast.

DR. ANTONIN DVORAK has resigned the directorship of the National Conservatory of Music, owing to the serious illness of members of his family.

THE governor of Goa, Portuguese India, cables the home government that the Portuguese troops have joined the insurgents and are pillaging the country.

SAN FRANCISCO has had bloomer balls and bloomer marriages, and now a bloomer restaurant has been opened. In "The Bloomer Café" the waiters are attired in bloomers.

THE United States treasury department decides that bicycles bought in Canada and brought over the line by their owners for their personal use will be admitted free of duty.

JAPAN expresses her regret for the riot in Seoul, which resulted in the death of the Korean queen, and will hold the Japanese responsible for it to a stern accountability, regardless of rank.

THE citizens of Massachusetts, of both sexes, will on Nov. 5th express at the polls their preferences in the matter of conferring the suffrage on women. The legislature is not bound to abide by the referendum, but it is supposed that it will be more or less influenced thereby, no matter what the result. There is a Man Suffrage Association and an Equal Suffrage Association, and mass meetings and manifestos are the order of the day.

LILIAN DREW, the actress, died in New York on Oct. 13th as the result of an operation for the removal of cancer. She was born in Franklin, Conn., about thirty years ago, and her name was Nannie M. Hastings.

OF the 47 candidates for the state senate whom the New York Herald questioned concerning their attitude toward more liberal excise laws and the enforcement of Sunday laws, more than one-half were non-committal.

THE Presbyterians of New York are in a squabble over the licensing by the presbytery of Otsego of a graduate of Union Theological Seminary, which institution is under a boycott because of the retention by it of Professor Briggs.

MORRIS SCHOENHOLZ, convicted of organizing arson plots involving the imperiling of hundreds of lives, was on Oct. 18th sentenced by Judge Fitzgerald of this city to forty-eight years' imprisonment in Sing Sing prison.

THE quarter of New Orleans known as Algiers was almost entirely destroyed by fire on the morning of Oct. 20th. Loss, about $350,000; 1,000 people are homeless. The fire is supposed to be incendiary, started by the owner of a house for the purpose of getting insurance money.

FREDERICK WILLIAM HORN, a National Liberal and a member of the Reichstag, has been sentenced at Dresden to ten months' imprisonment for lese majeste (treason). Even at the expiration of that time, Herr Horn will be released only on condition that he finds sureties in 10,000 marks ($2,500) for his subsequent good behavior.

DR. E. C. SPITZKA, in a paper recently read before the Society of Medical Jurisprudence in this city, maintained that the New York law punishing those who attempt suicide in a dead letter, for there has been no decrease in the number of suicides. In fact, suicide has become more skillful since the law was enacted, as was naturally to be expected.

TWO thousand garment workers, on strike in Rochester, N. Y., have taken their families and quit the city for good, the United Garment Workers' Association having provided work for them elsewhere. The Association claims to control all skilled workers, so that the Rochester manufacturers will have difficulty in getting men to take the places of those who have left.

THE Twenty-Second annual convention of the National Women's Christian Temperance Union convened in Baltimore Oct. 18th. Miss Willard in her opening address endorsed the theater censorship bill introduced in the New York legislature last winter by Senator Mullin, and favored the change of the name of the Prohibition party to the Home Protection party. "Prohibition" had a negative sound, and consequently many clergymen were reluctant to advocate the principles of the party in their pulpits. The change desired and the reason urged in support of it are eminently characteristic. In church work these days masks are at a premium.

DR. GEORGE STRAWBRIDGE, of Philadelphia, who has just returned from inspecting the water-supply systems of leading European cities, says that all filter their water, and all except Antwerp use sand beds. Antwerp uses a mechanical filter, with the oxide of iron process. London uses a sand filter, and similar filters are in general use even in English small towns. They are hardly used at all in the United States.

THE entire Japanese legation has been recalled from Seoul, Corea. The head of the legation was Gen. Viscount Miura, a noted Japanese scholar and lieutenant-general in the army. He has occupied the post but two months. By the recall Japan seems to hold the legation responsible for the riots that resulted in the assassination of the queen, or, at least, to blame for permitting Japan to appear to be mixed up in it. It now seems probable that Russia will interpose to end the Japanese nominal protectorate over Corea.

Hard Knocks
at Christianity.
By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

NEW BOOKS BY ROB'T G. INGERSOLL

The Field-Ingersoll Discussion. Price, paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

In 1888 the Rev. Dr. Henry M. Field wrote an open letter to Colonel Ingersoll, with the intent to convert him. The letter was published in the North American Review, and was replied to by the person addressed. All our older readers know the value of this discussion. To those who do not remember it we can only say that they should lose no time in procuring a copy if they want a controversial treat.

The Ingersoll-Gladstone Controversy about Christianity. Price, paper, 25 cts; cloth, 50 cts.

When the Field-Ingersoll Controversy closed in the North American Review the Christians felt that their champion had been very badly worsted in argument, and the publishers of the Review engaged the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone to attempt to rehabilitate the Presbyterian creed. He wrote a long letter to Colonel Ingersoll, to which the latter replied at length and it is generally agreed, completely demolished the greatest controversialist Christianity can produce. These letters are now for the first time available in pamphlet form.

Myth and Miracle. Price, 25c.

This is one of Colonel Ingersoll's best lectures, but never before put into print. Everyone who has heard it will most certainly want it, and those who have not heard it will have a rare treat in its perusal, as something new from the Colonel, which also is something that everybody is looking for.

Which Way? Price, 25 cents.

This lecture is a consideration of the difference between the natural and the supernatural, and some reasons why the former is the best way to go. Perhaps no one of Colonel Ingersoll's orations has won more general applause from enlightened audiences than this. It contains that most magnificent of perorations, his visions—"This was. This is. This shall be." The lecture was never before printed in pamphlet form. It is splendid. Send for it.

PIANOS, PIANOS!

After years of earnest study and experiments, Mr. Adam Schaaf, of Chicago, one of the oldest and most experienced piano manufacturers of this country, has produced what is believed to be the most perfect Upright Piano ever constructed. The instrument is thus described:

"The volume of tone is fully equal to any of the best Square Grand Pianos, while the quality is of the most exquisite musical character—pure, sympathetic, and in the highest degree pliable. Its durability and its capacity for standing in tune, is unparalleled in the history of piano-making. In a word, this piano is made to stand, not merely as an ornamental piece of furniture (it is finished in the most artistic and handsome style), but as a musical instrument—not for a day, but for a lifetime."

These pianos received the highest honors at the World's Fair; Mr. GEORGE STROCK, Judge of Awards, the best living authority on pianos, reporting as follows:

"This exhibit deserves an award for excellent tone quality, sustaining power, well planned scale, and excellent action, with easy, prompt touch. Material and workmanship are superior."

The distinguished Pianist and Composer, SIGNOR FABIANI, of the Paris Conservatory, says:

"I have used the Adam Schaaf Pianos, and have critically studied their merits, compared them with those of the best American and European makers, and I find them unsurpassed for quality and variety of tone, responsiveness of touch, elegance of appearance, and reliability in every way."

Having made special arrangements with the manufacturer, who is our personal friend, to introduce these superb pianos, we are prepared to offer them to TRUTH SEEKER readers at the above marvelously low prices—from $50 to $150 less than dealers ask for inferior instruments. Every piano is warranted for five years, and the purchaser is not required to pay for it until delivered. We will pay the freight to any station within 1,000 miles of Chicago. Full description of instruments sent on application.

If you or any of your friends contemplate buying a piano it will be to your interest to correspond with us.

The Truthfulness of Methodists.

"God save Canada," says the Epworth League paper, Onward, of Toronto. This is Editor Withrow's heading of an article teeming with misrepresentations and vilifications of THE TRUTH SEEKER. (See page 693). Canada certainly needs some power to save her from her bigoted and untruthful officials and editors. They will only plunge her more deeply into despotism and degradation.

"Error hath a million tongues." The Methodists are a numerous folk. Editor Withrow takes pains to inform us that the circulation of Onward is 38,000 copies. There are many more Epworth League organs, and we presume that they will all echo Onward's falsifications of the record. These young people do not know anything about THE TRUTH SEEKER; their leaders can tell them anything they please and be perfectly safe from contradiction and correction. The only way their consciences can be pricked is by a libel suit that will reach their pockets.

Here is a letter from the editor of Onward which accompanied his libelous notice of THE TRUTH SEEKER:

"TORONTO, Oct. 18, 1895.

"THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I am in receipt of a copy of your paper and reprint editorial. I inclose my editorial note on the subject. I believe these sentiments are shared by ninety-nine hundredths of the Canadian people. I think you will find little sympathy in your crusade against the Canadian government for their refusal to make the mail the means of diffusing immoral teachings. Yours truly, W. H. WITHROW.

"[Per. K. G.]"

Ninety-nine per cent is an exaggeration, but there is no doubt that a majority of the people of Canada would, if they were informed of the fact, approve the exclusion of our paper from the mails. How could it be otherwise, when they depend largely upon such journals as the True Witness and Catholic Chronicle and Onward for their information? Kept in utter ignorance of the character of the excluded periodical, they naturally accept the statements of their trusted teachers as to its nature.

If Editor Withrow knows anything about the matters of which he wrote, he knows that THE TRUTH SEEKER was not excluded from the Canadian mails because of "indecent" and "obscenity," but because Postmaster-General Caron held it to be "blasphemous" or "scurrilous." (Onward is scurrilous in its attack upon this paper.) "Obscenity" and "indecent" have relation to sex matters; we do not deal with those subjects; hence our journal is not "obscene" and is not helping to disseminate that "moral pestilence" against which Anthony Comstock is said to be waging "such a prolonged and successful war." If the assertions of Onward are based on fact, why has not our paper become one of the victims of Comstock's "successful war"?

Why could not Editor Withrow be decent enough to treat an antagonist with fairness? Would it not have been sufficiently shocking to his readers to be told that their postmaster-general had detected a "blasphemous" and "scurrilous" United States editor in the act of leading the people of Canada into the broad way of Freethought? Why raise against him the cry of "obscenity" when no such charge had been officially made or could be truthfully preferred? We cannot avoid the thought that we are classed with the purveyors of "obscene" literature because even Canadian Methodists shrink from the espousal of blasphemy laws on their own merits, or demerits.

The editors and publishers of Canada "sedulously exclude from the printed page anything that would bring a blush to the cheek of innocence or besmirch the young mind." Not less does THE TRUTH SEEKER. In fact, we know that our pages will compare more than favorably with those of the political and religious press. For one thing, we aim to always tell the truth; unlike Onward, we would not knowingly bear false witness against our neighbors.

In this connection it might be pertinent to mention the fact that the Epworth League is engaged, as a part of its work, in the study of the Bible. We will ask Mr. Withrow if it is not true that if THE TRUTH SEEKER should print in its columns in extenso any of a large number of passages in that book it would thereby become amenable to the unconstitutional statute so zealously enforced by Mr. Anthony Comstock, and that its publisher would probably be arrested for circulating obscene matter through the mails? Perhaps Mr. Withrow is not aware that J. B. Wise, a worthy citizen of Kansas, is now under indictment in the federal courts for sending Isa. xxxvi, 12, written on a postal card, through the mails to Rev. Mr. Vennum. Is there not, then, considerable danger that reading this book will "besmirch the young mind" of the Epworth Leaguer?

We hope that Mr. Withrow will be honest and fair enough to reprint in Onward this reply to that paper's aspersions upon THE TRUTH SEEKER. We shall cut this article out and mail it to him with a personal letter.

What of Catholicism To-day?

Picking up the New York Catholic News of October 9th, we take notice of several recent utterances of official spokesmen of the Catholic church that seem to call for quotation and comment. In an article on the Catholic Winter School at New Orleans, apparently written by Rev. J. F. Mullaney, we find this:

"The church's guiding light, lay and clerical, must keep pace with the intellectual progress of the age, and go out, David-like, to combat the Goliaths of error and to confound the false philosophers of Positivism, Atheism, Agnosticism, and kindred evils. There is need to show the world that the church welcomes the awakening of scientific thought and true ethical culture; that she is not afraid of so-called scientists and social reformers; that she loves the light—ay, that she is the light of the world."

There is indeed a great need that the church show the world that she welcomes the awakening of scientific thought and ethical culture, but where is the evidence that she does? Like the Protestant organizations, the Catholic church never leads in thought and action; no one of them takes a step that is not necessary to be taken in order to keep from being left hopelessly behind. Nothing of the new is accepted unless it is thought that it can in some way be made to support the old creeds and perpetuate the old institutions. Whatever happens, the status must be maintained, in name at least. That is now Christian and Catholic which not so very long ago was rank heresy, but never mind; the church has kept the name, the authority, and the revenues, and no more was absolutely essential. To those who cannot think she seems to have yielded nothing. Through all vicissitudes there has come, after all battles and all surrenders there remains, for the Catholic, the infallible church founded on tradition; for the Protestant, there remains the name of the once infallible book and it is yet good to conjure with so long as the masses of believers do not look under the label. Easy-going optimists will have it that the old creeds are quite dead, but they are only masquerading in worked-over garments. Once the appeal was to the fear of hell; now it is to the moral sense, and the moral sense of to-day is, for the most part, saturated with the poison of religious medievalism. The church is desperately struggling to regain lost ground; the great conflict of the present and the near future rages and will rage about controverted principles of conduct. If the church wins here she can rule and will rule just as despotically as she did when she was supreme through frank defense of her claim to speak authoritatively in matters of religion.

"Men talk against the church," says Cardinal Newman, "but they owe it to the church that they can talk at all."

"Claim everything in sight," has heretofore been the motto of the church, but of all the claims she has made this is the most astounding. Possibly we would also be blind as bats if it had not been for the church? It is even thinkable that the solar system is to be credited to the church.

On October 2d there convened in Washington a national Eucharistic congress. At this congress Bishop Keane declared that "the perpetual presence of the word made flesh is the thing of paramount importance in the world." That is, the gross delusion that the wine and bread of the eucharist are the actual blood and flesh of a young Jew who is said to have been executed in Palestine in the neighborhood of two thousand years ago is the most important thing in the world. Think of it! Surely there is a terrible need to "show the world that the church welcomes the awakening of scientific thought."

"Lucifer was the first who would not bow to the word made flesh, and he is striving to build up his kingdom and he has powerful auxiliaries," adds Bishop Keane. While the church continues to treat those ancient legends and metaphors as records of actual persons and events, what right has she to ask us to believe that she has put herself into harmonious relation with modern science?

"The bishop then referred to the desecration of the Sabbath and said: 'What are you doing to prevent this? How can you tire in this work, when men claiming to be in search of liberty are seeking license? "Do you forget who I am?" asks the blessed Lord. "Do you forget that I am the lion of the tribe of Judah? Do you forget the scourges I have sent upon the wicked? Do you forget that I inspired my apostle Paul to pronounce the fearful warning that he who desecrates the temple of God I will destroy utterly, as the temple of God is sacred?"

When did Christ send scourges (convulsions of nature, diseases, war, and the rest), that fell not on the righteous as well as on the wicked? And why does Bishop Keane permit the unthinking to fancy that "the temple of God" is Sunday, a duration of time? He does this when he couples Paul's denunciation of the desecration of the body of man with his own talk about the "desecration of the Sabbath." Again, he leaves a false impression in regard to the attitude of Paul on the Sabbath question. Paul did not believe in enforced Sabbath observance, so far as the record shows, and Bishop Keane cannot be ignorant of that fact. "One man esteemeth one day above another; another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind." What chance is there for "Sabbath desecration" under that rule? In this instance, Paul, eighteen centuries before Bishop Keane in time, is also eighteen centuries ahead of him in development.

Referring to the differences in the views and opinions of men in regard to religion, the bishop said that these differences were "brought about by the emissaries of the evil one." How sincerely has the church accepted the results of scientific research and the fruits of historical and biblical criticism when its high dignitaries talk such superstitious nonsense as that? But the Bishop and his religion are condemned by his own words. If religious differences are due to the machinations of the devil, then the Catholic church is the child of the devil, for Christianity is one of the youngest of the great religions of the world, and hence came as an interloper, a wedge of division.

"Why in God's name should we not trust and love one another!" excitedly exclaims the bishop. There would be a great deal more trust and love in the world if it were not for meddling and tyrannical churchmen and moralists. Quite likely Bishop Keane and the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER would get along very well as neighbors while each attended strictly to his own affairs, but we very much fear that the bishop could not so contain himself; he would be eager to force the Editor to subscribe to some creed or pursue a certain line of conduct. He would not be willing to put his dependence in love and reason and time to bring the Editor to what he would call the right way of thinking and doing. On his human side the Christian is about like the rest of us, but on his theological side he is distrustful, quarrelsome, intolerant, and cruel. In other words, the acid of his creed sours the milk of human kindness in him.

Rev. Joseph Yasbeck, the Maronite missionary, said that of the 3,000,000 Armenians, only about 100,000 are allied with the Catholic church. But the separation of the others is formal to a large extent, the Eastern princes and patriarchs refusing to recognize the authority of Rome, while the East has yet the Roman mass and ceremony. That is, such is Father Yasbeck's version of the matter; no doubt the Eastern churchmen would assert quite the contrary. However, that is not of material importance here; what is to follow is more suggestive: "Hundreds of Armenians had said to him: 'There is no real difference between us; let the shepherds agree and we will follow.'" That is very characteristic of theological sheep. Presumably the Protestant flock would also troop back to Rome if their shepherds could agree with those in the Vatican.

"He closed with an eloquent exhortation that the Eastern church might be brought back before Pope Leo's death, in order that the pontiff's great desire might be accomplished."

But will not Leo know of it when it is accomplished, even if he dies first? Are not those who "die in the Lord" able to see what takes place on the earth after they have left it? Rev. Mr. Yasbeck's expressed wish would seem to indicate that he has some doubts in the matter; perhaps he does not believe in immortality after all; it is not at all unusual for the augur to have no faith in his auguries.

Among the resolutions adopted was one favoring Sunday observance "as a practical means of sanctifying the Holy Eucharist." That would be all right, of course, if the Sabbath observance was the voluntary offering of those who believe that the Holy Eucharist stands in need of sanctification, but when we are asked to give our suffrages for statutes of the state that are intended to force us to observe a holy day for the sake of sanctifying a churchly superstition, it is certainly carrying audacity almost to the utmost limit conceivable. When Rome asks that much now, while she is trying to make the world believe that she is adjusting herself to the new scientific order of things, what would she not demand if she were not under this necessity to cater to the demands of the spirit of progress?

Like the Protestant Women's Christian Temperance Union and all other similar organizations, the Catholic Total Abstinence Union makes much use of the absurd claim that temperance is a virtue peculiar to Christianity. Rev. James M. Cleary, president of this Union, has recently issued a bulletin to his fellow workers. He speaks of "Christian sobriety," "the holy cause of Christian sobriety," and bids his brethren be "devotedly Catholic." We should be pleased to know wherein the abstinence of a Christian differs in effect from the abstinence of a Buddhist or a Freethinker, so far as its resulting sobriety is concerned. But there is a difference in some other respects; the Christian who thinks temperance is desirable cannot refrain from making the false claim that temperance is the result of the teachings of Christianity and should therefore take the name of "Christian temperance" or "Christian sobriety." He ignores the indisputable facts that the Bible teaches neither prohibition nor temperance and that the nations that have been afflicted with Christianity are among the most intemperate peoples in the world. When we say that the Bible does not teach temperance, we mean, necessarily, that the overwhelming preponderance of its testimony is on the drinking side; a few texts condemn the use of wine and strong drink, but only a few, either absolutely, or relatively to the number of those which directly commend such use or, by their failure to condemn when mentioned, imply that it is harmless.

The Catholic News says, referring to the work of the "League of the Sacred Heart":

"The aggregation of good works recorded in the October Messenger as offerings for the intentions recommended to the League of the Sacred Heart amounted to 4,698,920. That all these prayers are not without practical results, the numerous favors, both spiritual and temporal, recorded in thanksgiving, bear eloquent witness. Truly 'More things are wrought by prayer than this world dreams of.'"

It would be more accurate to say that all that are wrought are wrought in dreams, except in so far as the earnest wish back of the prayer spurs the one who prays to attempt once again the accomplishment of that which he desires, or the prayer (wish) uttered aloud has a certain effect upon the human hearer. But what shall be said of the church, claiming to keep up with the march of knowledge, that sustains an organization within itself through which alone nearly 5,000,000 prayers to ghosts and dead men are registered in one month? Is not such a church a survival from the animistic stage of development? Is not the superstition fostered by its priests and which in turn enriches them, as gross as that of the African or Australian savage? All alike pray to the dead and to "the sky people," and the answers that the "civilized" devotee receives differ not from the answers received by the root digger and the tree climber.

Rev. James Conway, "Assistant Director of the Apostleship of Prayer," tell us that devotion to the "sacred heart of Jesus" is not, "in its widest sense, of modern origin," for it has been practiced in all ages by individual members of the church. Then he adds:

"However, the devotion to the Sacred Heart, in the special form in which it is now practiced in the church, is decidedly the devotion of the age. By an especial divine providence it has been revealed and propagated in our time, when the love of many has grown cold, in order to rekindle in the hearts of men the fire of divine love. At first it was a small spark in the heart of a poor, resourceless religious; but by the will of the Divine Master and by the co-operation of the Holy Ghost, it became a great fire."

Does not this of itself go far to show that the Roman church, instead of trying to lead its people out of darkness and malaria on to the sun-kissed, wind-swept heights of science and moral health, is really striving to guide them into still lower cañons of intellectual gloom and ethical decay? Mr. Conway urges priests to take pains to cultivate this form of beating the air with vain prayers. Did some optimist say that the warfare with superstition is over?

The Convention, and After.

The Freethinkers' Annual Congress has come and gone. The Secular Union and the Freethought Federation have been combined into one organization, to be called the Secular Union and Freethought Federation. The officers elected for the ensuing year are tried and true workers, well worthy of the confidence and support of the Freethinkers of the whole country. The attendance was good, the addresses, readings, and music were excellent, there was plenty of enthusiasm and an abundance of good fellowship; neither personal jealousies nor unreasoning differences of opinion disturbed the prevailing harmony, the collections and pledges were most gratifying, the resolutions adopted are a concise summary of the Secular demands and of the reasons justifying the demands, and, in short, the Congress was, in every way, a success.

It is expected that during the coming year the Fleckten school case in Minnesota will be pushed to a conclusion, and it is also hoped that Mr. Jacob Wise will be rescued from the toils of the Comstock law, where he is held for doing in a small way what Christians and Christian societies are constantly doing in a large way, that is, disseminating the "word of God" through the mails. Theocratic schemes at Washington will be watched, Sabbath legislation in the states will be antagonized, and the utmost possible will be done to educate the American people in the principles of pure secularism, and to arouse them to a sense of the great dangers menacing the liberties of all Freethinkers and other non-Christians through the machinations of the Protestant theocrats, who are preparing the way for "Holy Mother Church," forging the sword of legal church authority for her to wield after the secular Constitution is corrupted and church and state are one in the fundamental law and that one the church. The extent of this good work must depend upon the abundance of the sinews of war that are provided. Mr. Putnam and Mr. Reichwald will no doubt soon make known in detail the program of labor for the immediate future.

Welcome and success to the reorganized "Secular Union and Freethought Federation"!

Now and again the sweeping current of theocracy strikes a slight obstruction that partly stays its course for a moment. The latest that has come under our observation was encountered at Linwood, Ohio, where the reciting of the Lord's Prayer in the public school has been stopped. A father took his child from the school because of the prayer, notified the teacher, and consulted the attorney for the schools, who replied "that prayers had been eliminated from the schools, and that a state law forbid anything of a sectarian nature being taught in the public schools." This opinion of the attorney is in harmony with the decision of the supreme court of that state given as long ago as 1872. The court held that the Bible is a sectarian book within the meaning of the constitution and that Christian teachings are sectarian teachings. That would of course bar the Lord's Prayer and everything of the kind. All that Freethinkers in Ohio have to do with regard to religious instruction and ceremonies in the public schools is to assert their rights under the state constitution, as interpreted by the supreme court. We should like to see the same question raised in other states now, after twenty-three years more of theocratic propaganda.

"We are no longer pestered by the vicious proposition that laws are enacted rather with a view of silencing the murmurs of the good than for the purpose of restraining the passions of the bad."

So says the aristocratic Rev. Dr. Huntington, speaking of the Rooseveltian crusade. We presume that by the "bad" he means the people who want to buy a glass of beer, a collar, a piece of ice, a pair of hose on Sunday, and that by the "good" he means the millionaire members of his flock and others like them, who have their wine cellars, their well-stocked larders, their high-priced chefs, and all the other accessories of rich feeding and bibulation, and so do not care a cent about open shops on Sunday. Then, if they are not satisfied at home, they can order their hostlers and coachmen to break the Sabbath and take them down to their fashionable clubs, where there is more wine and there are more cigars and billiard tables and various other stimulating and amusing and time killing supplies and diversions. We should all love the "good" very much, for they have not yet attempted to get a law to compel us to go to church on Sunday and otherwheres associate intimately with them.

The exclusion of the paper from the mails in Canada is used as an advertisement for the paper both in that country and in our own. The same effect might follow its exclusion from the United States mails. It would still be published and would probably fatten on the notoriety given to it in this way, if this were all that the civil authorities would or could do. But this is not all that can and should be done. The law can and should lay its strong hand on the publishers and compel them to cease sending out the scurrilous and blasphemous sheet which destroys the reverence of God, dishonors his laws and the laws of the state, and depraves the morals of the people. Are there not friends enough of public decency and morality in New York to expunge this foul blot without delay from the fair name of the Empire state?—Christian Statesman.

The above gem of charity is the concluding paragraph of the article reprinted in these columns last week—this paragraph being omitted for want of room. We presume that Mr. McAllister means to say that this paper destroys reverence for God, instead of God's reverence, but he does not say that. When it is established as a fact that "God" has emitted a code of laws it will be time enough to talk of the dishonoring of them. As to our dishonoring the laws of the state, we do not see how our alleged "blasphemy" can do that so long as New York has no blasphemy laws. To dishonor the non-existent would be indeed a miracle. Regarding the asserted depravation of the morals of the people, we do not understand how telling the truth and defending the equal liberties of all the inhabitants of the country can have that effect. It is our earnest conviction that even "inartistic" ridicule of religious absurdities is less demoralizing than circulating falsehoods about the death beds of Infidels, giving currency to fables concerning "judgments on blasphemers," and doubling, quadrupling, and sextupling, in summing up, the actual number of petitioners for the Sunday closing of fairs or for the passage of a national Sunday law.

Rev. A. W. H. Hodder, of the Sixteenth Street Baptist church of this city, speaks right out in meeting, and tells us that Sunday should be kept as a holy day. He says nothing of the weekly "rest" for the rest's sake, which omission shows that he is more honest or less cautious than his fellow ministers and the politicians who are sailing under the false colors of the rest and morality dodge. The Sunday rest of which he incidentally speaks is to be taken so that we may obey God, who "ordained that one day in the week should be set apart that man might turn aside from the ordinary affairs of the world to perform those duties which he owes to his maker." To this end Sunday laws are to be enacted and enforced to compel those who do not voluntarily perform this religious duty to do so in order to escape judicial robbery and imprisonment. Of course this is union of church and state and nothing else. Mr. Hodder says that "a powerful and gigantic foe, imported from other lands," "would destroy the holy observance of our Christian duty." Such a statement is sadly lacking in candor. The minister knows that nothing can destroy the "holy observance" of his "Christian duty" but his individual failure to perform that duty. Sunday will be observed by those who have the requisite faith and whose inclinations do not prove too strong for their sense of duty. Mr. Hodder has perfect liberty to observe "the Sabbath." But what he wants is the power to compel everybody else to observe it.

Hence his demand for Sunday laws. No one has asked him to "throw our religious customs overboard." The strife has grown out of the Sabbatarian attempt to compel other people to accept the "religious customs" of the Puritans.

"The American Sabbath is threatened by the European invaders that try to trample on our Christian customs, sneer at our religious observances, and defile the land with the godless festivities of the continental cities."—Rev. Mr. Hodder.

Independent foreigners and native-born citizens may "sneer" at the religious observances of the Christians, but that fact should delight the heart of the genuine follower of Jesus, for that "teacher" told them that they should be blessed when men should revile them, and persecute them, and say evil things of them falsely for his sake. They were told to rejoice and be exceedingly glad, for great should be their reward in heaven. It will be noticed that this promise was conditional; they should rejoice, and they would get this reward only when the evil things said of them were false. It may be the realization of this awkward condition that makes them now so sensitive to ridicule and criticism—what is said of them and their "Christian customs" by these beastly "European invaders" is true, and so they are "reviled" here and have no hope of any reward in heaven. It is too bad. But Mr. Hodder should remember that while his superstitions may be sneered at by the "godless" he is still at perfect liberty to cherish them and perform his various incantations, while on the other side of the line his agents, the law-carpenters, are continually building prisons for his "godless" contemners. If he chooses, he can meet sneer with sneer, but we are at the mercy of the law-men and cannot retort in kind when the policeman's club is raised to intimidate us into due observance of "Christian customs."

"Never before, I think, has Christendom been so impatient of the things which divide it, and never were the hearts of men, at any rate throughout the Anglo-Saxon world, so widely or deeply stirred with a desire to be not only one of faith, but of one fellowship and one order in Jesus Christ."—Bishop Potter, Episcopalian.

Why are Christians impatient of denominational lines? Is it because their faith is growing stronger or because it is growing weaker? To an outsider it appears that they do not now so much as formerly care to subject their creeds to the strain of controversy. To closely examine the foundations of each is a dangerous process in this age of doubt and discovery. What shatters the claims of one must injuriously affect the claims of all. So it is politic to cease emphasizing differences and insist upon unities. They have found that Christian blood is thicker than Infidel water; that the system is in less danger from varying interpretations of texts than it is from the criticism that results in the rejection of the alleged divinity of the texts. It is necessary that they deal less harshly with their brethren in order that they may be in a position to deal more harshly with the Freethinkers. Hence this continually increasing pressure for the reunion of Christendom. In almost all instances the desire for church federation is inspired not by a broadening charity for divergent views but by the wish to compel the world at large to accept the "Christian Sabbath" and "Christian morality" as a whole. Realizing that they cannot hold their own in the realm of mind, they turn to the ballot-box as their predecessors turned to the kings and popes. To use the ballot box effectively for the extirpation of heresy they must be united.

The Catholic Review, commenting on the discussion between Cesare Lombroso and Max Nordau as to the propriety of including Wagner and Tolstoy among the "decadents," as Nordau has done, says that they agree that the "predominant symptom of modern vice is egotism, or megalomania." As these writers are Agnostics, it asserts, they should be able to see that the real cause of all these ills is the departure from Catholic Christianity, for while the latter teaches the supreme duty of loving God above all things and our neighbor as ourself, anti-Catholicism weakens and destroys the effect of this teaching. It continues:

"This fact is apparent when one visits the crowded and miserable slums of our great cities and reflects that a large proportion of the misery and crime that are rife there would not exist only for the cold-blooded selfishness of persons, many of whom deem themselves to be good Christians, who live in luxury in the same cities, deriving a considerable portion of their worldly means from conditions that are dependent on wretchedness and vice. This is because the religious spirit of the times, begotten of the schisms that have rent Christianity into shreds, has taught men that their chief aim should be comfort and pleasure, and so widely has this teaching been successful that even the mass of those who profess to believe in Christ are, more or less unconsciously, impelled by it. What the world needs for its rehabilitation is the resurrection of the generous, chivalrous, self-denying spirit that is essential to the really Christian life."

One unfamiliar with the history of the past, reading the foregoing, would naturally conclude that "crowded and miserable slums" side by side with careless and selfish wealth had not been known in Christendom before schisms had "rent Christianity into shreds." The church no less than the state, in the ages when the church was one, derived no inconsiderable portion of its "worldly means" from conditions that [were] dependent on wretchedness and vice." Its prelates and its popes lived in luxury, while the masses fared on crusts and were housed in hovels. In those days the church could make its chattels believe that some were destined by God to be rich and to rule, while the many were to be rewarded in heaven if they submitted uncomplainingly to the sufferings inseparable from the conditions by which it had pleased God to surround them in this world. The same gospel of classes is propagated now, as witness the sermon recently preached in Richmond by Archbishop Janssens of New Orleans, but the spread of intelligence causes much of this seed of error to fall on soil in which it cannot germinate. Men see that those who preach most loudly the duty of self-sacrifice are the very ones, as a rule, who repudiate the principles of equal justice and liberty, through the application of which alone will it be possible to reduce poverty and vice to the minimum. Men see the church covetously seize the scanty earnings of the poor to use in the erection of million and ten-million dollar temples of superstition, and then turn about and double-tax the homes of the laborers to pay the taxes on these costly edifices wherein are set up the idols of medievalism. Only when all men become wise enough to intelligently seek their own pleasure and comfort here on this earth will the race fairly start on the forward march. Charity is a mere stop-gap, a temporary binding of the wound, a transient shelter. As an individual manifestation of sympathy it has its place, but as an organized substitute for opportunity and equity it is the curse of the world.

God Save Canada.

We have received a circular from a publisher of Infidel books in the United States complaining that his blasphemous publications, including a comic history of the Bible and a paper which contains caricature pictures of our Blessed Lord, are refused transmission in our Canadian mails. He complains bitterly of the tyranny of the Canadian government and seeks to enlist the aid of Canadian editors in denouncing this "bigotry."

This Infidel editor asks too much. The Canadian postal department is run at a large annual loss in order to supply all parts of our vast country with cheap postal facilities, with a distribution of that great modern educator, the newspaper. It never was designed to be the vehicle for spreading broadcast over the land the indecencies, obscenities, and blasphemies which characterize the satanic press of the United States. While that country has some of the noblest papers in the world it has also some of the vilest.

The man who would scatter the contagion of smallpox or cholera in the mail would be regarded as the vilest of felons. But his crime would be white compared with that of the man who would diffuse the moral pestilence against which Anthony Comstock is waging such a prolonged and successful war. We establish a quarantine against smallpox and cholera, but much more necessary is it to safeguard our young country from the contagion of moral pestilence.

We congratulate the Dominion of Canada on the purity of its press. Its editors and publishers sedulously exclude from the printed page anything that would bring a blush to the cheek of innocence or besmirch the young mind. And well they may. There is a great privilege and a great responsibility. The press finds welcome admission to all of our homes and exerts an influence not less, we judge, but more potent than that of a teacher or preacher. God forbid that it should be perverted to inculcate infidelity and vice.

We rejoice that the vast preponderance of Canadians—Catholics and Protestants alike—whether Grit or Tory, will support the government of the day in refusing to become the partners in crime of the infamous publishers of infamous papers in the diffusion of their vicious teachings.—Onward.

The Old Story in Plain English, with Notes and Comments.

III.

When the wager of law was in vogue, if a certain number of witnesses would swear that they believed that the accused was innocent he was acquitted. These witnesses must be sworn in the most sacred places and in the most solemn manner. It was believed, when men were sworn in such sacred places and solemn manner, and in the presence of Almighty God, who took cognizance of all the actions of men, that the great autocrat of the upper world would come down upon him with his great calamity hammer and grind him to powder if he swore falsely. There are numerous accounts of men who had testified falsely being struck dead on the spot. Notwithstanding all of these solemn and precautionary measures the courts were the most unreliable of any known in history. The courts swarmed with sanctimonious scoundrels who would swear away a man's life with as little compunction as a terrier would manifest in shaking a rat. Ecclesiastics almost invariably escaped justice. All of this holy mummerly has nothing to do with a man's moral character. The more of this holy slush the people have imbibed, the lower their standard of morals has been. When a man is made to kiss an old greasy book in order to lasso his honesty, it looks to me like inculcating morals by injection. I have been present when hundreds of witnesses were sworn, and as far as my acquaintance goes the men who refused to be put through the holy gospel process were the men in whom I had the greater confidence, and I cannot call to mind an instance where a man whose morals were shaky refused to kiss the old book of spooks and ghosts. A man who will bear false witness, to injure one man or to favor another, is not trustworthy, and all the books, holy or unholy, will not transform him into an honest man.

A high state of civilization is reached only by slow degrees, and church dogmas have never served as stepping-stones, but have had a tendency to fill men with hellish hate and slavish superstition which have only impeded their progress. Wherever the people have most trusted in God, there has been found the lowest state of morals.

Under the wager of battle they settled all disputes, claims, and criminal complaints by battle, fully believing that God would uphold the right. But God had no more to do with these battles than he has with a drunken row on the street. Another case where faith in God brutalizes men.

At another time every claim and accusation was settled by ordeal. There was the ordeal of boiling water or oil, from which the accused must fish a small stone or ring, under the firm belief that in every instance God would protect the innocent. There is one case, as well authenticated as any of the holy happenings, in which the accused held his arm up to his elbow for two hours in a boiling cauldron of water without injury. Teach a man from youth that God protected the three Hebrew children in the fiery furnace, and then it is easy to cram such nonsensical drivel down his throat.

There was also the ordeal of red-hot iron. It was believed that if the accused was innocent God would enable him to walk over red-hot plowshares, or carry red-hot irons in his hands, without injury. According to the statements, this feat has been performed hundreds of times without harm. If any one can tell how the people were imposed upon in regard to such statements, he can tell how the people were imposed upon in regard to the miracles of the Bible.

Then there was the ordeal of fire direct. Sometimes the hand of the accused was held in a flame. Sometimes huge pyres were built, and the one on trial must walk through the flames. It is stated that a monk walked between two piles of blazing wood, ten feet long, five feet high, and four and a half feet wide—the passage between them being six feet wide—and he walked through over glowing coals bare-legged and bare-footed without singeing the hair on his legs. Then he desired to return, but was prevented by the admiring crowd. Make a man believe that he is a special favorite of heaven and he is unfitted to associate with men on the earth.

Next comes the ordeal of cold water, into which the accused was thrown to test his or her innocence or guilt. If guilty, it was believed that God would not suffer the pure water to receive him, and he would float. No doubt God had as much to do with the water as he does with the water when a fool minister plunges a lot of other fools under water when the mercury is below zero. If you want to produce a lot of high-pressure fools, stuff them with theological notions.

Then there was the trial by balance, by which the guilt or innocence of the accused was determined by weight. This mode of trial was more particularly applied to witches and sorcerers. The one suspected of being a witch was put upon the scale and weighed, and after a little time was weighed again. If guilty, the accused would not weigh as much as when weighed before. Sometimes a Bible was put at the opposite end of the scale beam, and if guilty the Bible would outweigh the witch. Of course God would not allow his holy book to be outweighed by a witch. Thus it will be seen that the more they trusted in God the bigger fools they grew.

The ordeal of the cross was often resorted to. The two contending parties were made to face a cross or crucifix, with arms extended like a cross. The one who could hold out the longer was adjudged to have justice on his side. All will see that this was simply a test of physical endurance and determined nothing in regard to justice. But they believed that they were serving God, and, as we know to-day, the more they tried to serve God the more they outraged justice and humanity. Through all the Christian ages, the more the fool Christians have tried to do for God, the more they have neglected the real interests of their fellow-man.

Besides these there was the ordeal of bread and cheese, and the ordeal of the eucharist, and the ordeal of Lot, and perhaps some other ordeals which I know not of and which should never have been known to anybody.

There were religious ceremonies connected with these ordeals, some of which would prove interesting, but they are too long to be written out. A piece of bread or cheese was prayed over and blessed and the culprit was compelled to eat it in the presence of a gaping multitude who believed that if he was innocent he could eat the consecrated bread or cheese as he would ordinarily do, but if guilty, God, who was supposed to give attention to all of these little matters, would cause the consecrated bit to stick in his throat and choke him. When we understand the minds of the people these things are not strange. When once a man comes to believe that God has to do with all the concerns of men, and that with him all things are possible, he can be stuffed with any kind of absurdity, if "God" is on the label.

The Christian superstition known as the Bier Right ought to be noticed in this connection. If a person was murdered it was believed by the god-crammed imbecils that if the murderer touched the dead body of the murdered it would bleed. Sometimes hundreds were marched by and made to touch the dead body in order to detect the murderer by the blood which would flow. The story is well authenticated that a man was murdered and thrown into the river, and that one of his bones was washed ashore, and even the old bone bled when touched by the murderer.

I have only hinted at these tricks and ordeals; a full account would fill a volume; and yet I am afraid that even the brief allusion which I have given to them will be considered tedious, but I wanted the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to know something about the Christian jurisprudence when God presided over and ruled the courts.

Some may think that the statements in regard to these trials are beyond the facts, and fictitious. Let me assure the reader that they are far short of the facts; and I would say that if we had lived in those times we should have been concerned in and approved of those trials; and further that if Christianity were left unrestrained it would return to its old usages as naturally as water runs down hill, and I will prove it. Every Christian believes in a god who is all-powerful and all-wise, that he cannot do wrong, that he is interested in and directs the affairs of men, and that he is always on the side of justice. A Christian cannot be found who will deny either of the above propositions. If he does, he is not a Christian.

Now, when we come to understand how a Christian would naturally be affected by these beliefs we have the key to the philosophy applicable to the Christian courts and ordeals. If God is all-wise he can see the right, if he is all-powerful he can do right. If God cannot do wrong and directs the affairs of men he will direct them right. If God is on the side of justice, justice must prevail.

If two men should step into the arena to-day to settle a dispute with swords or guns, we would say the most dextrous would win, but not so then. They believed that God was on the side of justice and would uphold the right. If a man was put to trial by the ordeal of fire or boiling water they believed that God would protect the innocent, and allow only the guilty to suffer.

Why did these beliefs cause the Christians to run into such absurd and barbaric practices? Simply because there is not one of the propositions which I have stated and by which they were governed, true.

Freethought Federation and Union.

Rome or Reason: Which?

Address by Samuel P. Putnam at the Opening Session of the Freethinkers' National Congress, Hardman's Hall, New York, Friday, October 25, 1895.

Cardinal Manning was one of the shrewdest and most potent representatives of the Church of Rome in this century. He was the incarnation of its principles and its authority, of its supreme ambition and unfaltering hope. The Church of Rome desires and aims to be the one commanding power upon this planet. It allows no rival. It will brook no opposition. Subtly, persistently, comprehensively it pursues its determined course. It accommodates itself to civilization for no other purpose than to subdue that civilization. It is a vast conspiracy against human liberty, human knowledge, and human progress. It is like an invisible wild beast, forever crouching and forever ready to spring. It is the darkest, the most dangerous, the most stupendous inheritance of the ages, a perpetual menace from the superstitions of the past to every achievement of the untrammelled mind.

Rome is a wily power. It clothes itself in the dazzling garb of philosophy, and would be eloquent, artistic, poetic. It would ally itself with reform and education. It professes to be the poor man's friend. It adorns its pathway with flowers. Rome is no fool. It understands the world with which it deals. It uses ignorance, but it also uses wisdom. It enlists every intellectual power of which it is capable. It excludes nothing. It seeks universal empire by every potency of human heart or brain.

It won't do to say that Rome is merely a mass of prejudice, ignorance, and superstition, which civilization will surely sweep away. Rome is all this, but so admirably organized, so wonderfully endowed, that prejudice, ignorance, and superstition actually use art, philosophy, poetry, and the triumphs of human genius for its enduring sway, and enthral humanity by the most noble powers of the mind.

Rome builds deep. It is no superficial structure. To argue against Rome requires the widest range of thought, the most skillful perception. Rome entrenches itself in every conceivable strategy of the reason. It bristles with logic. It fights not simply with the sword, but with keen and brilliant dialectic weapons, for it seeks so to dominate that it would make all men willing slaves to its enormous authority. It is so greedy in its pursuit of power that it would reign in every province of man's mental domain. It would convince every one by the action of his own reason that he ought to be the most abject of slaves. By one's own will Rome would annihilate his liberty. What an all-comprehensive tyranny it aspires to be! To overthrow Rome requires the most radical and courageous exercise of the mental faculties. We are not contending against brute force as brute force, but brute force equipped with the strength and grace of genius itself.

This subtle, intellectual method of Rome, using intellect for its own dethronement, is well illustrated in an article by Cardinal Manning in the Nineteenth Century entitled "Without God, No Commonwealth," from which I will give a few extracts to demonstrate my argument.

"I will set down," says the cardinal, "as briefly as I can the meaning and reasons for the proposition I here affirm, namely, that the social and civil commonwealth of mankind had its origin, and still has its perpetuity, in the knowledge of God, and in obedience to him springing from that knowledge, so that without God no commonwealth is possible. It therefore follows that the theory now so commonly accepted, that between church and state there ought to be no union; that the state in its origin and action is secular, and that religion must be left to individuals, cannot stand."

It will be seen that in his fundamental premise the cardinal opposes himself directly to Freethought and Secular principles, to the Constitution of the United States and the Declaration of Independence. In the Constitution there is no recognition whatever of God, even by name; and while his name is in the Declaration it is merely a name without authority, for it is affirmed that "governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed."

Radical and far-reaching, therefore, is the opposition of Rome to republican liberty.

"There are three imperishable relations in human life," continues the cardinal, "authority, obedience, brotherhood; and these relations are not the result of original compact, or of enactments of men, but are inseparable from the order of human life. Authority, obedience, and brotherhood are the three ultimate and all-sufficing laws of the human commonwealth. Equality, liberty, and fraternity are the parody and perversion of this divine order."

The issue is thus distinctly stated as between Rome and Reason.

With Rome it is authority, obedience, and brotherhood based upon obedience and authority; with Reason it is liberty, equality, and fraternity based upon the principles of universal human nature. We accept the gauntlet thrown down by the cardinal; it is liberty, equality, and true fraternity against authority, obedience, and a false brotherhood, the child of theology, which at the bidding of the church has drawn the sword and slain millions of the human race. The brotherhood of the church has not one particle of common humanity to illuminate its cruel bigotry. The "brotherhood" is simply the unity of the slaves of Rome against human rights, human liberty, and human progress.

Upon our banners shall forever blaze the noble words, Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity. From the point of view of Cardinal Manning, in the bosom of the church of Rome, these are a "parody and a perversion." From our point of view, the free and cultured reason of humanity, they are the most inspiring truths and grandest hopes in the long and toilsome march from barbarism to civilization. The music of these words will never cease so long as man has a heart of love and a brain of fire.

Again says the cardinal: "There can only be conceived two fountains of law. It springs either from the will of God, or the will of man."

Observe the deep cunning and sophistry of the advocate of Rome. He would have only two alternatives for the "fountains of law," the "will of God" and "the will of man." Granting that there are "fountains of law," there is a third alternative: eternal nature itself, of which God and man are simply evolutions. But according to reason and science there are no "fountains of law," in the sense that there are beginnings to law. Law or method is co-eternal with existence itself. Given existence, there is law, God or no God, man or no man. If existence is unbeginning and unending, so law, or the mode of existence, is unbeginning and unending. There can be no existence without a mode or law. It is absurd, therefore, to talk of the "fountains of law." There are none anywhere in the universe. Is there any "fountain" to the "law of gravitation," that is, was there ever a time when the law of gravitation did not exist? Was there ever a time when two and two did not make four? when the square of the hypothenuse was not equal to the sum of the squares of the other two sides of a right-angled triangle? Was there ever a time when two parallel lines on the same plane would meet? Was there ever a time when the whole was not greater than a part? God, if there is one, can only express a law, like man himself. He can neither make nor unmake a law. He must obey the law, or the law will unmake him. God exists, if at all, according to law, and without law God is not. There may be "fountains" or "causes" of events, but not of the law by which the event occurs. The "fountains" and the "causes" are the results of the law, its consequence, and not its antecedent. Law attends all events, like being itself, and being cannot create law, for there can be no being without a way or method of being, and law is the method of being, and necessarily must be uncreated. How closely we must follow the cardinal. We must watch him at every step. Give him "fountains of law" and he slips airily away into the "will of God" as the "fountain" of all; but deny, as scientifically we must, his "fountain of law," and he is stuck in the mud of his own creation. He can no farther go.

He makes a struggle, though. He says, "Toward those who deny the existence of a Creator, I have no farther duty until they have made up their mind to say whether mankind is created, uncreated, or self-created." What a play upon words is this! How utterly meaningless is the cardinal's proposition when analyzed. He thinks he has the unbeliever in a logical dilemma. It is nothing of the sort. The cardinal is simply floundering in a mass of words without ideas. Creation is not a word of reason or science. It is so many letters and that is all. It covers an intellectual blank. In answer to the cardinal, we say, man is neither created, uncreated, nor self-created. He is evolved, and all that is in man to-day existed without beginning in the eternal forces of nature. The word evolution covers the whole ground, and totally excludes creation, or any reference to it. We might as well talk of man as a "vacuum" as to talk of him as a "creation."

Farther along the cardinal gives himself dead away. He says: "And now I am prepared to hear an objector say 'You are assuming the existence of law, of nature and God.' I do assume these truths."

The cardinal admits that God is an assumption, which is very true, and therefore at the root of his "law," his "nature," his "divine order," his church, is an assumption. The cardinal is forced to this. He must confess that the whole fabric of his theology, of his revelation, of his authority, is an assumption, and man is called upon to obey an assumption, to worship an assumption, to build temples to an assumption, to give millions of dollars for the glory of an assumption. He must persecute heretics for the honor of an assumption. He must imprison, burn, slay at the command of an assumption. His reason and conscience must be subordinate to an assumption. The state must be under the rule of an assumption. God is an assumption, as the cardinal truly says, but this assumption is so interwoven with man's selfishness and greed, and savagery, and ignorance, that it has become a most disastrous assumption, and a very real evil in human history. Rome is based upon an assumption, but not the less terrible is its despotism.

Cardinal Manning affirms that both church and state are of divine origin, and that obedience is due to each. His words are: "The Christian law says to children 'Obey your parents,' and to subjects, 'Let every soul be subject to the higher powers, for there is no power but from God.'"

The state, therefore, is to be obeyed, no matter what its character. It is the representative of God. Christians, therefore, are bound to respect it, no matter how bad its laws. The Church of Rome is not alone in this affirmation, for John Wesley, a faithful Christian, upheld the infamous government of George III. and condemned the American Revolution as contrary to the commands of the Bible. Of course that is the logic of it. If the powers that be are ordained of God, then we must submit; if we believe in God, we must bend the knee to whomsoever holds the authority. Not only does Rome insist upon its own authority, but upon the authority of every tyrant, of every unjust legislation, of every corrupt government. To maintain its own prestige, Rome clothes with the same divine prestige every government ever instituted by human society, whatever its vices and crimes may be.

Freethought and reason maintain the contrary; that governments are made by the people, for the benefit of the people, and when they do not benefit the people, they are to be abolished. The government is subordinate to the people, an instrumentality in the hands of the people for certain purposes. The people make it, and they can unmake it at any time, without any consultation with God, church, Bible, or pope.

If the state is divine, then of course it has the right to persecute, and Cardinal Manning acknowledges this. He says that in the first period of the church it was an illegal society, and its religion an illegal religion, "and if its religion had not been the revelation of truth it ought not to have been practiced." The state, therefore, has a right to persecute a false religion, according to the cardinal; which position is opposed to Freethought and reason, for the state has no right to persecute any religion, false or otherwise. As Ingersoll says, every man has a right to think wrong. If he has not this right, he has no rights at all. If one's rights cease the moment he is mistaken, of what value are his rights? The right to think at all implies the right to think in every direction, right or wrong.

The right to persecute a false religion implies the right to persecute all religions, for who is to decide as to the true religion?—the majority; and it comes to this by necessity, that the true religion is what the majority approve, and the false religion is what the majority condemn. If you grant the state any religious function whatsoever, you must grant it the right to decide what is true and false in religion; and if it has the right to persecute, it has the right to decide upon whom that persecution shall be inflicted.

From his point of view Cardinal Manning describes the awful consequences of an Agnostic or Secular parliament. "What," he cries, "would restrain such a legislature from abolishing the legal observance of Christmas, of Good Friday, and of the Sunday? Why should not such a legislature abolish all oaths of every kind? Why should not such a parliament abolish chaplains and cease to take its seat at prayers? Why not hold morning sittings on Sunday, and general elections of Sunday, and throw open, not museums only, but theaters, on Sunday? Why should it not abolish all laws against blasphemy?"

These results, which seem so abhorrent to Cardinal Manning, are most devoutly wished for by the reasonable and freethinking man.

Cardinal Manning wrote this article in opposition to Charles Bradlaugh. He was one of the most bitter opponents of the great Freethinker in the House of Commons, and Bradlaugh scored him with fiery eloquence. In the same way the church once opposed the rights of the Jew. In the early days of Disraeli he was scorned as of this race. He answered back to his tormentors: "I am proud to be a Jew, for one-half of Christendom worships a Jew and the other half worships his mother." The Jew has triumphed and so has Bradlaugh triumphed over the assumptions and tyranny of the church of Rome. Cardinal Manning could not stem the tide of progress. He has, however, shown the unchangeable barbarism and superstition of his own church. Rome does not alter. What it was in the Middle Ages it is to-day. Cardinal Manning is, perhaps, its most famous and accredited representative in these modern times. Cardinal Manning, who cultivates art, science, philosophy, philanthropy, charity, and all the graces of an educated people, he is the devotee and defender of Rome—he still affirms the union of church and state and the authority of Rome. He flouts at liberty, equality, and fraternity. He admits that God is an assumption, but we must obey him without question. He declares the divine right of kings and the sinfulness of rebellion against the higher powers. He justifies persecution on the ground that no one has a right to practice a false religion. He would maintain the cruel laws of the past against blasphemy. He would enforce the observance of Christmas, Good Friday, and Sunday. He sets himself directly in opposition to the rights of free reason. Rome has not surrendered a single claim. It grows wise with the ages, but gains not a single virtue or trait of justice or spark of liberty. Our warfare with Rome is to the death. It cannot be otherwise.

Rome trembles before the statue of Bruno. Well it may, for the martyrs of the past will be the conquerors of the future.

Having demonstrated by its own ablest defender what Rome is to-day, the question arises as to the relation of Rome to the state, according to its own creeds. It affirms that the state is a divine society or organization and that they necessarily co-operate. But suppose they do not co-operate; suppose these two "divine authorities" do not agree? Will they agree to disagree as of equal authority, or must the one succumb to the other, so that really after all there is but one divine authority? There is no question as to the claim of Rome. It arrogates the right to overthrow the authority of the state itself when that authority opposes its own. The church as a church can oppose any government and command its members to do the same. The union of church and state is not an equal union; but a union where the state, although of divine authority, is in absolute subjection to the demands of Rome. In order to maintain my argument I will quote from the leaders and documents of the church to show its treatment, not only of heretics, but of the state itself.

From Dr. Strong's book, "Our Country," the following selections are made:

Bishop O'Connor says: "Religious liberty is merely endured until the opposite is carried into effect, without peril to the Catholic world."

The Catholic Review says: "Protestantism of every form has not and never can have any right where Catholicity is triumphant."

The archbishop of St. Louis says: "Heresy and unbelief are crimes and in Christian countries, as in Italy and Spain, for instance, where all the people are Catholics, and where the Catholic religion is an essential part of the law of the land, they are punished as other crimes."

The Boston Pilot says: "No good government can exist without religion, and there can be no religion without an inquisition which is wisely designed for the promotion and protection of the true faith."

The Rambler, a Catholic paper of London, says: "Religious liberty, in the sense of a liberty possessed by every man to choose his religion, is one of the most wicked delusions ever foisted upon this age by the father of all deceit. The very name of Liberty—except in the sense of a permission to do certain acts—ought to be banished from the domain of religion. It is neither more nor less than falsehood. No man has a right to choose his religion. None but an Atheist can uphold the principles of religious liberty. Shall I foster that damnable doctrine that Socinianism and Calvinism and Anglicism and Judaism are not every one of them mortal sins, like murder and adultery? Shall I hold out hopes to my erring Protestant brother, that I will not meddle with his creed if he will not meddle with mine? Shall I tempt him to forget that he has no more right to his religious views than he has to my purse, to my house, to my life-blood? No, Catholicism is the most intolerant of creeds. It is intolerance itself, for it is the truth itself."

The St. Louis Shepherd of the Valley says: "The Catholic who says the church is not intolerant believes the sacred spouse of Christ."

Every cardinal, archbishop and bishop in the Catholic church take an oath of allegiance to the pope, in which occur the following words: "Heretics, schismatics, and rebels to our said Lord (the Pope) or his aforesaid successors, I will to my utmost persecute and oppose."

The pope's encyclical letter declares: "The Romish church has a right to exercise its authority without any limits set to it by the civil power. The pope and the priests ought to have dominion over temporal affairs. The Romish church and her ecclesiastics have a right to immunity from civil law. In case of conflict between the ecclesiastical and civil powers, the ecclesiastical power ought to prevail."

Gladstone says: "The pope demands for himself the right to determine the province of his own rights, and has so defined it in formal documents as to warrant any and every invasion of the civil sphere. Rome requires a convert who joins her to forfeit his moral and mental freedom, and place his loyalty and civil duty at the mercy of another."

Says Bismarck in a speech, April 16, 1875: "This pope, this foreigner, this Italian, is more powerful in this country than any one person, not excepting even the king. And now, please, consider what this foreigner has announced as the program by which he rules in Prussia and elsewhere. He begins by arrogating to himself the right to define how far his authority extends. And this pope, who would use fire and sword against us, if he had the power to do so, who would confiscate our property and not spare our lives, expects us to allow him full, uncontrolled sway in our midst."

Bishop Gilmore, March, 1873: "Nationalities must be subordinate to religion, and must learn that we are Catholics first and citizens next."

Cardinal McCloskey: "They [the Catholics of the United States] are as strongly devoted to the sustenance and maintenance of the temporal power of the holy father, as Catholics, in any part of the world, and if it shall be necessary to prove it by acts, they are ready to do so."

Cardinal Manning, in a sermon, puts the following sentences in the mouth of the pope: "I acknowledge no civil power. I am the subject of no prince, and I claim more than this. I claim to be the supreme judge and director of the consciences of men; of the peasant that tills the fields, and of the prince that sits upon the throne; of the household that lives in the shaded privacy, and the legislator that makes laws of kingdoms. I am the sole last supreme judge of what is right and wrong." Again he says: "Moreover, we declare, affirm, define, and pronounce it necessary to salvation for every human creature to be subject to the Roman pontiff."

Cardinal Ballarmino teaches: "If the pope should err by enjoining vices or forbidding virtues, the church would be obliged to believe vices to be good, and virtues to be bad."

Having shown that Rome claims universal dominion, and purposes to attain this by every means in its power, not only by the persecution of the individual heretic, but even by the destruction of governments if need be, the final question arises, How are we to meet these mighty claims of Rome? With what forces are we to antagonize its enormous power? There are only two, Protestantism and Freethought.

Protestantism has made a mighty onset against Rome, and for a time was successful. But Protestantism has become a creed and church like Rome, and as such it cannot contend against the more ancient ecclesiastical power. Protestantism is founded upon the infallibility of the Bible, Rome upon the infallibility of the church. Rome has a much stronger foundation in history and logic, and in human nature itself.

Overthrow the infallibility of the Bible, and the Protestant church has no foundation. Its cornerstone is removed and it tumbles to pieces. The infallibility of the Bible is overthrown to day by Christian scholars themselves. There is no longer any hope for this doctrine among enlightened believers. Rome, therefore, has an immense advantage over Protestants, for to destroy the infallibility of the Bible is not necessarily to destroy the infallibility of the church, since the latter infallibility is not based upon the former. Rome is not built upon the Bible as a book, but upon a direct supernatural intervention of divine energy and will; and the Bible is simply a record of this transaction. The transaction itself in its origin is independent of the Bible. The Bible, history, tradition, and the existence of the church itself to-day in its pomp and power and venerable glory, are the testimonies to this transaction. The church of Rome does not need an infallible Bible. No matter how the Bible is regarded by modern criticism, whether as a fallible or infallible record, this does not touch the infallibility of the church itself, which has its foundation in the act of God, and not in any history of that act in Bible or tradition. Therefore, Rome is not involved in the same ruin with Protestantism, because its fortunes are not dependent upon the fortunes of the Bible. Bound up with the infallibility of the Bible, when that infallibility is swept away by modern thought, Protestantism becomes a dissolving view; while the rock of Rome's infallibility is untouched. The authority of the church, a vast, living, magnificent, and potent organization, must be overthrown by other means than those that destroy the infallibility of a book.

You cannot appeal from infallibility to infallibility. You cannot overthrow the church of Rome by any Protestant Bible. Use the Bible as you will, you cannot fatally injure this gigantic institution, for the church of Rome is not founded upon the Bible, but the Bible upon that.

There is only one appeal against the tyranny, intellectual, spiritual, and political, of Rome, and that appeal is to the free human reason itself, untrammelled by any Bible, any creed, or any priesthood. Protestantism will be shivered to pieces in this great contest. It will either fall into the bosom of Rome, or sweep onward into Freethought. Into Rome will finally be gathered every form of despotism, ignorance, superstition, and dogmatism. Against it will be arrayed the science of the world, the principles of the Declaration of Independence, and every aspiration for human freedom and progress. It is Rome or Reason. Every individual must choose. Every nation must choose. There is no middle ground. There can be no compromise. Rome claims all. Against this, reason must maintain its supremacy. With Rome it is slavery, retrogression, ignorance, prejudice, superstition, and barbarism, whatever may be the outward attraction. Science, philosophy, art, literature, must bend the knee to Rome or cease to flourish. With reason, it is human happiness and human improvement. It is the sweets of liberty and the riches of civilization. It is the full bloom of humanity, in intellect and in heart. It is the exercise of every faculty; the triumph of genius and of love.

REPORT OF THE CONGRESS.

The annual Congress of the Freethought Federation and Secular Union, called to be held at Hardman Hall, New York, October 25th, 26th, and 27th, opened last Friday morning at 10 o'clock, according to program. This being the first session, there was not a large crowd present at that time, but enough were on hand to make the prospect cheerful. The first person from a distance to report at THE TRUTH SEEKER office was Treasurer E. C. Reichwald, of Chicago. The first arrivals from inside the state were J. K. Ingalls, Glenora; Geo. L. Pratt, Ridgeway; Eugene V. C. Myers, and Ferdinand Wells, Germantown; Dr. S. W. Wetmore, Buffalo; U. G. Beck, Elmira; W. T. Galloway, Stony Ford; W. S. Galloway, Hankins; W. W. Ames, DeRuyter; H. M. Parkhurst and Mrs. Parkhurst, Henry Rowley and A. S. Barnes, Brooklyn. Susan Wixon and her sister, Bethiah, of Fall River, Mrs. M. Florence Johnson, W. B. Clarke, and Capt. J. H. Handy, represented Massachusetts, and Mrs. A. N. Booth and Mrs. Kate M. Gillen came from New Jersey. Among the town folks were L. G. Reed, E. E. Hitchcock, Prof. E. C. Beall, Miss S. Levin, Mrs. Amy Scudamore, S. R. Thorne, Mrs. Fred Leland, Dr. Stevens, the Drs. Foote, E. W. Chamberlain and fifty others. Those who came later got lost in the crowd.

When President Putnam had called the meeting to order the audience listened to a piano and violin duet by Mrs. Macdonald and Mr. R. A. Kelly, who, it may as well be said here, placed everybody under deep obligation to them for their services as musicians all through the Congress. These and the other musical entertainers—Mrs. Kelly, Mr. Kelly, Sr., Miss Kelly, J. R. Macdonald, and Miss Hicks—received an appreciative vote of thanks. Geo. E. Macdonald, on motion of Franklin Steiner, was elected secretary of the Congress. Mr. Putnam read the Nine Demands, and then delivered the address which precedes this report. He departed somewhat from the printed text, prefacing the main speech with an outline of the purposes of the organization and the attitude of Secularists toward religion as a creed and as a political power. He spoke with great earnestness and was heartily applauded. On motion of E. C. Walker, the chair appointed committees as follows:

On Nominations: E. M. Macdonald, New York; Dr. E. B. Foote, Sr., New York; L. K. Washburn, Revere, Mass.

On Resolutions: Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass.; E. C. Walker, New York; Henry Rowley, Brooklyn; T. B. Wakeman, New York; Ed. W. Chamberlain, New York.

On Credentials: E. C. Reichwald, Chicago.

On Amendments: Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., New York; Franklin Steiner, Des Moines; Henry Bird, Newark, N. J.

The morning session closed with an invitation to all who indorsed the Nine Demands to leave their names with the secretary, which quite a number did. Some left a contribution also, and a $20 collection was the result. The introductions and handshakings that always occur at such times were conducted with warmth, and it was very plain that the Congress was starting out under most favorable auspices.

On the afternoon of Friday there was an increased attendance. Exercises opened with a recitation by Mrs. Johnson—"A Freeman's Resolution," one of William Denton's poems from "The Truth Seeker Collection." Later, Mrs. Johnson gave with fine effect a selection from "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," including the poem on Bruno by G. E. Macdonald.

President Putnam said "I am glad to see so many veterans of the cause present, but we also need youth in our movement, and I am therefore glad to introduce to you Mr. Edward Dobson, the youngest, I think, of our Freethought lecturers, who will give you an address, and a good one, on 'Freethought and Civilization.'" Mr. Dobson followed with an excellent paper, in which he had no difficulty in showing that Freethought was not only the source of art, education, and science, but also of the material prosperity of nations.

Professor Ames, who had been named on the program as the speaker of the afternoon, was unable to attend; but Dr. S. W. Wetmore, of Buffalo, although a late accession to the Freethought ranks, took the platform and read a valuable paper on "Church Taxation."

The reading of a letter from Judge C. B. Waite, of Chicago, former president of the American Secular Union, with music and recitations, occupied the remainder of this session.

The Friday evening's exercises were under the management of the famous Manhattan Liberal Club. Dr. Foote, Jr., presided, and in opening said that the session would be devoted to the discussion of two particular demands of Liberalism—free mails and a free Sunday. On the Sunday issue there would probably be little divergence of opinion, but there might be some who would regret to have the old Comstock question raised again. Nevertheless new outrages under the postal laws had forced it to the front, and the dangers foreseen by that clear thinker, Stephen Pearl Andrews, were upon us. In Kansas Moses Harman was in prison, and Jacob B. Wise under indictment. Our neighbor, Canada, had excluded THE TRUTH SEEKER from its mails as blasphemous. Here Dr. Foote read from the Christian Statesman and Christian Reformer to show that the same outrage is contemplated in this country. From the speaker's point of view the real blasphemies are committed by the religious press. He called attention to copies of the Epworth News, one of which contained a picture of an angel comforting Elijah. This illustration, designed to perpetuate fable as a fact, was blasphemous in the eyes of science. Moreover, to stuff the minds of children with such worthless trash was injurious and demoralizing. The second picture showed the ascension of Christ, a mythical and impossible event. It was blasphemy to the truth, and Freethinkers had a better warrant in fact to demand their suppression than believers had to call for the suppression of the pictures by Heston.

Lawyer Ed. W. Chamberlain spoke to the same subject, giving a brief history of the Comstock postal laws and the outrages committed under them. These laws belong to the class resembling sausages; we may have some respect for them until we find how they are made. In the present case, the statutes were enacted in the closing confusion of the most disgraceful congress in the history of the nation. After a thorough exposure of the vice society and its methods, Mr. Chamberlain read a resolution favoring the abolition of postal censorship.

Dr. E. B. Foote, Sr., presented the case of Louis Waisbrooker, publisher of Foundation Principles, now under indictment. He also related the history of the National Defense Association, which has done so much to thwart the efforts of Comstock and his society when directed against scientific and reformatory work.

J. K. Ingalls, of Glenora, N. Y., the veteran Land reformer, recited with vigor a commonweal poem that won hearty applause.

Moses Oppenheimer spoke on the Sunday question, pointing out that what are called Sunday crimes differ fundamentally from actual crimes, in that while real offenses would be suppressed by the people whether there was any law on the subject or not, nobody cares to assist the police in enforcing these Sabbath laws. These Puritan statutes, Mr. Oppenheimer said, must not be confounded with the laborer's claim to a day of rest. What the laborer wants is say thirty-six consecutive hours of abstinence from labor in every week, and he does not care whether he rests on the Mohammedan Friday, the Jewish Saturday, or the Christian Sunday. The speaker proposed that since it was impossible for all to rest at once, there should be an agreement between employers and employees whereby alternate days of rest could be secured, as is now done in the office of newspapers which are published every day. This would be the way of liberty.

Mr. Wakeman, being called upon to pronounce the benedictory speech, said that he must appear without preparation. He was conducting a political campaign alone, and found the labor fatiguing. Still, he needed no special preparation for this subject, for he had got that twenty years ago. The trouble between Liberals and the churches arises out of their different views of the world and man. The churches take the theocratic view, and would govern the righteous by the supposed law of God, while excluding and consigning to hell all who did not look at the matter in that way. "Even my Prohibition friends," said the speaker, "go astray in this, and regard Sunday liquor selling as a sin to be punished by God, instead of treating it as a question of economics. They even go back to the decalog for instructions, and charge upon those who favor a free Sunday the heresy of submitting a command of God to the vote of corrupt cities. As if it made any difference as to authority whether a measure originated on Sinai or in the Sixth ward." Religious morality is restrictive and exclusiv. Natural morality is inclusiv and would improve all and condemn none. The rest day, whenever it is had, should give time for recreation, and in establishing it we must be governed simply by convenience. Mr. Wakeman alluded to the case of Mrs. O'Hearn, the New York woman who was sentenced to three months' imprisonment for selling a glass of whisky to a police spy and who had that day been pardoned by Governor Morton. The news was received with hearty cheers. On the subject of free mails, Mr. Wakeman said that any use of the postal system except for convenience of communication was a misuse and usurpation.

Saturday morning's session was a sort of committee meeting, the tedium of which many members evaded by staying away. The Committee on Amendment reported through Dr. Foote, Jr., a form of constitution for the American Secular Union, effecting the union of that organization with the Freethought Federation, which was adopted.

A letter was read from Mr. A. B. Reynolds, of Hazleton, Kansas, proposing to devote a tract of land to the purposes of a Freethought Home. The Freethought Federation not being an incorporated body, and incorporation of a national organization not being practicable, the Congress was at a loss to see how it could avail itself of Mr. Reynolds's generous offer. The secretary was instructed to respond to Mr. Reynolds, stating the facts in the matter and extending the hearty thanks of the Congress.

Mrs. A. M. Freeman's report as secretary of the American Secular Union was read by Mr. Steiner, as follows:

SECRETARY'S REPORT.

I regret exceedingly my inability to be with you upon this occasion, and to report to you personally the work accomplished during the past year; but ill health prevented this, as it also precludes the possibility of my longer continuing to act as secretary, which office I herewith resign. Whosoever may be elected as my successor I am sure will receive your undivided and unstinted support. It is a matter of congratulation that at this Congress a union of our Secular societies is to be effected. For this alliance the credit is largely due to Judge C. B. Waite, who for three years was president of the A. S. U. Mr. Putnam, who was elected president of both organizations at the last Congress, has wisely continued this policy of peace, and once more Secularists will be united under one banner in defense of liberty.

The present board of officers has not been idle. You are aware of Mr. Putnam's success in England—the splendid ability with which he presented Freethought from an American standpoint. Our young friend, Franklin Steiner, has been constantly in the lecture field, and has won for himself many deserved laurels.

To E. C. Reichwald, treasurer of the Federation, many thanks are due. He has performed not only his duties as treasurer, but has acted largely as secretary. Otto Wettstein, of the American Secular Union, although in Germany for a year, has continued with his able pen to give us his sympathy and support. The vice-president of the State of Illinois for the Union, whose name I am not at liberty to mention, has sent out many hundred pamphlets combating Sunday laws, Bible in the public schools, etc. Dr. Juliet H. Severance, Dr. Joseph H.

Greer, Dr. G. A. F. de Lespinasse, N. F. Griswold—all these deserve mention for their faithfulness to our cause. Judge Waite has published many able articles since his resignation as president, showing that his interest in Secularism has not decreased. As for your secretary—she has traveled nearly across the continent since last October. Last winter she lectured in Philadelphia; Northport, L. I.; before the Manhattan Liberal Club, New York; at Newark, N. J.; Willimantic, Conn.; Boston and Brockton, Mass.; Harwich, East Dennis, Oyster-ville, and Cotuit on Cape Cod; Mechanicsburg and Cincinnati, O., and in Sheridan, Ind. Then in May and June she traveled through the far West, giving three lectures in Trinidad, Col.; three in San Marcial, N. M.; four in Tucson, Ariz., one in Tempe, and six in Prescott. The terminus of the route was within about three hundred miles of Southern California. On the return trip lectures were given at Albuquerque, N. M.; Santa Fé was visited; also Marysville, Kan. Mr. Putnam had spoken at all these places last winter and had aroused an interest in Secularism which will lead to grand results in the future. New Mexico and Arizona are soon to be admitted into the Union as States. Secularists demand that their constitutions shall provide for the taxation of church property. This question is at present of great interest to the citizens of these territories.

To the Liberal publications the Union and the Federation are under many obligations. The way to liquidate these is for the members of each organization to support the Freethought press. Until this is done to a far greater extent than at present, no great headway can be made in Secular work. Freethinkers must keep posted in regard to what is going on. The enemy is alive, alert, active, every orthodox individual familiar with the object to be attained. Liberals will do well to imitate this Christian zeal.

In retiring from this position, which I have felt my inability to fill, I desire to thank the members of both organizations for the invariable kindness and courtesy accorded me. Hoping that much more may be accomplished in the future than has been in the past, I am,
Yours sincerely,
MRS. M. A. FREEMAN,
Cor. Sec. American Secular Union and Freethought Federation of America.

A communication from D. W. Smith, of Oregon, on the subject of Secular Sunday-schools was submitted to the Congress. Prof. D. T. Ames made an earnest speech in behalf of action looking to the establishment of such schools in every state. E. C. Walker pointed to the specific objects of the Federation, and suggested that work and means be focalized on them. At the same time, he said, the work of Mrs. Smith in Oregon, and the example there set for other states, could not be too highly praised. Mr. Myers suggested that the letter of Mr. Smith be published for general information, which was agreed upon. Dr. Foote spoke of the appropriateness of appointing somebody capable of such a task to pronounce a eulogy upon the work and worth of the late Katie Kehn Smith, of Oregon, of whom he spoke in terms of high praise. "We would be most fortunate," said Dr. Foote, "if we had a woman of equal genius in every state of the Union."

At this point Mr. F. B. Woodbury, secretary of the National Spiritualists' Association, of Washington, D. C., announced himself, bringing greetings from the society which he represented. Mr. Woodbury said the Spiritualists were every year paying more and more attention to the organization of Sunday-schools for the children. Having been heartily welcomed by President Putnam on behalf of the Congress, Secretary Woodbury made a brief address, which, if it had been made by the most radical Secularist, could not have had a truer ring.

Mrs. M. E. Cadwallader, honorary vice-president of the Association of Spiritualists, spoke to the subject of incorporation of Freethought societies. Miss Cadwallader pointed out as one of the objections to such incorporation the fact that no elections of officers would be legal in any other state except that in which it was incorporated and had its headquarters.

The Committee on Nominations, through Chairman E. M. Macdonald, reported these officers:
President, Samuel P. Putnam.
Secretary, E. C. Reichwald.
Treasurer, Otto Wettstein.

Vice-Presidents, C. B. Waite, T. B. Wakeman, John E. Remsburg, Franklin Steiner.

The foregoing were elected, the vote being cast by the secretary of the Congress. This was a meeting of the American Secular Union.

Saturday afternoon the business of the Freethought Federation was dispatched. Secretary Reichwald read his report, as follows:

At my last report, at the previous Congress, there remained in the treasury a balance of $142.51.

Since then I have received by contributions, etc., $480.78, making a total of $623.29. Out of this there has been expended as follows: Printing pamphlets, $166.50; stationery and stamps, $254.63; hall rent and advertising expenses, $55.15; donation to the Wise fund, $10; incidental expenses—addressing and folding circulars and pamphlets, $41.75; thus leaving on hand, Oct. 18th, a balance of $95.26.

The report was adopted. The Committee on Nominations reported for the Federation the officers chosen by the Secular Union, and they were elected. Prof. Daniel T. Ames, editor of the Penman's Journal, delivered an address on "Revelation Under the Microscope of Evolution," and there were short speeches by the ex-Rev. Mr. Fuller, who is just out of the Baptist shell, and by Mrs. Cadwallader, of the Spiritualist Association.

In the evening of Saturday, before a crowded house, Miss Susan H. Wixon gave an address upon the "New Woman." It was a bright and witty paper, and the audience expressed their delight by all appropriate methods, including a magnificent bouquet.

The president read a letter from J. D. Shaw, editor of the Independent Pulpit, and Geo. E. Macdonald ensued with some serious observations on the "Worth and Worthlessness of an Oath."

These speeches and the music and recitations, with the encores demanded, absorbed so much of the evening that Franklin Steiner had but fifteen minutes left in which to present his ideas about "Freethought Agitation." Mr. Steiner made good use of his time.

Sunday morning's meeting had the largest attendance of any of the day sessions. There were three addresses—"Church Taxation," by Henry M. Taber; "The National Reform Association," by E. C. Walker, and a "Lay Sermon" by T. B. Wakeman, on a text from Thomas Paine. In the afternoon the hall was crowded by accessions from the Brooklyn and Newark societies, both of which had adjourned their regular meetings in order to attend the Congress. Professor Peck, the Spiritualist lecturer, gave a short talk. Henry Rowley, of Brooklyn, spoke on "Our Warfare," and President Bird of the Newark League discussed "Evolution in Thought."

The closing session was held Sunday night, and there was standing room only. Miss Susan H. Wixon, chairman of the Committee on Resolutions, read the following, which were adopted with no dissenting voice:

Resolved, That we reaffirm the fundamental principles of Secularism, the total separation of church and religion from the state. We demand the equal taxation of all property not owned by the national, state, and municipal bodies, regardless of the "sacred" or secular use to which it is put; the unconditional repeal of Sabbath laws; the complete secularization of the public schools, removing therefrom the Bible, inhibiting prayer and other religious exercises, and teaching therein only the facts of science; the abolition of all state-paid chaplaincies; the elimination from the procedure of our courts of all vestiges of the compulsory oath; the prohibition of the issue of religious proclamations by the president and governors; the cutting off from religious societies of all state revenues, whether appropriated for educational or other purposes; the constitutional denial to the legislature of authority to legislate for the enforcement of the rules of so-called "Christian morality" at the expense of the equal rights of all citizens, and the severing of all other bonds that hold together the theological and the civil.

Resolved, That as we, as Freethinkers and Secularists, are unalterably opposed to a theocracy, we look with grave apprehension upon all such recruiting agents of the National Reform Association (the God-in-the-Constitution party), as the Women's Christian Temperance Union, the Young Men's Christian Association, the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor, the Epworth League, the Sabbath unions, the Prohibition party, the Women's Auxiliary Sabbath Society, and all similar societies, in so far as they are the political committees of the churches and have come into existence to counteract through theocratic legislation the intellectual and ethical progress of this age of historical investigation and scientific discovery.

Resolved, That we earnestly protest against the persecution of the Seventh-Day Adventists in Tennessee, Arkansas, Maryland, Georgia, Texas, and other states, because they have conscientious convictions against observing the first day of the week, Sunday, and desire to observe the seventh, Saturday, and we rejoice in the uncompromising stand taken by that body of Christians in favor of the complete secularization of the state.

Historical investigation has brought to light the fact that the early Jews were unacquainted with the seventh-day rest, and that it was not until after their return from the Babylonian captivity that such a sacred day was known among them. The week is of lunar origin, being a subdivision of the lunar month, and has varied and now varies in length among different tribes and races from four to ten days. The Christian Sunday has not even the warrant of the authority of the Bible. It is the peculiar property of the Roman church, being simply the old "day of the sun" appropriated to the service of the Christian priesthood. Day and night are caused by the revolution of the earth on its axis as it sweeps in its orbit around the sun, and it is only the grossest superstition to hold that the first, or the seventh, or the seventh thousandth of these revolutions is more sacred than any other or than all the others. Sabbath laws based on the alleged revelation to the Jews, on this superstitious belief in the sacredness of a particular revolution of the earth on its axis, or on the assumed right of the state to dictate to the citizen when he shall work, when he shall rest, and when he shall play, are usurpations and crimes, flagrantly violative of the guarantees of religious liberty imbedded in our Constitution, and of the equal rights of the citizen, and they are demanded, enacted, and enforced primarily and chiefly in the interest of a church which derives the greater part of its revenues from the Sunday labors of its own ministers and other employees.

It is against true public policy to outlaw honest labor and inebriate recreation, and such outlawry is inseparable from Sabbath laws. All that is necessary in the way of statu-

DENVER, COL., Oct., 295.

MR. EDITOR: I send you herewith $2, and later I hope to send balance and an order for some books. Denver is having a Messianic boom just now. Thousands of dupes go daily to be treated by our Francis Schlatter, a shoemaker, who says, "I am the Christ," when anyone happens to ask him if he is that much lauded individual. I do not think he has healed anyone who really had much of an ailment. There is a great deal in simply bracing up.

He Has Done Good Work.

PALO, IA., Oct. 16, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to say a few more words to the brave ones who are not afraid to speak out their true sentiments, independent of any one. I want to tell friend Putnam that I, as an Englishman, have taken great pleasure in reading his letters from the land of my birth. I have traveled over some of the parts of the country he has written about, and I still love the land where I first saw the light. I am glad to hear such good news from her.

Now I wish to say a few words to the Congress. I hope every one will lay self to one side and work for the general good. I hope you will have a good time and accomplish much for the cause in behalf of which you have met. Be united in everything that is good and true. I do wish I was young, and had plenty of means, so I could do something for the cause. But I am old and poor and cannot do as I would like. My best wishes to all of you.

Yours truly, JOHN STRATFORD.

They Think They are Sent of God.

MARSHALLTOWN, IA., Oct. 12, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 in payment of one year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The contributor who, in a recent issue, took the ground that a Christian must in the nature of things be insane, struck the right lead. No one but a lunatic or worse would or could compose and send out to the world such insane ravings as the orthodox tracts issued by the "Sent of God," of Tabor, Iowa. I should say they were, and with that idea firmly implanted in what they call their "minds." Power is the only essential lacking to usher in again an era of the fagot and stake. It is more than strange that so many Liberals are quietly watching the trend of events, and just as quietly submitting thereto without even a protest. Well, the sooner a few Infidels and "souffers at holy things" are burned at the stake the quicker the rest will awake.

Yours respectfully, M. V. WATSON.

He Played a Trump Card.

LONDON, ONT., Oct. 18, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Herewith find $1, for which kindly forward a dozen of the "Contradictions of the Bible," which I desire to send to the heads of the different schools here. My little girl came home from school yesterday and said: "Papa, the teacher says we are all to bring our Bibles to school." I told her to ask the teacher what she intended teaching her out of the Bible. On her return she said the teacher told her the Bible was to teach her who made the world, when it was made, how long it took to make it, and when we are to rest. I happened to have a copy of the 144 Contradictions, and so gave her that to take to school in place of a Bible. I don't know what the outcome will be, but I propose to put a stop to that Bible nonsense in the school, as far as lies in my power.

Yours truly, W. F. DOLL.

"When to rest"! It will be remembered by our readers that a committee of the Reformed Presbyterian church was appointed to take measures to introduce Sabbath observance literature into the public schools. Has the work already begun? Judging by the foregoing it looks that way.—ED. T. S.]

The Right Kind of a Brother.

DOLGEVILLE, N. Y., Oct. 13, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5.50, for which please send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year to Mrs. C. E. Guile; the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book" and "Mistakes of Moses" to Edwin Tucker; and twelve copies of "Self-Contradictions of the Bible" and eight copies of "The Age of Reason," to addresses found on accompanying sheet.

Four months ago I was a zealous worker in "the Lord's vineyard." My Infidel brother, Edwin, induced me to read Colonel Ingersoll's controversies and S. P. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Free-thought." Where once I was blind, now I can see the light of the world is not Jesus, but science, reason, truth.

Those "horrible" pictures of Christ were, at first, very shocking, but Ed. and I both enjoy reading his weekly visitor, THE TRUTH SEEKER.

We hope that Freethought societies will be so numerous when we die that our funerals need not be conducted in accordance with religious customs.

We stand ready to do all in our power in defense of "liberty, science, and humanity." We no longer believe that Christianity is conducive to domestic peace, love and joy. Believe me.

Yours, sincerely, HIRAM TUCKER.

Would Be "Disturbance of Religious Worship!"

NEW ORLEANS, LA., Oct. 19, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I write this to submit a suggestion. I have spent two months at Knoxville, Tenn., and this place, and have found the orthodox churches, which are numerous and fine, distressingly popular; but it is some consolation to see that the largest audiences appear when a violin solo or a string band is previously announced.

The great impediment to the cause of Freethought is the difficulty of reaching the masses, who have been warned against listening to Freethinkers or reading their literature. Then, to obviate this, why cannot our lecturers attend their church meetings and ask questions of the preachers that will bring to the notice of the audiences the absurdity of the dogmas they preach? I have known this done several times in New Orleans recently. It created some sensation in the audiences and comment by the local press. A Freethinker will find little difficulty in flooring the shepherd in the presence of his flock. If they refuse the privilege to questioners they do not follow the example of Jesus. Then it would be opportune to publish an explanation in the local papers. I do not know if this method of working for our cause has been tried to any extent, but it seems to me practicable.

Yours sincerely, S. S. BRYAN.

And yet Freethought "Depraves the People!"

MEMPHIS, TENN., Oct. 19, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Another devout member of the church and Sunday-school official has "gone wrong." This time it is A. K. Ward, secretary of a large barrel and heading factory here. Brother Ward forged the names of securities to nearly three hundred thousand dollars' worth of paper, floated it through the brokers, and last week skipped out to British Honduras before his numerous victims were apprised of anything wrong. He was devout, and even untutored, and only ten days ago gave a valuable lot in this city for a church site. Thus is it, ever so! Fully ninety-nine hundredths of the thousands of swindlers and defaulters living sumptuously in Canada are pious Christians and were prominent in church and Sunday-school. There is a cause for this which we will try to define.

Brother Ward was greatly beloved and esteemed by the church brothers and sisters here on account of his holy zeal for Christ; and now his seat is vacant in the church, and his office in the Sunday-school will have to be filled by another. If Christians were not controlled by a blind fanatical zeal instead of reason, they never would trust one another even a little bit; but they never stop to consider, neither will they learn from experience. The orthodox religion taught Brother Ward that he was a "child of wrath sold under sin." He was further made to believe that his "own righteousness was as filth and rags," and that faith, not morality, was the chief desideratum in the "blessed plan of salvation." When contemplating and meditating on this stupendous robbery which he was about to perpetrate, he no doubt realized that he would incur the deepest guilt; but what need he care for guilt? Was not there a fountain filled with blood drawn from Immanuel's veins? And plunged beneath that crimson flood, would he not lose all his guilty stains? Why should he hesitate on account of guilty stains when the Christian religion furnished him such a cheap and convenient method of getting rid of them? And then, as a further consideration and temptation for Christians to incur moral indebtedness, did not "Jesus pay it all—all the debt I owe?" Thus the law of Christian heredity, and unnatural religious education, is reducing our people to a race of swindlers. Christians may protest and denounce, but the stubborn fact remains. Out of over a thousand convicts in our state prison, actual statistics proved all but two to be zealous believers in the Bible; not an Infidel or Spiritualist among them. The philosopher and thinker would naturally conclude that there was certainly some vital relationship between the belief in Christian dogmas and actual crime. Well did the immortal Theodore Parker state in his "Experiences as a Minister," "There is not a virtue, but the Bible can produce an argument against it." Truthfully did Beecher say in his "Sermon on the True Religion" that "the practice of the church of Christ on earth has simply been infernal. I know what I say. I speak no hasty words. I declare that through long periods the characteristic actions of the church of the Lord Jesus Christ have better befitted the administrations of devils than men." And why in the devil can't good-meaning Christians have sense enough to see it?

Christ is credited with saying one thing his followers would do well to heed and practically obey as a measure to their financial safety. His command to watch preceded his command to pray; and my advice to Christians, who have unlimited license to sin, is to do energetic watching and let the other fellow do the praying. It might prevent bankruptcy in a number of cases every year. WARREN SMITH.

*The Christian mother, believing herself totally depraved, marks her unborn child for sin.

No Suffering in Hell.

JEFFERSON CITY, MO., Oct. 16, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The chief stronghold of Christianity is a belief in hell. It is the strength of the church logician—the summum summorum of the old scholastic learning which has permeated the labyrinth of ages and now reposes, like a sleeping Gorgon, in the imaginations of the ignorant. Nature knows no hell, nor exhibits an evidence of it in all the multiplicity of her creation.

Things which exist afford evidence of their existence. The thing itself is often such evidence. But it must be patent to the senses, or discoverable by some process of reasoning. The bare assertion is no proof, although adhered to without hesitancy by millions of true believers. The hell theory has been propagated for centuries and frequently acquiesced in by learned men; yet this is no proof, nor does it afford sufficient reason for its acceptance by a rational man. The doctrine of transubstantiation too has been fervently embraced by countless generations, yet I dare say a chemical analysis will demonstrate that wine is only wine, and not blood. Hell has never been scientifically discovered; it has never been the subject of ocular observation, and its existence can never be logically proven. But, conceding its existence, how could man be punished there?

In order to attain that exquisite degree of anguish and suffering which we are told is the lot of those who abide in that torrid clime one must be made to feel the sensation of pain.

Now, pain is necessarily the result of physical or mental disquietude, arising from the stimulation or agitation of some one or more of the various nerve fibers of the body. Physical pain is perceivable only by means of the sensory nerves, through which we have the sense of feeling. When these nerves are destroyed there can be no pain nor physical sensation of any description. A portion of the surface of a wound will slough off and become devoid of sensation; it becomes dead tissue, and the patient will observe that what was once sensitive and painful he may now suffer to be touched without experiencing any sensation at all. The nerve is dead—the once living tissue is devoid of life, and the effete matter will fall away and decompose.

So it is with man. Death is a state of complete dissolution—the utter extinction and annihilation of the physical, animal being. The possibility of sensation is forever gone. The body is resolved into the elements; the future has no torments for the lifeless clay.

It is alleged by some, however, that the future pain is all endured by that mythical ignis fatuus of the human fancy (I know not what else to call it) known as the soul. But a soul is not a physical entity, hence cannot suffer physical pain. And the writer humbly submits that a soul without nerves would suffer quite moderately in hell.

But there are things productive of mental anguish without the intervention of antagonistic physical agencies. Thus, the cognizance of facts which conflict with the strongest sympathies—exempli gratia, the misfortune or death of a friend, the failure of a cherished project, etc.—are often the sources of the keenest mental suffering. True, we have enough of these ills while here; but they will not be prolonged beyond the life of man. It cannot be so. There can be no reason for believing as true that which is actually and necessarily impossible. Such a belief can only be denominated an absurdity. Ingersoll terms it "idiotic."

I have but little patience with that school of metaphysicians who ascribe to the mind the attribute of immortality. Will they never understand that but for the brain the mind could not exist, and that the destruction of the one terminates the life of the other? This greatly discussed and much praised "soul" is so far dependent upon our weak and suffering bodies that it is affected by the very food we eat! Take the inebriate, for an instance. Long and excessive use of intoxicants will leave a sufficient quantity of alcohol upon the brain to cook portions of it (just as it coagulates the albumen of an egg), and in such cases the capability of thought is materially diminished and the moral sense often destroyed. It may be suggested by the smartness of debate that alcohol is not a food. Yet, if a deleterious drug by affecting the brain has a baneful effect on the mind, it should be also true that a beneficial and salutary food would work to the contrary. And such is the fact.

The period allotted to human existence is brief, and its termination sure; and the mind too must go, with the brain upon which depends its being, into inevitable and eternal dissolution. Here all sublimity must end with life and soul or mind. There is no hell nor future state nor prison for the damned. Those days are past when men believed in spooks and witches, ghosts and hell.

Be these to ages past confin'd;

Ours ope the reign of kingly mind.

The church is driven to her dernier resort, and her future is to rule through love of good or not at all.

Where Illustrations Do Not Illustrate.

AMESBURY, MASS., Oct. 13, 295.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $1, for which please send the following: "Candle From Under the Bushel," "Plea for Atheism," "The Bible; What is It?" "Bible Temperance," "All in a Nutshell," "Pulpit, Pew, and Cradle," and small tracts.

These little works I like to have on hand to lend to friends who can think twice. I always circulate THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal papers which I take, after reading them. I have sent my protest to the bigoted postmaster-general of Canada. He may never read it, but probably some one will.

I am sorry the fight for liberty in New York happened to involve the liquor traffic, for the reason that most people are too thick-headed to understand that you are against religious laws rather than in favor of rum. There is one criticism I am going to make, and of course you will receive it without stopping my paper as a punishment for disagreeing with you. In refusing to publish my communication on Prohibition you are inconsistent. You frequently complain because secular papers do not publish communications which oppose religion. The editor of a paper is the only person to decide what is better fitted for the paper than for the waste basket. Like the postmaster-general of Canada, there is no appeal from his decision. Editors of secular papers do not wish to disseminate the doctrines of some of their correspondents, and it is the same with you. I think you will admit that I discussed the prohibition principle in a very broad spirit, as I advocated the suppression of the liquor traffic only as a means of securing equal rights for all. All laws are prohibition in some form or other. I understand that you believe in law, but hold that one should not be punished till an actual crime is committed. (If my understanding is incorrect I hope you will set me right.) Suppose a highwayman meets you on a back road and demands you to "throw up your hands!" Would you not shoot him if you had a chance? According to your theory you would have no right to oppose him until he had actually robbed you. You own a house; your neighbor owns one on the adjoining lot; it is his property; he has a right to do what he pleases with it; he sets it afire; your house is in danger; yet, according to your theory, you have no right to interfere with your neighbor's actions until your house is actually ablaze. He may not intend to burn your house, but he can't tell what the result will be, consequently I dispute his right to set his own house afire. Again: A man points a gun at you. Would you allow it? He may not intend to shoot you; he may not even know the gun is loaded, yet I venture to say you dispute his right to point the gun in the direction of your head. A great many guns have been pointed at men and no injury resulted, and yet you object to such recklessness. Yet, according to your theory, you would have no right to object to all the men in the city pointing guns at you until you were actually shot. The holder of the gun might be punished for criminal carelessness, but that wouldn't help you any. I think it would have been better to forbid any one to point a gun at another.

A man drinks intoxicating liquor, in consequence of which he loses the power to decide between right and wrong. He is perfectly safe when not under the influence of liquor, but now he is a dangerous man. In a fit of drunkenness he assaults you with a dangerous weapon; he kills you; he is arrested, tried and hung. The result of that drink is, two men have been murdered. Now, do you not think it would have been better to have taken away that man's liberty to get that intoxicating liquor? But you may say that he did not intend to hurt you, and there are many who drink and do no harm in consequence. True; and many point guns at others with no evil intentions, and often with no evil consequences, and yet the danger is so great that I think you will admit that it is better to restrict a man's liberty to point a gun at another than run the risk of a tragedy. It is useless to belittle the evil consequences of rum drinking. Life and property are never safe where there is drunkenness. If only one drink in a thousand resulted in assault, robbery, or murder, the evil would be great enough to justify the prohibition of the liquor traffic.

Your friend, J. A. WILSON.

[We did not refuse Mr. Wilson's communication because he advocated Prohibition, but because we had other reasons which were good. We have printed a great many articles advocating prohibition and other doctrines with which we do not agree. Agreement with the editor is not the standard by which articles for THE TRUTH SEEKER are measured. Mr. Wilson's illustration by citing the action of the Canadian postmaster-general is therefore pointless; and his other illustrations or arguments answer themselves to clear thinkers. Before you let your very near neighbor burn his house you will make him guarantee that yours is not burned—and you will have that guarantee satisfactory. When a highwayman says hold up your hands he has already encroached upon your personal liberty and you will resist him. Mr. Wilson must revise his method of thinking. He quits too soon. He is on the right track, but he must go deeper. His illustrations would apply to the teaching of religion as well as to the liquor traffic, and yet we assume that he would not advocate the legal suppression of the churches.—ED. T. S.]

Wants a Freethought Political Party.

SAN JOSE, Oct. 10, E. M. 295.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to make a few remarks in my humble way as to what action should be taken by the Freethought Congress which meets October 25th, although they may not amount to much, coming from so obscure a source.

Among the questions put to the contributors to your symposium published in THE ANNUAL of 1889, the eighth and eleventh were the most important then; they are all-important now, and should be answered again at the coming Congress. The position taken at that time by J. H. Burnham was correct. Time has verified all that Mr. Burnham said on that occasion. The time has again arrived for political action on the part of Liberals, and I hope they will not let it pass unimproved. The position taken, and answers given by the 24 Liberals to those questions propounded by the Editor are curious reading now, in view of the progress made by the religious bigots all over this country. Mr. Putnam in issuing the call for the coming Congress says: "It is of great importance that Freethinkers should combine. It is of more importance now than at any previous period, for there is more work to do and the work cannot be done by isolated effort. There are vast ecclesiastical combinations organized for the express purpose of overthrowing Freethought, and also of uniting church and state in a more dangerous form than ever before." Exactly. And as Geo. E. MacDonald puts it, "It is superfluous to inquire. Whither are we drifting? We are hell-bent for Puritanism." And what are we going to do about it? Continue to wobble up to the polls on each succeeding election and vote with the old political (orthodox) combines? Or take the Nine Demands of justice (Liberalism) as a basis for a platform, and mold a Liberal American party with the great Ingersoll as our standard bearer, and strike for liberty or death? The only difference between the old parties that I can discover is this, the Republican party has outstolen them all. The principles of the Republican party were buried with its first president, the great Lincoln. It matters not who the standard bearers of the old parties are, whether a Harrison, a Cleveland, or a Depew fresh from Rome, the Bible pounders rule them all. How can a purely secular government be administered with religious bigots as officers from president down to pound-keeper? There is not such an animal as a Liberal Christian; he behaves himself only when stripped of all power to act like the devil he worships. He is never quite so happy as when he can get a law enforced to compel somebody else to be as big a damn fool as himself. And the only way to put a quietus to all this nonsense is to organize a Liberal political party, with broad and Liberal-minded men as candidates, men who have some idea of justice, some idea of what constitutes religious liberty, some idea that others have rights

Of all the cowardly animals that walks on his hind legs the most cowardly is the Liberal who throws up his hat on election day and hurrahs for some hypocrite for office because he is a Democrat or Republican, as the case may be. Why not hurrah for the orthodox God and be consistent? Now, Mr. Editor, there is no publication in America to-day whose outfit is better officered, better manned, and better armored to fire the first gun in this grand and important political departure than THE TRUTH SEEKER, because it has been selected from among all others by the enemy as their most dangerous antagonist. You have answered all their arguments, and they have appealed to the law, to the government, to suppress you. Therefore, you should urge upon the coming Congress of Liberals this all-important move for a Liberal political party; a party which dares ignore all gods, all popes, all priests, and make this a government "of the people, by the people, and for the people." Equal rights for all, special privileges for none. I have no use for the church and none whatever for the priest, but I do believe in the religion of Liberty for all. At no time during the struggle for Independence were one-fourth of the colonists in favor of that move, and only for those who were considered at that time the suicidal and fanatical adventurers, the few brainy, brave, and earnest Liberals, men who loved liberty more than church, would we enjoy the little freedom we have to-day. Furthermore, we find the church then as now arrayed on the side of superstition and slavery.

I sincerely hope that some Paine or Lincoln may arise in the Freethought Congress and urge this matter so forcibly and eloquently upon that body of Liberals that they may unanimously agree to political action; then Liberalism will be respected because it can make itself felt. Your Freethought journals will quadruple in circulation, because of the political measures demanded and the opinions therein expressed, and because we have the most eloquent orator, the most fearless Freethinker, the most typical American, to lead us and proudly bear the banner of freedom in this new and splendid departure for equal liberty for all.

[We need no political parties formed on religious lines of division, but the Liberal electorate, small but compact, used as an independent wedge to split any and every party that refuses equal religious liberty. Minorities can do effective work when acting as a balance of power.—ED. T. S.]

On Several Topics.

NEENACK, CAL., Oct. 11, 295.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of July 6th was a letter from myself, in which I used the abbreviation "P-H'd." You asked its meaning. A newspaper man, or journalist, necessarily is thrown, more or less, among those who make their living out of the space-box—in other words, among printers; and it seems passing strange to me that you, who run such a large print shop as THE TRUTH SEEKER establishment must be, and are, therefore, no stranger to prints and their ways, should be in the dark as to the interpretation of that term. The word is "Pan-handle." When a half-drunken type-sticker reels up to you and says, "Shay, gimme t. c." (ten cents); or, "Shay, youse know me—got t. c.?" you may know that he is trying to "pan-handle" you. The term is not confined to any one part of the United States either, for I have heard it used by prints from many different sections of the country, including New York and its metropolis.

Through the letter above referred to I found that there are a great many more noble people in the country than I had thought there were. I wish to thank all those who were so kind as to write to me; and I wish to say, too, that two of nature's noblemen live here, and they are known as the Sandberg Brothers. It made no difference to them whether or no I was able to work any. They wrote: "Come up by all means. We have taken an interest in you, and wish to see you get well." And I was a stranger! Bring on your narrow-path walkers who would do likewise. It is a high, dry, fine country here, but it does not seem to help asthma any—my case at least.

In a recent number of THE TRUTH SEEKER was a letter from a subscriber who spoke about organizing a benefit society for Liberals. It is a good idea, I think, one to which serious consideration should be given. As it is now, a Materialist can not join any of the secret societies unless he proves himself unworthy of the name. "Liberals' Mutual Benefit Association" sounds fine, don't it?

It is said that "money is the root of all evil;" but, in my opinion, the lack of it is more of an evil. There are a great many Freethought books and pamphlets I would like to purchase and read, but the lack of money prevents my doing so. The editorials in THE TRUTH SEEKER interest me more than anything else in that paper. In the issue of May 25th were two—one entitled, "Some More Witnesses for Jesus, or Christ;" the other headed, "On Which Side Is Justice?" In the issue of May 18th is another, with the heading, "Leaning on Thrice-Broken Reeds." I was very much pleased with them, and would like to send several copies to Christian friends, but ill-health makes my pocket-book too light.

Brother Severance is a foeman worthy of Mr. Swan's steel, and it appears as if he were one too many for the latter gentleman. He has been through the mill of Spiritualism and knows whereof he speaks. His letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 28th is a hard nut for Spiritualists to crack. I am patiently awaiting Mr. Swan's rejoinder.

Christians—and some Liberals, too—are continually prating about what a good man Christ was. I can't see it that way. Suppose you were traveling with a man in the winter in the state of New York. Suppose you should see an apple-tree in the distance, and this man should hurry up to it hoping to find apples thereon, and, not finding any, should get angry and curse the tree because of its barrenness, would you not think the man crazy? This is exactly what Christ did, except in his case it was a fig-tree (see Mark ii, 12). There are others.

What became of those who arose from their graves and appeared unto many? (see Matt. xxvii, 53.)

Christians will tell you that Jonah was swallowed by a "great fish;" but Christ said it was a whale (see Matt. xii, 40).

Solomon was a wise man, but he ejaculated through his bonnet when he spoke about the ants (Prov. vi, 6-8). The supposition is that they gather food in summer for winter use; but I believe they hibernate in cold countries during the winter, and in warm countries they do not need to lay away any store. Am I right?

Mr. Putnam says he can buy for $7 in England a suit of clothes that would cost him $15 in either New York or Chicago, and that he can get shaved in that country for three cents. At the same time he says the condition of the laboring man is as good there as it is here. I think that three shaves an hour is a high average. However, at that rate, an English barber would earn $1.08 in a day of twelve hours, or $6.48 per week. An American barber, getting ten cents a shave, would earn $21.60 in the same time. The English barber could not buy a $7 suit of clothes with his week's wages, while the American barber could purchase a $15 suit and still have left more than his English brother-tradesman earns in a week!

Miss Wixon believes in suffrage for women, and I wish to ask her how she would like to have Delia Gifford, and women like her, make laws for her. Such women far outnumber Freethinking women, and, if they were allowed to vote, they, with the help of male-women, would change the present order of things so a Liberal would have no rights. I believe in letting other people do as they see fit, so long as they do not encroach upon my territory; and, as I know I would have no rights the fanatical churchites would consider themselves bound to respect should women be allowed to vote, I am opposed to letting them have the ballot. If all were like Miss Wixon, things would be different, you know.

What is that Canadian postmaster-general's name—Carrion? He is a stenoh to my olfactory organ. F. G. BALL.

tory enactment in order to secure to wage-workers a weekly rest is a provision that all employers shall release their employees from service for a consecutive thirty-six hours each seven days, leaving to operators and workers perfect liberty to arrange among and between themselves all necessary details, precisely as is now done without law in daily newspaper offices and in various other industries where Sunday labor is required for the convenience of the people or to prevent loss.

Resolved, That as we see the gradual encroachments and growing limitations upon the liberties of speech, of the press, and the mails in the United States since the passage of the first Comstock postal law in 1873;

That as we see this and similar federal statutes give apparent sanction to the agents which an irresponsible private amateur detective association turns loose for its own sectarian purposes, and to get money out of the credulous and gullible under pretense of suppressing vice, and for its partisan ends inflaming the worst prejudices and passions that can be engendered by ignorance, superstition, and bigotry;

That as we see these statutes invoked by unscrupulous or fanatic theologians for the gratification of their hatred of those who expose the unreasonableness and falsity of their religions;

That as we see these laws applied to the most corrupt purposes, in disregard of citizens' rights, by a judiciary false to its obligations to maintain the constitutional guarantees of freedom;

That as we remember the outrage upon D. M. Bennett, the fiendish eight years' persecution of Moses Harman, the prosecution of Lois Waisbrooker, and the grotesque vindictiveness of the recent savage attack upon Jacob B. Wise—that as we remember all these, we point to the recent attempted exclusion of THE TRUTH SEEKER from the mails of Canada as an exhibition of what intolerant theocrats are longing to do in this country; and we reiterate the protest made by Freethinkers against these laws twenty years ago, again calling upon all who value liberty to resent these encroachments by all legitimate means in their power.

Resolved, That Mr. S. J. Fleckten, of Kandiyohi, Minnesota, in his almost single-handed fight against religious instruction in the public schools of his state, deserves and should receive the hearty encouragement and substantial help of every Freethinker in the United States. It is necessary to make a test case in that state, and to do so requires the expenditure of some hundreds of dollars for counsel (now engaged) and the payment of court expenses. The Secular Union and Freethought Federation is prepared to support Mr. Fleckten in his struggle for the fundamental principle of secular education, and it asks the Liberals of America to give it the timely financial assistance imperatively needed. A similar contest carried to a successful issue by Mr. Robert Fram, of Barber county, Kansas, encourages us to hope for an equally cheering result in Minnesota.

Resolved, That moral duties and the practice of the virtues, based upon secular, social, and patriotic grounds, should be firmly impressed upon the minds of pupils in our public schools, in order that they may develop into good and noble citizens of the world in which we live.

Resolved, That no one has a moral right to warp and bias the mind of childhood religiously, or in any sectarian sense; therefore, the Bible should, in justice, be banished from the public schools of this country; such schools being maintained by people of diverse religious views, they should be, in every sense of the word, purely and decidedly secular.

Resolved, That we recognize in the Secular Sunday-school an instrumentality capable of producing most beneficent results for Freethought and Secularism; that it makes for social harmony and happiness and the education of our children in many branches which, at present, at least, cannot be taught elsewhere. It is our earnest desire that the Freethinkers of Oregon be encouraged in every way to carry forward the noble enterprise inaugurated by the late Katie Kehm Smith, and that the Freethinkers of all other states do all that they can to establish similar schools. The officers and other members of the Secular Union and Freethought Federation should consider the time and means well expended which they can appropriate for the initiation and building up of Secular Sunday-schools in their respective states and localities. While the national organization, with the limited means at its disposal, and its own vitally important special defensive work to do, cannot assume in any degree the direction of this worthy constructive labor, it believes that the state and local societies have it in their power to accomplish very much in this direction. Freethinkers should use all available means to instruct their children in the principles of Freethought, and to that end should establish these Secular Sunday-schools, and encourage the production and circulation of periodicals and other literature suited to their receptive minds that they may grow up in the atmosphere of science and true mental liberty.

Resolved, That man and woman are the two hemispheres of the human globe, the two interdependent parts of the human family, and therefore neither can rightfully rule the other or enjoy privileges at the expense of the other. To deny by law or social convention equality of opportunities is unjust and unsafe, and must be disastrous in its consequences, both immediate and remote. To take from woman the disabilities at present resting upon her is simply the recognition in practice of the principle that right and wrong are not determined by sex. That civilization is noblest which most nearly secures to the individual man and the individual woman full opportunity for the development of their powers of body and mind, and safeguards to the utmost the right of self-direction.

Resolved, That as promulgators of human rights we believe that woman should enjoy opportunities and exercise equal rights with man, and we cordially invite her co-operation in the prosecution of the work before us, to the end that she shall share equally its benefits and blessings. We warmly welcome her to a free expression of her opinions upon our free platform, and we applaud her efforts in casting aside the fetters put upon her by bigotry and superstition.

Resolved, That we distrust and disapprove all attempts of the state to lay down rules, based on differences of belief, to compel the citizen to subordinate his honest convictions to those of other schools of thought in matters pertaining to his and his family's health and prosperity.

IN MEMORIAM.

Resolved, That the members of this association have learned with deep sorrow of the untimely death of that most earnest and useful worker in the cause, Katie Kehm Smith, of Oregon; we realize that she did a work never before successfully attempted; that she was a pioneer in Secular Sunday-school labors, and that it will be most difficult to find those who are by temperament and natural aptitude adapted to continue and extend the system of Secular Sunday instruction with which her name will remain associated as originator and organizer. We sympathize with Comrade D. W. Smith in his personal bereavement and with the Freethinkers of Oregon and the Pacific coast in the loss of their devoted leader.

In the death of Katie Kehm Smith, Freethought loses one of its bravest and clearest thinkers, and one of its brightest women.

The removal of her presence from the earth in the dawn of her womanhood, and in the midst of rare usefulness, brings sadness and sorrow into the ranks that held her in high esteem and loving regard.

In her all too brief life, she accomplished great good in the field of Freethought. By earnest and untiring efforts she demonstrated that there is a place for a Secular church and a Secular Sunday-school. An earnest, outspoken, industrious worker, a candid and ardent lover of her race, she never faltered in the work she voluntarily chose, and she lived to bless and benefit all who came within her sphere of influence. In the prosecution of her mission she knew no weariness, and she has left upon the world an impression that can never be effaced. Her name will be a star of hope, an inspiration to generations yet to come, as well as to the comrades who survive her. Through her efforts for the elevation of her fellow-creatures, she has left the world better than she found it, and through her works she has become immortal.

In the hour of bereavement human sympathy is all the real solace that can be given. Time is the great healer of wounds, and out of the bitterness of grief peace at length cometh. Watered by tears, the flowers grow and bloom amid the shadows of regret. This Congress extends its tenderest sympathies to those who weep for their beloved dead. Katie Kehm Smith will not be forgotten. Upon her grave we lay the ivy wreath of friendship, the roses and lilies of love.

Resolved, That we gladly honor together the names of Jeremiah Hacker and J. H. Cook, who after more than half a century of pioneer work have passed away with a record of unflinching devotion to human rights.

GREETING TO EUROPEAN FREETHINKERS.

Resolved, That this Congress recognizes the cordial sympathy of our comrades of Great Britain and other countries, and recognizes the generous manner in which they have welcomed our official representative, and in the spirit of like fraternity we invite George W. Foote, president of the British Secular Society, and Charles Watts, vice-president to visit our shores, and we assure them a hearty and universal reception by the Freethinkers of America. It is hoped they will be present with us at the national Congress of 1896.

GREETING TO MATTIE A. FREEMAN.

Resolved, That this Congress hears with regret of the ill health of Mrs. M. A. Freeman, late secretary of this association, by reason of which she is compelled to resign her official position, while in full sympathy with the work of the organization. The Freethinkers of America recognize the value of her many years' service; the talent and devotion she has given to the cause; the eloquence both of pen and tongue by which she has advanced our cause. It is hoped that the labors of the past will still be crowned with success in the future, and the unflinching heart and brain still contribute to human knowledge and progress in the grand comradeship of Freethought.

Amidst great enthusiasm letters were read by Franklin Steiner from Charles Watts and Geo. W. Foote, of England, and then L. K. Washburn, of Revere, Mass., was introduced. The cheering which greeted his appearance must have convinced Mr. Washburn that he occupied a place very close to the hearts of the Liberal party. His address on "Liberty and Education" was responded to with the heartiest applause throughout.

President Putnam, who was on the program for a speech, said that if he had not been advertised to speak he would adjourn the Convention at this point, and let the audience go just as it was, filled with the inspiration of Washburn's eloquent words. He then spoke briefly upon "Freethought and Progress," and it may be relied upon that he said nothing to modify the enthusiasm. With votes of thanks to the speakers, to the musicians, and to Mrs. M. Florence Johnson, the elocutionist, the Congress ended.

This report is but a hasty summary of the events of this splendid gathering, whose echoes will be heard until, reinforced by hundreds of accessions to the ranks in this country, and joined by the brethren from over the sea, the Congress of 1896 shall convene.

Next week THE TRUTH SEEKER will contain acknowledgments of contributions to the expenses of the Congress, with notes on the proceedings, letters read, etc., and a general summing up of results, for which there is not space in the present issue. There is therefore a large quantity of interesting matter yet to come. Later the many valuable addresses will be published in the Union's annual report.

The Canadian Censorship.

From the American Sentinel.

The Truth Seeker, a "Journal of Freethought and Reform," published in this city, has been excluded from the mails in Canada, under a ruling of the postmaster-general, because of its "scurrilous and blasphemous character."

It seems that the particular feature of The Truth Seeker which has excited the ire of the Canadian authorities is the pictures which appear each week upon the first and last pages of the paper. These pictures certainly are objectionable from a Christian standpoint. Those appearing on the last page, especially, are certainly blasphemous, and we confess that we do not like them. They are not only wicked because they ridicule sacred things, but they are often grossly unfair. We believe they hurt The Truth Seeker; but that they justify its exclusion from the mails is quite another question.

"Blasphemy" is an exceedingly elastic term. In some countries to speak against the Virgin Mary is to be guilty of "blasphemy." In the early history of Maryland, to speak reproachfully of the virgin was an offense punishable by a fine of £5; a second offense, by a fine of £10; and a third offense, by a confiscation of all property and banishment from the colony.

Genuine Christianity has no use for civil power, neither has it anything to fear from The Truth Seeker, or from any other paper of like character; and spurious Christianity cannot be trusted with the power to define and punish heresy. Those who favor the exclusion of The Truth Seeker and other Infidel publications from the mails, would not stop there; they would likewise exclude everything that opposes them. At a National Reform Convention held last November in New Castle, Pa., Dr. McAllister, the editor of the Christian Statesman, exhibited a copy of The Truth Seeker to the audience and called attention to the cartoons on the first and last pages, and said that it was simply "secularism gone to seed." That statement was as grossly unfair as are some of The Truth Seeker's cartoons; but that was not the worst thing the doctor did. He spoke of the American Sentinel in the same connection and classed it with The Truth Seeker, though he certainly knew there was an impassable gulf between the two papers.

But bad as was Dr. McAllister's statement, it was not sufficiently strong to satisfy Dr. H. H. George. He arose, and referring again to The Truth Seeker, the Sentinel, and to certain religious liberty tracts that had been distributed in the town, said: "They all emanate from the same source and are of the same character." He could not well have made a statement that was more utterly devoid of the truth. The Truth Seeker is, to say the least, Agnostic. It is diametrically opposed to the Christian religion, while the Sentinel is emphatically Christian and is edited by ministers of the gospel, and is supported almost wholly by Christian people. Thus it appears that the same spirit which excludes The Truth Seeker from the mails because of its blasphemies, would go farther if it could, and exclude from the mails those Christian papers which do not teach the popular theology of the day. Both Canada and the United States would better endure the evils that they have, rather than place themselves in the power of a lot of theocrats who would speedily bring upon them evils which they know not of.

Ingersoll's new lecture, "The Foundations of Faith," is in press and is for sale at the low price of twenty-five cents. Same style as his other recently issued pamphlets.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Farmer Brown and Justice.

Good Farmer Brown in years long past
His lot beside a stream had cast,
And much good cash had he laid down
By selling chickens in the town.
Prime, plump, and tender were they all
And brought him prices never small.
But, sad to tell, there sometimes came
Wild floods that well deserved the name.
They carried off full many a coop,
And thus curtailed his chicken soup.
For many years he bore this well
Until at last worse luck befell.
So wild and high the waters ran
He found himself a chickless man.

Angry at this was Brown indeed
And sought a lawyer with all speed.
"I want to sue the state," said he.
Then danced the lawyer's eyes with glee,
And, writing down the farmer's name,
He said, "Well, sir, let's hear your claim."
With burning cheeks the farmer told
His losses from the waters cold,
Concluding, with an angry brow,
"Justice is what I'm after now."

"Justice!" the lawyer said in scorn,
"She died, my friend, ere you were born
You say the waters took your chicks;
Well, rivers often play those tricks."

"But come," continued Farmer Brown,
While deeper grew his wrathful frown.
"You must, I say, a way provide
That I may be indemnified.
Somebody, now, I'm bound to sue,
To get again what is my due."
The lawyer smiled, and said, "Oh, well,
Put on a fifty and I'll tell
How you this trouble may elude
And circumvent those waters rude."

The good man paid the fifty down,
For fair and square was Farmer Brown.
Then said the lawyer, with a smile,
"My rule beats justice by a mile."
And, with a wink, that rivalled Puck's,
He softly said, "My friend, raise ducks!"

Thankful.

(A DIALOGUE)

Clergyman: Do you love God?
Tunie: I am not sure that I love any one since my dear mamma died.
C.: But you should love God.
T.: God who?
C.: There is but one God.
T.: You are mistaken. There are between one and two hundred gods.
C.: It is you who are mistaken. It is almost incredible that anyone can be so ignorant in such an enlightened age as this.
T.: If there is but one God, then he or she has a great many names. Now, I often hear people say "the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost."
C.: God is always "he." The Father,
Son, and Holy Ghost are one.
T.: Oh, no; I have heard them called a blessed trinity. Yoni, one of the gods of India, and Dea, a Roman god, were females.
C.: There is but one true God, and you should love him.
T.: Why should I?
C.: For giving you life, and allowing you to live.
T.: But what if I am not thankful.
C.: You should be.
T.: That is impossible. My life is too unhappy, too miserable.
C.: How so? You have a home, a father, and mother, and little brother.
T.: I have a father who is never at home, except evenings, and early in the morning, and who really cares for but little except to obtain wealth. I have a stepmother who is cross from the time she gets up in the morning until she retires for the night.
My half-brother is a torment and torture to me except when asleep. He invades my room at all hours. Disarranges, carries off, and loses or destroys the contents and keys of my trunk and bureau drawers.
He calls me bad names, and, if I am busy, amuses himself by kicking, pinching, or pricking me with pins; or, if he has a stick in his hand, he will strike me. If I protest, my stepmother's anger increases tenfold. What have I to be thankful for?
C.: That you have food and shelter from the night, the cold, and the storms. Remember, whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth. You must love those who persecute you and pray God to soften their hearts.

T.: If this God you speak of was a good God he would soften their hearts without being asked.

C.: You shock me with your wickedness and depravity. You say you are unhappy.
How can you expect God will bless you and make you happy?

T.: You told me whom the Lord loveth
he chasteneth.

C.: I see you are on the direct road to hell, and are sure to get there, so I will say no more.

T.: Then good-bye until we meet again.

Mrs. Jaynes (a Liberal and Tunie's aunt): My poor Tunie, I could not help listening to your conversation with the clergyman. I did not know before of your treatment and suffering. I leave in a few days for my Western home. I am very lonely since Nina died. Would you like to go with me and take her place there?

T.: Do you really mean it, auntie?

Mrs. J.: I certainly do.

T.: Oh, I would be so glad.

Mrs. J.: Do you think your father would be willing?

T.: Yes. I know he would be glad to have me out of the way.

Mrs. J.: Then as soon as I have spoken to him, which I will do to-night, we will call it settled.

T. (embracing Mrs. J.): O auntie, it seems too good to be true. How happy I will be, and if I am happy I do think I will be good. Now I am thankful.

S. ATHENA MAGOON.

Sum in Division.

General Knox, of Revolutionary fame, was a man of quick perceptions and ready wit, and withal was accustomed to say what he pleased. After the war he lived at Thomaston, Me., where he had a large estate.

Gen. George Ulmer, of one of the neighboring towns, presented himself to General Knox one day as a land surveyor.
He detailed somewhat ostentatiously his long experience, together with his recent purchase of a new and very superior set of instruments. If General Knox needed any service in his line, he would engage to give perfect satisfaction.

"You're the very man I have been looking for!" exclaimed General Knox. "I have a hundred acres of land which I wish to divide into house lots of ten acres each.
How many will it make?"

Ulmer was considerably disconcerted by the suddenness of the question, and, naturally enough, was prepared to find it difficult. He began to collect himself, mentally re-stating the premises, and striving to acquire sufficient coolness to solve the problem correctly.

General Knox counted as many seconds as he thought necessary, and then interrupted the other's cogitations by remarking, abruptly, "Oh, well, it's no matter about an immediate answer. Any other time will do just as well," and at once fell to talking about something else.

Ulmer was so chagrined at his own stupidity that he never broached the subject afterward. — Youth's Companion.

Correspondence.

PITTSBURG, PA., Oct. 19, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: At last I have plucked up courage to write you a letter from this priestly, religious city of Pittsburgh. Several times before I have started to write, but being dissatisfied with my attempts have torn them up. I live with my grandparents on a farm about seven or eight miles out from the center of the city.

I do not hate the duped Catholics and Protestants, but pity them, and would gladly do all I can to help them. They, on the other hand, are generally vindictive toward Liberals. Grandma raised a family of nine who are all Freethinkers.

Some of the people around here think that the more they suffer on earth, the more glory they will gain in their world above, where the repentant murderers go.
We have to read the Bible in school, and if anyone asks a question which would help him to light he is told that he must not go behind the Scriptures. Therefore he is ever kept in darkness.

It is now getting late and I must close, although I could write longer. If some of the boys or girls between fifteen and seventeen will write I will answer.

Yours for Freethought,

OLIVE B. WALSH.

[Olive is right in her conclusions. We should not hate those who differ from us, but try in a gentle and reasonable way to show them the truth. Religion is largely a matter of education. Hobbes, a celebrated Freethinker and philosopher, said,
"Superstition is religion out of fashion, and religion is superstition in fashion."
There is a great deal to do before the fashionable superstition can be banished from the world. Olive can do her part in the great work, and we are sure she will. —

Book Notes.

"Right Living." By Susan H. Wixon.
This book gives an admirable course of study in ethics, and supplies a longfelt want of an ethical text-book especially adapted to the comprehension of children, as well as of older persons whom it is wisely and appropriately designed to interest while teaching them valuable ethical lessons. It could be used to good purpose in lyceums, and in families. It is an excellent book and should be widely circulated. Price, $1. For sale at this office.

At the last meeting of the Tulare County School Board in June, Miss Susan Wixon's book, "Right Living," was added to the list of library books for selection by school district trustees, the price being $1. The book was written for the instruction and guidance of youth especially and has been adopted by many Eastern school boards and introduced in colleges. The attention of teachers and district schools trustees is directed to this highly meritorious work when selecting and ordering additions to their libraries. — Tulare Valley Citizen,

"No Beginning, or the Fundamental Fallacy," is the title of a new work by Mr.
W. H. Maple, who is well known to the people of Lucas county. It is devoted to a logical demonstration of the non-existence of a first cause or beginning.
It opposes supernaturalism and favors rational right doing as the true theory of human advancement. Mr. Maple was always recognized as a strong man intellectually, and when it is considered that this work is the product of years of the most careful thought and critical research it may be supposed that in this discussion he has given to the public matter that must appeal to the highest capabilities of thinking people. We do not mean by this that the work is abstruse or metaphysical in character, but that it appeals to pure reason, and in so doing will necessarily wield a powerful influence for good in freeing many minds from the cobwebs begotten of ignorant superstition and unreasoning intolerance. We regard it as a masterpiece.
... In a literary sense it has few equals.
The language is pure, the style elegant, and the printer has done his full part in producing a book that will grace any library. — Chariton (Iowa) Democrat. Price

PAPA: "Did you ask God to give you your daily bread this morning?" Bobby: "No, papa; I looked in the pantry last night and saw that there was enough to last for three days."—Harper's Bazar.

"I HAVE been requested," said the good pastor, beaming over the pulpit, "to offer prayers for rain, but the superintendent informs me that the Sunday-school picnic is arranged for Tuesday."—Rockland Tribune.

"My friend," said the long-coated old man solemnly, "have you made preparation for the day of judgment?" "Sir," replied the young man, "that's how I make my living." "Young man!" "I'm employed in the sheriff's office."

UPON the recent death of an eminent divine the following bulletin was placed by the family on the door of his late residence: "Mr. Smith departed this life for heaven at 11 o'clock A.M." Some passing wag, possessed of more drollery than reverence, placed underneath the notice, a telegraph blank filled out in the following manner: "Heaven, 12M.—Mr. Smith not yet arrived, getting uneasy. Peter."

THE puritan did not believe in the joy of eating. He only ate to pray. Time at the table was time wasted from hoeing and prayers and killing Indians, so he liked to have his meals on the five-cent-lunch-counter principle—compact, quickly swallowed, and no matter about the digestion. Nobody was looking on to see whether that part of it was according to law or not. And so the United States pie had its growth.—Brooklyn Eagle.

PREACHING in the abbey Canon Wilberforce told a story of the celebrated Welsh preacher, Christmas Evans, who dared publicly to express his thankfulness for Jenny Lind's beautiful singing. A member of his congregation, a strait-laced Calvinist, standing on the steps of the pulpit, asked the preacher whether a man dying at one of Jenny Lind's concerts would go to heaven. "Sir," replied Mr. Evans, "a Christian will go to heaven wherever he dies, but a fool remains a fool even on the pulpit steps." Even the sober abbey congregation could hardly stifle its enjoyment of this repartee.—Westminster Gazette.

THE SKY-PILOT.

You have often seen the the Pilot,
As he sacrosanctious stands,
In his glossy coat of broadcloth,
With a Bible in his hands,
And his empty head bent forward
In a pious sort of way,
As he asks the Lord to clothe him
And to feed him day by day.

And you've often heard the Pilot
Expounding Moses's law,
And heard him tell the story
Of great Samson's ass's jaw;
But that he should earn his living
With the sweat upon his brow,
If you tell him ne'er so gently
You will raise a holy row.

No! that ne'er would suit the Pilot,
Who with work's not in accord,
And he hurries up to tell you
He's a servant of the Lord;
If the best you have you give him,
He will want it better still;
For the shepherd must be paid for,
And the sheep must pay the bill.

How he talks of golden pavements,
And the city's pearly gates;
How an everlasting mansion
Each poor Lazarus now awaits;
And he tells us that the weather
In that city's always warm—
But he shears his sheep in winter
To protect his own sleek form.

How he shuns the poor that labor,
And the pauper in the ditch,
And proclaims they were created
To be servants of the rich;
Then he helps the great to plunder
And grind the weak and low;
"I'm about my Father's business!"
He says. "He made it so."

You have often met the Pilot
At the picnic and the tea,
At the concert and the lecture,
Where he always passes free;
And you've always met him smiling—
What has he to make him sad?
He has all the world can give him,
So he thinks we should be glad.

He's a "worker (?) in the vineyard,"
So he digs, and prunes, and hacks
In the glorious work of piling
Burdens on the sinners' backs.
He's the Pilot of Life's Ocean,
Though its chart he'll never know;
And he'll land—or sink—you somewhere,
If you give him half a show.

Gems of Thought.

SLOWLY comes the future, swiftly as an arrow flies the present, while the past stands forever still.—Ancient Sage.

PROBABLY all will admit that political life is healthy only in proportion as it is conscientious; but a few will admit that, as a corollary, political life carried on by party warfare is unhealthy; and that political beneficence may fitly seek to mitigate and, as far as possible, abolish such warfare. Yes, party-loyalty has come to be a fancied virtue to which the real virtue of veracity is sacrificed.—Herbert Spencer.

ON the whole, an artist gains something by being attacked. His individuality is intensified. He becomes more completely himself. Of course, the attacks are very gross, very impertinent, and very contemptible. But, then, no artist expects grace from the vulgar mind, or style from the suburban intellect. Vulgar and stupidity are too very vivid facts in modern life. One regrets them, naturally. But there they are. They are subjects for study, like everything else. And it is only fair to state, with regard to modern journalists, that they always apologize to one in private for what they have written against one in public.—Anon.

HERE is another discovery made by Hugh Price Hughes. "How astonishing it is," he exclaims, apropos of the Vestal Virgins, "that woman occupied all through the history of Rome a position of such commanding influence and authority"—and he puts in another note of admiration. But there is nothing at all astonishing in the matter. Paganism honored motherhood. Christianity reviled it, and taught that the first baby born in the world was the offspring of "sin." Nothing is clearer, as Principal Donaldson admits, than that Christianity degraded woman from the proud and honorable position she had attained to under the pagan law of the Roman empire.—London Freethinker.

WE have no right to believe a thing true because everybody says so, unless there are good grounds for believing that some one person, at least, has the means of knowing what is true, and is speaking the truth so far as he knows it. However many nations and generations of men are brought into the witness-box, they cannot testify to anything which they do not know. Every man who has accepted the statement from somebody else, without himself testing and verifying it, is out of court; his word is worth nothing at all. And when we get back at last to the true birth and beginning of the statement, two serious questions must be disposed of in regard to him who first made it: was he mistaken in thinking that he knew about this matter or was he lying?—William Kingston Clifford.

ARCHAEOLOGY, however, is, after all, a dealing with dry bones, a series of inferences from inanimate objects. The color and the warmth of life, it never has. How can we divine the real meaning of the fragments and ruins, the forgotten symbols and the perished gods, it shows us? The means has been found, and this through a discovery little less than marvelous, the most pregnant of all that anthropology has yet offered, not yet appreciated even by the learned. This discovery is that of the physical unity of man, the parallelism of his development everywhere and in all time; nay, more, the high absolute uniformity of his thoughts and actions, his aims and methods, when in the same degree of development, no matter where he is, or in what epoch living. Scarcely anything but his geographical environment, using that term in its largest sense, seems to modify the monotonous sameness of his creations.—Prof. D. G. Brinton.

HE [Voltaire] did not intend to give priests the satisfaction of seeing him burn or suffer. Upon this very point of recanting he wrote: "They say I must retract. Very willingly. I will declare that Pascal is always right. That if St. Luke and St. Mark contradict one another, it is only another proof of the truth of religion to those who know how to understand such things; and that another lovely proof of religion is that it is unintelligible. I will even avow that all priests are gentle and disinterested; that Jesuits are honest people, that monks are neither proud nor given to intrigue, and that their odor is agreeable; that the Holy Inquisition is the triumph of humanity and tolerance. In a word, I will say all that may be desired of me, provided they leave me in repose, and will not persecute a man who has done harm to none." He gave the best years of his wondrous life to succor the oppressed, to shield the defenseless, to reverse infamous decrees, to rescue the innocent, to reform the laws of France, to do away with torture, to soften the hearts of priests, to enlighten judges, to civilize the people, and to banish from the heart of man the love and lust of war.—Ingersoll.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of special interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures.

This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

Ten copies.	$1.00
Fifty copies.	4.50
One hundred copies.	8.00

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

Vol. 22. No. 45. { PUBLISHED WEEKLY. } New York, Saturday, November 9, 1895. { 28 LAFAYETTE PL. } $3.00 Per Year.

COMING EVENTS CAST THEIR SHADOWS BEFORE.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them: we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

SPECIMEN PRESS NOTICES.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

Send us a new subscriber and get the book free of all expense to you. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us $3 and get the book and the paper for one year.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price, 25 cents. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The Relations of Crime to Belief.

Referring to the alleged statement of the swindler and probably multiple-murderer, Holmes—now on trial in Philadelphia—that, “I am a believer in the teachings of Paine and Ingersoll,” the Catholic News comments:

“If he were a believer in God it would be surprising that he could be such a fiend as he is said to be, but there is nothing startlingly inconsistent between his creed and his crime. Perhaps that is the reason the secular papers do not prominently announce his Infidel views.”

The same paper says that if the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER will “make a paper that is decent and that deals in gentlemanly controversy” “there will be no doubt that the postmaster-general of Canada will allow it to go through the mails in that country.” We are always willing to be gentlemanly in discussion, but the editor of the News must certainly realize that our position is an exceedingly difficult one. Our antagonists are Christian ministers and editors, and the ordinary mortal who could always preserve the amenities of debate under such circumstance would be more meek than Moses, more non-resistant than a Quaker, more patient under provocation than the Christian who does not turn his left cheek to the smiter of the right. To illustrate, take the foregoing assertions of the News in connection with the alleged Infidelity of Holmes—would not the Freethinker who could treat the writer of those averments as a truthful man be considerably more mild-tempered and mild-mannered than the average orthodox “saint”? It goes without saying that a person capable of editing a journal like the News knows that multitudes of believers in a god have committed crimes as atrocious or more atrocious than those charged to the man on his trial in Philadelphia; that he knows that thousands of these criminals were members of the Catholic church, and devoted believers in its dogmas, and that the names of many such enemies of humanity are blazoned with exceptional conspicuousness on the pages of history, where all may see them. Let him study the prison records of the present and he will ascertain—supposing, for charity's sake, that he is now ignorant of the fact—that the inhabitants of our penitentiaries are almost to a man believers in the gods and Christs and sacred scriptures. Indeed, he cannot be wholly ignorant in the premises, for some of his fellow churchmen right here in this state have pleaded for greater opportunities for the religious ministrations of Catholic priests and sisters in the penal institutions of New York, frankly on the ground that there were very many Catholics in those institutions, as everybody knows, of course. Why, then, in one paragraph say that it would be “surprising” for a believer in a god to be the fiend that Holmes is said to be, and a little farther down in the same column beg for gentlemanly treatment at the hands of Freethought controversialists? Does this editor expect Atheists to accept such “compliments” with Chesterfieldian bows and suave expressions of regret? And then to be told that there is nothing “startlingly inconsistent” between the “creed” of Paine and Ingersoll and crimes like those which Holmes is under suspicion of committing is, we suppose, but another evidence of the truthful and gentlemanly instincts of the priest whom Mr. Herman Ridder hires to edit the Catholic News, and to be gratefully received as a special favor by all Liberals!

Paine and Ingersoll have not taught that the whole human family is so hopelessly depraved that nothing less than the sacrifice of a sinless man-god can give them even a chance for salvation. They have not taught that belief in this human sacrifice will atone for a life of crime and transport the believer to the realms of the blessed while his unbelieving victims are wrapped in the flames of an endless hell. They have not taught that while the debit of every possible crime against man may be canceled by the credit of faith in the atoning blood of Jesus, the undefinable and imaginary “sin against the ‘Holy Ghost’” will be pardoned in neither time nor eternity. Paine and Ingersoll have not held up as the exemplars of the young and as “fathers of the faithful” and men “after God’s own heart” the Old Testament heroes, many of whom were guilty of about every crime conceivable, who “waded through slaughter” to thrones, and massacred opposing nations, men, women, and children, saving only the maidens for the ravening hands of their blood-drunk soldiers. Paine and Ingersoll have not subscribed to the infamous doctrine of exclusiv salvation; they have not advocated persecution for opinion’s sake; they have not defended the Bible-sanctioned and church-practiced murder of “witches.” Paine and Ingersoll have opposed the slavery that neither Jesus nor Paul dared condemn; they have demanded the equality of rights for woman denied to her by Paul and by the church through all the centuries of its supremacy; they have asked for the equal liberty of citizens and for even-handed justice between man and man; they have exposed fraud, let in the light on superstition, and made cruelty odious. No wonder that the priests of the church grown rich by fraud, the priests of the church whose stock in trade is superstition, the priests of the church whose indelible record is that of the cruelest hierarchy that ever cursed the world—no wonder that the priests and priest-editors of this church fear and hate the teachers of Freethought and would deny the most palpable facts of history and the clearest deductions of reason in the futile attempt to make it appear that a notorious criminal—or a man accused of great crimes—owes his criminality to the fact of his asserted Infidelity. But while the press is not so free as it should be, it is yet too free to permit such slanderous imputations to go uncontradicted and unexposed.

Recurring to Holmes: The reporter of the World, describing the personal appearance of the accused, said that there was a very sharp and peculiar “bump” on the otherwise flat surface of the top-head. “It would be said to mean reverence, by the usual phrenologist, but not reverence for human life—at all events, not in this case.” It is a fact of mental science that great spirituality and veneration godward are often associated with the most atrocious crimes manward. For instance, if a man has been taught that it is his duty to God to smite the “children of the devil,” the cruelty of the smiting will be in a direct ratio to the intensity of the faith. Of this close connection of the destructive and the spiritual elements in a man we find many illustrations in the Bible and in the religious history of all ages. What Abraham purposed to do to his son to please God has been done by many men and women since, with the same end in view, most frequently as the direct or indirect result of their reading of the Abrahamic legend. One of the latest reported attempts to imitate the “Father of the Faithful” was made at Buffalo on October 26th, inst., by Louis Hirschberger, who “has for some time past been afflicted with religious mania,” as stated in a dispatch to the Sun. On the evening of the previous day, Friday, he told his neighbors that he had eaten meat that day, and that for this crime against the canons of the church he had been commanded by God to sacrifice his five children. He took a board and cut five holes in it; then he dragged the children out of bed and forced their heads into the holes. At this time his wife appeared and rescued the children. Later in the day he renewed the attempt and was just ready to cut off the heads of the children with an ax when their cries brought the neighbors to the scene in time to prevent the “act of faith.” Then the man was arrested. We hope that the Catholic News will not think that we are going beyond the limits of “gentlemanly controversy” when we ask why it is that these attempted and accomplished bloody sacrifices are invariably inspired by religious precedents and religious faith.

That Holmes might have been another Abraham or Freeman or Hirschberger is more than probable. Referring to him, the Evening Sun says:

“With his mental development, his present and past tendency for evil operating in the opposite direction, Holmes would have been a religious enthusiast, probably a fanatic. He might even have tried to establish a new sect, would certainly have got many women and a few weak-minded men to look upon him as having come from the deity.”

The prospect certainly does not appear bright for the success of the pious attempt to make H. H. Holmes, alias Herman W. Mudgett, logically or in fact a disciple of Thomas Paine and Robert G. Ingersoll.

Still Fearful of Doubt.

Rev. N. D. Hillis is the successor of the late David Swing as pastor of the independent congregation meeting in Central Music Hall, Chicago. The Inter-Ocean of October 7th gives three solid columns of eight-point type to a report of a sermon delivered by Mr. Hillis the previous Sunday. The reverend gentleman began in this way:

“Christianity challenges investigation. It covets analysis and exhibits its proofs. With the calm confidence that becometh certainties, it takes nothing for granted, but thrusts everything into reason’s crucible. No man is asked to believe against his judgment. Rather is he to withhold faith until the argument overcomes his doubts and compels his belief. Christianity’s spirit forbids faith outrunning the facts.”

A little farther along he says: “Christianity’s appeal is to the reason. Its foundations are facts and arguments.” It is a great pity that the world has had to wait nineteen centuries for Mr. Hillis to tell it the truth about the spirit, methods, and foundation of Christianity. Really, is it not asking a little too much to expect us to believe that the Bible and the church through all the years of its existence were all in the wrong and that Mr. Hillis is alone in the right concerning this matter? Is it true that historic Christianity challenged investigation? Let the questioner arise in almost any church in the land to-day and we shall see just how greedily its representatives "covet analysis." It "exhibits its proofs," to be sure, and then it suavely remarks: "Accept these proofs or—go to hell. If you doubt or reject, we will make this earth as near like hell as the means at our command will permit." If there is anything in the creed of Christianity that is not "taken for granted" we shall be under obligations to Mr. Hillis if he will point it out to us.

No dogma of the church of Christ has ever been willingly put by Christians into "reason's crucible"; the usual practice has been to put the investigators of the dogmas into the fire. Every man in the world is asked "to believe against his judgment" if his judgment is unable to assimilate the affirmations of Christianity. The man is not "to withhold faith until the argument overcomes his doubts and compels his belief," for that implies that he may doubt to the moment of his death, and so die unbelieving, and Christianity says that if he does that he walks from his death-couch over the precipice into the "bottomless pit" of eternal agony. The phenomenon presented by the faith of Mr. Hillis remaining after the "facts" heretofore believed to support the claim that the Bible is a revelation from a god have been completely disposed of, proves that, in his case, at least—and his case is typical of that of the great majority of the more intelligent Christians, those who are familiar with the dispersion of the "facts"—"Christianity's spirit" does not prevent "faith outrunning the facts." Christianity has ever shunned the appeal to reason, and its foundations are assumptions concerning which it is impious and dangerous to argue.

Mr. Hillis devotes a third of his sermon to the praise of reason, and then he talks of the "tragedy of doubt" through the remaining two-thirds, seemingly forgetting that doubt is the child of reason, and that without it there would have been no triumphs for reason after the birth of the first thought. Doubt, estimated in its relations rightly, should produce no "tragedy." Only a religion that falsely predicates a divine and infallible revelation makes doubt sinful or disastrous. Doubt is the precursor of a greater truth. Doubt is the mother of discovery, of invention, of progress. Without doubt there would be no Rev. N. D. Hillis to preach to that vast congregation in Central Music Hall. Without doubt there would not be the greater minister who, in the future, will preach more truth from that pulpit, and from other pulpits which to-day echo nobler and broader truths than were heard therefrom twenty years ago, before doubt had eaten into the heart of error as it is eating now and as it will eat through the decades to come.

When this "liberal" Presbyterian says that "there are multitudes upon whom doubt has fallen, gashing and scorching their souls as with swords of fire"; that "the lives of some have become pathetic tragedies," and that those persons oftentimes "seem like mariners who once were anchored in harbors, safe and peaceful, but who have seen the ropes part strand by strand until, anchorless and rudderless, they have drifted out into the sea and the night," we realize that he, like the Christians of past ages, fears to put his creed into the "crucible of reason," and that his faith, like the faith of his predecessors, has outrun the facts and hence distrusts the doubt that may lead to the exposure of the sham foundations of Christianity. How distasteful doubt is to even the most tolerant of Christians is shown by an anecdote told with evident gusto by Mr. Hillis. A youth about to enter Balliol College informed Professor Jowett that he could find no signs of God. "To whom the great Platonist replied: 'Young man, I will give you until just 5 o'clock to find God, or leave this college.' At the appointed time he returned, having found him for whom his soul had sought not long, but successfully." We wonder if the Rev. Mr. Hillis is really satisfied when men "find God" under the compulsion of self-interest, that is, when they pretend to find him, under the fear of the infliction of temporal penalties if they do not? This minister tells us that God resents the presumption of the man who, with more knowledge than his fellows, cannot believe as they do and hence begins to doubt, to question the creeds they accept. When we do this, "God takes us at our word. He rises into his own invisible majesty. He goes forth upon ways which are not our ways, and we are left alone. And presently we say in our vain hearts, 'There is no God.'" We do not remember to have ever read a more naïve explanation of the origin of Atheism. Plainly stated, it amounts to this: God having failed to provide evidence of his own existence which is absolutely conclusiv at first glance to every brain that he has also made, the more thoughtful and inquiring of these brains ask for additional evidence. Then God gets on his dignity and hides himself in his "invisible majesty," whatever that may be, thus forcing the poor doubters into "blank Atheism." As Atheists go to hell, according to the orthodox creed, it follows that God deliberately sends them there by refusing to convince them of his existence, as he could easily do if he were not so touchy. Presumably, this is the way in which Mr. Hillis would treat inquirers, for the god, the creature, is like the man, the creator. He shows how much the Christian loves the "crucible of reason."

Is this Stupidity or Cunning?

"THE TRUTH SEEKER has been very severe in its condemnation of the Christian Reformer and the Christian Statesman of late. The reasons are because these papers have declared that THE TRUTH SEEKER should be suppressed for blasphemy and because they have approved of the action of the Canadian postmaster-general in prohibiting that paper in Canada. It has declared these papers to be the enemies of free speech and possessed of the spirit of persecution. But while THE TRUTH SEEKER boasts of its friendliness to free speech and a free press, it is more intolerant of true freedom than the Sultan of Turkey or the Pope of Rome. As its cartoons from week to week are more blasphemous than anything in the printed columns, so its cartoons represent more clearly its sentiments on free speech than its printed words. In its issue of October 19, there is a cartoon designed to set forth its idea as to the proper way to dispose of the Reformer and Statesman. This cartoon represents these papers as being in a condition into which they could be brought only by the use of outside physical force. The only force that would undertake to place them in this condition is that represented by THE TRUTH SEEKER. While we have declared in plain English that THE TRUTH SEEKER should be suppressed for blasphemy, that sheet has declared that these papers should be suppressed for expressing this opinion. This has been done by the cartoon in a manner at once emphatic, passionate, bigoted, than is possible by mere spoken or written words. It displays a spirit of satanic bitterness, hate and revenge. Let us hear no more of this paper's devotion to the cause of liberty."—Christian Reformer.

This is one of the rarest curiosities of argumentation. How a brain of the most ordinary intelligence could conceive such a notion is beyond our ken. The editor of the Covenanter paper must be a literalist of the literalists—as, indeed, was to be expected of a Presbyterian. He utterly lacks imagination, the sense of perspective, artistic intuition, acquaintance with pictorial representation. Let the reader turn to THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 19th and he will see at a glance what a blunderer the Christian editor is, how astonishingly he has misinterpreted the meaning of Mr. Heston. The part of the cartoon to which he alludes represents two members of the canine family chained to the skull of John Calvin. Now he says that this represents our "sentiments on free speech"; that it was "designed to set forth its [our] idea as to the proper way to dispose of the Reformer and Statesman. This cartoon represents these papers as being in a condition to which they could be brought only by the use of outside physical force. The only force that would undertake to place them in this condition is that represented by THE TRUTH SEEKER." Whew!

Who ever heard such a jumble of absurdities as that uttered outside of an asylum? How could physical force chain the Covenanter papers to the skull of Calvin? And, mind you, we are told that nothing but physical force could do that. Could the skull of Calvin be produced, and would the Statesman and the Reformer stay chained to a decaying piece of bone, even if it could be found? And why should THE TRUTH SEEKER wish to chain the Covenanters to the dead past? Is that not the last thing that we would desire to do? Is it not our constant complaint that they are already centuries behind the age and that they are a menace to the liberties of the people of this country because they are thus living in the shadows of the Dark Ages? As a matter of fact, it is more than probable that the Reformer editor understands very well the meaning of that cartoon, but as his readers do not see THE TRUTH SEEKER, and as his blind description of the cartoon conveys no information concerning its appearance or lesson, it feels safe in thus misrepresenting it. The picture describes itself; it prints its lesson in the largest kind of type. It shows that by their delusions the theocrats of the National Reform Association are self-chained to the past, to the creed of Calvin, and that from the brain of Calvin, brooded over by the vulture of Superstition, were hatched that foul brood of falsities and tyrannies for which the Covenanters stand to-day and the first of which they wish to incorporate in the Constitution of the United States and the second wreak upon their unfortunate unbelieving fellow citizens. There was no excuse whatever for the Reformer's utter perversion of Watson Heston's meaning; there was no excuse whatever for its assertion that THE TRUTH SEEKER had declared that the Covenanter papers should be suppressed for expressing the opinion that the Freethought paper should be suppressed, or for any other cause.

Not Altogether a Question of Race.

The Philadelphia Telegraph praises the South for its devotion to enforced Sunday observance, and says that it sets an inspiring example to the "reckless cities of the West, which have almost abolished the American Sunday." The New Orleans Times-Democrat is pleased with this praise, and admits the fact upon which it is based, but modestly says that it is not the superior morality of the South but the great preponderance of Anglo-Saxon blood in the veins of her people that is to be taken as the explanation of the phenomenon. It is simply a question of race, it declares; the immigrants from the continent of Europe have brought their demoralizing habits into the North, while the South has remained Anglo-Saxon and consequently Sabbatarian. This is partly true; there is, indeed, a smaller infusion of the continental races in the population of the South than in that of the North, and it is also a fact that the foreigners of this class have brought with them certain customs and habits that make the enforcement of Sunday laws extremely difficult in districts where they are numerous. But if we stop with the recognition of this phenomenon we shall leave out of the account some very important factors. Religion, rather than race, is at the bottom of this difference between the North and the South. Christianity is much more primitive in form and widespread in extent in the South than in the North; but that this is not wholly due to the preponderance of the Anglo-Saxon element in the population of the South is proven by the fact that England has contributed to the Freethought movement of the age many of the most learned and famous expositors of science and critics of the Bible, which the South cannot claim to have done. Here in the North, although we depend upon the Germans and other foreign-born or -descended citizens to help us maintain our secular institutions, we sadly recognize the fact that the rank and file of these are more concerned to secure free Sunday beer than they are to obtain the repeal of all Sabbath laws. Their platform is altogether too narrow, as the demands of the various "reform" organizations in this city this fall conclusively show. When we come to inquire concerning the racial strains in the blood of the active workers for the total abrogation of Sunday laws, we find that the lines are drawn on religious belief, and that, as it happens, the leaders, by a large majority, are of so-called Anglo-Saxon lineage. The Seventh-Day Adventists—than whom no more uncompromising opponents of Sabbath legislation can be found—are nearly all nativ Americans. To show about how the matter stands in the Freethought organizations, it will be sufficient to point out that in the recent Congress of the Secular Union and Freethought Federation, the Committee on Resolutions, which submitted a report demanding the absolute repeal of Sunday laws, was composed exclusively of "Anglo-Saxons"—four Americans and one Englishman.

It may be taken as a rule that the line of cleavage between the friends and the enemies of Sunday laws is a religious one, the two conspicuous exceptions being the Seventh-Day Adventists and the Seventh-Day Baptists. True, the religious intolerance at the root of Sabbatarianism in the nativ population is always subject to modification by the local foreign element—as, for example, the Sabbatarianism of the North is mitigated by the rationalism of the accessions from continental Europe, while that of the South is intensified by the religiosity of the African contingent—but it can safely be said that the more marked the religious faith of the man the more likely he is to favor rigid Sunday laws. The average percentage of religious belief is much higher in the South than it is in the North, because the South has been disastrously checked in her development, and the inevitable result is that Sunday laws are more severe there and more strictly enforced than in other portions of our country.

"If we believe the holy scriptures we know that money earned on the Sabbath and pleasure obtained on the Sabbath are both unlawful and will bring down the judgment hand of God in defense of his day sooner or later."—S. J. Crowe, in Christian Statesman.

When that hand does come down, won't it smite the preachers right and left!

Preaching three weeks ago on the Sabbath laws, Rev. Dr. Huntington, Episcopal, took for his text Prov. xxii, 28, "Remove not the ancient landmarks which thy fathers have set." Then why does he try to remove them? Why does he not become an orthodox Jew? Why does he help send missionaries to the "heathen" with the purpose of cajoling or frightening them into removing the ancient landmarks which their fathers set? As a matter of sober fact, if the earliest man and his descendants down to the present time had acted in accordance with this injunction to leave all the old landmarks intact, that is, to refuse to progress, Rev. Dr. Huntington would not be here now. Instead, there would be an ape-like man munching a cocoanut in Asia or splitting bones in a cave in Europe for the purpose of getting the raw marrow. The difference between the lowest cannibal and Dr. Huntington is due solely to man's disregard of the "ancient landmarks."

Here is an interesting item of news from the Sun of November 2d:

"George T. Carr asked for a writ of mandamus in the supreme court to-day to compel the election officers of the second election district of the third assembly district to reconvene and register him. It appears that last Saturday, when Carr went into the place to register, he refused to swear, and said that he would affirm. The chairman, Charles L. Brockmier, asked him to raise his hand, and when he refused Brockmier refused to register him. He at once brought an action through his attorney, James H. Laird, to compel the board to register him and the matter came before Justice Barrett to-day. 'I am surprised,' said the court, 'that the officers should have known so little of their duties as to refuse to register a citizen because he refuses to raise his hand. A great many of the Friends affirm, and the Hebrews frequently do so with their hats on. There is no reason why the plaintiff's name should not be registered.' Justice Barrett then granted the writ ordering the Board of Registry to convene to-morrow night at 7:30 o'clock and register Mr. Carr's name."

Will the election officers of New York never learn that the position of a man's hands has nothing to do with the credibility of his evidence or his ability to vote? No wonder Judge Barrett is surprised at the ignorance of the officers who refused to register Mr. Carr with his hands suspended; this judge has certainly often enough laid down the law on this subject for the fact to be known to all officials that a citizen may affirm, and affirm with his hands in his pockets, if he chooses. The Board of Police Commissioners should embody instructions on this point in the directions they issue each year for the guidance of registry and other election officers. George T. Carr has rendered a substantial service to the cause of free citizenship.

The Sunday law of Louisiana is to be tested, as to its constitutionality, in the United States Circuit Court. Robert Mogel, a grocer, has brought the suit. He claims that, as he pays a state license to the state of Louisiana, a municipal license to the city of New Orleans, and internal revenue taxes to the United States, and as these licenses run for one calendar year, they are contracts that he may conduct his business for an entire year, and that an entire year consists of 365 days. He claims that the Sunday law of the state is illegal, null, and void, and for these reasons:

"1. Because it is an act of a legislature of the state, when said state, in violation of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States 'denies (to your orator) the legal protection of the laws,' and is deprived of his property and liberty in the exercise of his constitutional rights.

"2. Because said act is violative of a contract under contemporaneous law, by which he is legally entitled to carry on his said business one year, upon the payment of licenses required under existing laws, and said year being 365 days."

We do not see how any competent judge can fail to hold that Mr. Mogel's position is well taken, for certainly it is supported by the Constitution and common sense. We hope our Freethinking friends in New Orleans will keep us informed as to the successive steps taken in the prosecution of this suit. Simon Belden is Mr. Mogel's solicitor.

There is good news from Portland, Oregon. C. B. Reynolds informs us that Assessor Greenleaf of that city placed upon the tax roll all lands owned by churches, outside the lot upon which each church stands; all church hospitals and denominational schools. On an appeal to the county court, it was decided that the tax roll must stand as the assessor had made it. The court held that no property could rightfully be exempt from taxation unless it conferred upon all taxpayers benefits equivalent to the amount of taxes remitted. Hospitals run in the interest of churches were not public charities, but used for propaganda work in behalf of the denomination owning them. Denominational schools that charged any tuition—whether a large or a small amount—were not public charities, and were not entitled to exemption. They benefited a special few and not all taxpayers. Every exemption added to the taxes of all other taxable property. There will be an appeal to the circuit court. The raising of the question in this form is leading to much discussion, which cannot fail to be productive of good. In behalf of all our readers we thank the Oregon Freethinkers for their eminently timely work and we hope that their example will be followed in every state. And here is something else for all to do: Give the facts stated by Mr. Reynolds the widest possible publicity in your local papers. Let us know the result of your attempts to get important news printed.

In a leading article in this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER attention has been called to the fact that a high development of "spirituality" and "veneration," as indicated by phrenology or by professions and acts of religious devotion, is no guarantee of the ethical soundness of a man or woman. Since that article was written, a letter has appeared in the New York World (issue of Nov. 1st), communicated by Prof. E. E. Candee, from which we make the excerpts that follow:

"In the description of Holmes, the great murderer, in this morning's World, it is said: 'The top head is flat, except for one high bump rising suddenly and sharply. It would be said to mean reverence by the usual phrenologist, but not reverence for human life—at all events, not in this case.'

"The writer seems to think this is odd, but there are numerous cases of murderers of relatively large veneration or reverence. Veneration, while it gives a tendency to worship, does not restrain one from being either dishonest, treacherous, or murderous. From the description given, Holmes is deficient in conscientiousness or desire to do right, and benevolence or kindness and desire to do good, which would play a much larger part in restraining a man of murderous tendencies.

"Look at the bust of Black Hawk and you will see the same condition. The Indians, especially a certain class of them, are murderous, but reverential towards the Great Spirit. Italy, and even our own country, furnishes many pious murderers, and phrenology explains the reason of it."

When professors of mental science, depending upon the public for their living, and great newspapers, dare to publish the truth that "veneration, while it gives a tendency to worship, does not restrain one from being either dishonest, treacherous, or murderous," and that murderers are "reverential toward the Great Spirit," there is hope for the overthrow, or at least the weakening, of the delusion, so sedulously fostered by the clergy, that it is necessary to support the church in the interest of morality, even though we do not believe in its theological doctrines.

We have engaged Mr. W. E. Rowe, of Crookston, Minn., to prosecute, to what we hope will be a successful finish, the Flecken school case. Mr. Rowe is associated with the Steenersons of his town in the legal profession, and it was through them that we engaged him. The Steenersons are well known as staunch and courageous Freethinkers as well as men of prominence and substance in their community. Mr. Rowe feels sure that he has the winning end of the suit, and will endeavor to force the bigoted Christians of Kandiyohi to respect the rights of Freethinkers equally with the Christians. The suit will cost money of course, and we ask the friends of liberty to send for the purpose what they can spare. Up to date we have received about sixty dollars. We ought to have about two hundred.

For many months this speech has been out of print and unobtainable. By permission of the Colonel and his publisher we have now put it into a neat pamphlet, with fancy colored cover, and a portrait of the speaker. We have included also the "Vision of War," which many have desired to have in compact and cheap form to hand to friends. The price of the pamphlet is ten cents. The "Declaration of Independence" is the centennial oration delivered July 4, 1876, at Peoria, Ill., and the "Vision of War" is an extract from a speech delivered at the soldiers' reunion at Indianapolis, in September of the same year, beginning, "The past rises before me like a dream."

Several scholars and able controversialists have published replies to Balfour's Quixotic attacks on the evolutionary philosophy of life, but they all have been guilty of the indiscretion and misplaced generosity of treating the "Foundations of Belief" as a serious metaphysical work of great subtlety and strength. As a matter of fact, aside from the question of mere style, the book is as feeble as are the efforts of any half-baked young preacher with semi-modern tendencies to prove the "necessity" of religion as a "complement to science." The veriest tyro in philosophical literature ought to be able to point out Mr. Balfour's obviously fallacious and amusing (if unconscious) method of assuming the very things which the book was written to demonstrate. There is no "argument" in the book that is not pueril and that has not been refuted a thousand times; and if the same matter were put forth in a less felicitous manner by an ordinary theologian, and not by a "future English premier" dabbling in theology, it would not get any notice even in the most inane portion of the religious press. I am very glad to see that Spencer, in his masterly and cruelly effective article in the last Fortnightly Review [already reproduced by THE TRUTH SEEKER], deals with the English politico-theological Quixote in a straightforward way, without throwing any sop to his large gaping suite and without sugar-coating the pill he prepares for them. Nothing can be more eloquent and significant than the serenity and good humor with which Spencer disposes of the Balfourian "best" points, and the calm way in which he insists on treating Christianity merely as one of the many superstitions of which the wide world is so full. Indeed, the article is in Spencer's most happy vein, and the radical who does not devour it misses a rare intellectual treat.—Liberty.

THE CONGRESS OF FREETHINKERS

Proceedings Which Will Serve to Make the Occasion Memorable.

THREE DAYS OF SUSTAINED ENTHUSIASM.

As Mr. Rowley Remarkd, It Was Good to be There—Some of the Speeches Made and Letters Read, With Notes of Minor Events—It is Now the "American Secular Union and Freethought Federation"—The Constitution.

The proceedings of the Freethinkers' National Congress for 1895 are like a good story that is worth going over the second time. THE TRUTH SEEKER has already given what might be called the news of the event, and it now remains to return and bring forward some of the bulkier matters that could not be included in that instalment.

The first set speech following that of the president, already printed, was the address of Dr. S. W. Wetmore of Buffalo, N. Y., which dealt with the exemption of church property from taxation. Dr. Wetmore explained that this was his maiden speech as a Freethinker, but he had his subject well in hand, and contributed some valuable information. He said, in part:

There is no reason why churches, church property, theological seminaries, schools, colleges, hospitals, asylums, nunneries, and convents should be exempt from taxation, any more than Masonic temples, medical colleges, or law schools. The rapid increase of ecclesiastical wealth is perfectly amazing. There is to-day in the United States alone more than $800,000,000 worth of church property. Of this amount the Methodists have about $140,000,000, the Catholics about $120,000,000, the Presbyterians, Baptists, and Episcopalians each not far from $100,000,000. In Buffalo alone the Catholics have more than $7,000,000 worth of church property. The rapidity with which churches are increasing is more than amazing. There were built during the year 1893 in the United States alone more than 800 Methodist churches to say nothing of the other denominations, and yet nearly every religious sect has more organizations than churches. The Roman Catholics have 1,500 more organizations than churches. The Presbyterians need 1,000 more. The Baptists could use 3,600 more. The Congregationalists need 100 more. The Methodist church (South) needs 2,400. The Methodist church (North) needs 3,000. We have many churches in America whose values mount up into the millions. I believe it is generally understood that the Protestant Episcopal church organization in the city of New York is contemplating the erection of a cathedral to cost $10,000,000. If these religious zealots could be induced to think and reason, they might see how much more philanthropic they could be if they would erect observatories, schools, and temples of learning where evolution, astronomy, geology, and the various sciences might be taught, and facts and truth made plain.

The letter from Judge Waite, ex-president of the American Secular Union, which has already been printed elsewhere, was full of figures relating to the religious population and the wealth of churches. Judge Waite believed that statistics overstated the population and understated the wealth. Instead of twenty millions of church-members in the country, he doubted if there was half that number. Religious strength increased mainly in a financial way. Thus, in 1850 the valuation of church property in the United States was $87,328,801; in 1860, $171,398,932; in 1870, $354,483,581; in 1890, $679,694,439. Since 1850 the value of church property has increased nearly three times as fast as the population of the country, but church membership, outside the Catholic church, has not kept pace with the growth of the country. Census returns show that the scepter of power is passing out of Protestant hands into those of Catholics. The need of Liberals, said Judge Waite, was organization, and the interests of reform demanded resistance to the Bible in the public schools, persistence in having church property subjected to taxation, and opposition to Sunday legislation.

A subject that took a strong hold on the interest of those present was that of Secular Sunday-schools, like those of Oregon. In this respect, Oregon is, as THE TRUTH SEEKER has once called it, the banner state. Mr. D. W. Smith of that state is ready, with a little encouragement, to come East, paying his own expenses and working free, in order to introduce here the system of Sunday-schools to which his companion, Katie Kehm Smith, devoted the last years of her life. He wrote to the Congress as follows:

The Secular Sunday-schools Mrs. Smith regarded as the key-stone of the arch of Secularism. As to their importance permit me to call your attention again to her letter to the Congress of 1894. I could not emphasize it better than she has done. The question is, Can the system she so successfully inaugurated in Oregon be continued and extended? If not, why? If made a national instead of a state affair, and managed on the same lines, would it not flourish as well, if not even better than it has here? I have been intimately connected with all of the details of the work here with her, and from that experience I have no hesitation in saying that if your Congress will adopt her system and appoint a superintendent to carry it out, you will soon have started in different states a large number of Secular Sunday-schools that you will all be proud of. Permit me to suggest, further, that you should also appoint a secretary and treasurer, each of whom will be expected to perform the usual duties of those offices, and the three officers so appointed to constitute an executive committee, to have full control and management of the work, with authority to solicit funds to carry it on, and to expend such funds. This committee would provide all lessons and books needed, and supply each school organized; as far as practicable, have all the exercises uniform, and also prescribe what each school should pay for the supplies furnished. The superintendent should be chairman of the committee and the organizer of schools.

There was a thorough appreciation of Mr. Smith's earnestness, and a general expression of regret that the work that he proposed could not be taken up by the national organization. Should any state or local Secular union conclude to try the Sunday-school experiment, it could depend upon the co-operation of the Union and Federation. Mr. Smith's name has been familiar to the readers of Liberal papers for many years, and he is well and favorably known throughout the Northwest, having once held the office of mayor of Port Townsend, Wash., the port of entry on Puget Sound.

Secretary Woodbury of the National Spiritualist Association of America, with headquarters at Washington, D. C., received the welcome he might have expected when he announced that he was "one of Horace Seaver's boys." In the course of his remarks he revealed this very interesting state of things in Washington. Said he: "The nation's capital is indeed in the lap of Rome. Catholic priests meet and pass resolutions thanking the president of the United States of America for favors granted them. The Sisters of Charity in Washington are a privileged class, who go into the institutions and offices of the government on pay day, and stand by the doors of these places soliciting money from the clerks as they emerge; and woe to the man who does not come down with the cash. And I have been recently informed that one of the most prominent government officials has on his bond a Catholic church of that city." The Spiritualists are vitally interested in the repeal or modification of the medical laws which in some states do not permit a citizen to die without the benefit of an allopathic physician. Many spiritual mediums practice the healing art, and under these discriminative laws are liable to arrest for doing so. The Congress passed a resolution expressing distrust and disapproval of state attempts to regulate such matters.

There was a good hearty cheer Saturday evening when President Putnam informed the audience that he had a letter from Mr. J. D. Shaw, editor of the Independent Pulpit, of Waco, Tex., which he would read. The letter was as follows:

WACO, TEX., Oct. 20, 1895.

DEAR MR. PUTNAM: I cannot meet with you and other Liberals in the New York Congress, soon to convene. I sincerely wish I could. I am maintaining the struggle of my life now, and if I save and keep in the field the Independent Pulpit, through which I uphold the Liberal cause, it will require all my means and my closest personal attention.

Please be kind enough to say to those in attendance that my heart is with them, and that, while they are discussing plans for strengthening Liberalism in New York, I am standing at my post here in Texas.

The hard times that have been upon us have greatly embarrassed me, and sometimes I fear I shall be driven from the field, but then I nerve myself by reflecting upon the glorious cause in which I am engaged, take fresh courage, and toil on as if victory were in sight.

I hope you will have a large Congress, and I wish for it wisdom and foresight enough to plan a successful campaign against ignorance, bigotry, and superstition, and for the inculcation, by rational methods, of truth, honor, purity, benevolence, and freedom.

Very truly, J. D. SHAW.

Mr. Putnam's next task was one that nobody had ever before been called upon to perform—namely, that of introducing George MacDonald to an audience of Liberals. The recruit was sympathetically viewed by the large assemblage, and with his eye fixed on the countenance of his friend, Capt. Silas Latham, he proceeded with considerable confidence to advance the following propositions. Matter of an introductory or irrelevant character is omitted from this synopsis of the address:

THE WORTH AND WORTHLESSNESS OF AN OATH.

MR. CHAIRMAN, LADIES, AND GENTLEMEN: I find no account of the origin of the oath, and if I could find one I should have no means of knowing whether or not it was true, and for that reason the subject will not be treated historically. The custom of exacting an oath must have been founded upon the presumption that all men are naturally liars; and if the Christian oath originated at or about the same time as the literature upon which that religion is built, the presumption is not so violent a one as we might at first thought suppose. Judging men by those writings, it was a good guess.

There have always been, we may assume, what you might call two kinds of talk—one kind touching the subjective, the other the objective. One was the result of inspiration, and may be termed prophesying or preaching; and I doubt if it was intended to instruct, so much as to edify. The other kind of relation had reference to something that had happened on earth, and was the plain, every-day truth. It must be supposed, then, that the necessity arose of compelling individuals to stick to the facts in a cause, instead of expounding their ideas about the order in which those facts ought to have occurred. Thence arose, among other ordeals, the custom of having the relator summon his deity to witness the accuracy of his remarks anent the matter in hand; and there is not much room for doubt that the original oath was an imprecation and invoked the vengeance of the deity having jurisdiction, in case the attestation was false.

The oath of civilized peoples is not now acknowledged to be an imprecation, but merely a reminder of the grim fact that God, in his government, regards false swearing as an indictable offense. I incline to the imprecation theory, because the oath in some form appears to have been used before God's government, except on earth, had been established, and before the other world was settled. This method of scaring a witness to the point of differentiating what comes from his imagination from that which arises from his knowledge of the facts, constitutes, so far as it is successful, the present worth of an oath.

It is represented in defense of the oath that it adds sanctity to the proceedings; but if it is remembered that the more of sanctity there is about a thing the more likely that thing is to be a humbug, such a defense of the oath is liable to break down.

Sanctity in any sort of institution is precisely analogous to piety in an individual; and if to say that a man is pious conveys any information at all as to his reliability, it is of an adverse kind. The universal fact is that when we know nothing of a given individual except that he is pious, our sole instinctive impression is that he is slippery—his piety needs to be indorsed by some of the collateral virtues, such as paying his debts and telling the truth. And even if to piety is added an unusual concern for morality or great patriotic enthusiasm, still his word will pass current only when so countersigned.

I once had it called to my notice how those ornaments of character which we have to accept on the profession of the one who claims to possess them, sometimes fail to satisfy all the human requirements. A Western rancher and miner came into the newspaper office where I was at work, and asked me to write for publication a few appreciative words about a neighbor of his—one James Blodgett—who had lately died. He said he wanted a piece to send to his friends in the East. In response to my request for some data to work from, he handed me a clipping from our loathsome contemporary down the street, which he said contained some "statistics." I read what the other editor had written, including this: "Deceased was a most exemplary man. As a citizen he was public spirited. He was a good neighbor, a loving husband, an indulgent father. At a tender age he united with the church, and he lived a more than ordinarily consistent Christian life. He knew that his redeemer lived, and that upon the last day he should stand upon the right hand of God the father. His bereaved family and friends are consoled by the thought that their loss is his and heaven's gain."

I knew enough about the deceased to know that the language of our contemporary was not strictly historical, and that it would probably suit his friends in the East just as well as the truth; so I asked my caller why he didn't send that notice to them. He mused on the lines for awhile, repeating portions of them as though there might be a chance that they would sound better than they looked,

"Good neighbor," said he—"yes, he was. Loving husband—no doubt, of course. Right hand of God—and so on and so forth." Having finished, he drew a long breath and appeared troubled. I said: "It is all right, I guess."

"Ye-e-a-s," he stuttered, about half breaking down; "it's all right, I suppose, but it's damned little to say about a man like Jim." He did not recognize Blodgett by the description. He seemed to think that Jim's real virtues had been ignored, and that the enumeration of these minor qualities was an implication that he had no others worth mentioning. And it was a logical conclusion; for that which is recommended on account of its sanctity, is in the majority of instances destitute of intrinsic value.

A further fallacious plea on behalf of the oath is based upon its age. We are informed that it is a time-honored institution, and contemporaneous with enlightened jurisprudence; but if it is an offender, how does the fact that it is an old one improve its standing in court? It is not so old anyway as the ordeal by fire or by water, or as the wager of battle—which interesting barbarities have been left behind, and that incantation called the judicial oath may as well go after them. They are not beautiful in use, and in desuetude they should not be divided.

But the real argument in favor of the oath is that swearing on the Bible is binding on the conscience. Still I am not convinced by it. A person who will lie on the witness stand, or anywhere else, whether sworn or not, when he knows that by so doing he effects a miscarriage of justice between man and man, has no conscience which can be bound. The only thing that is binding on him is a jail.

After all, it is a question of character. The citizen with a reputation for veracity to maintain can't afford to risk it by bearing false witness, and the oath cannot make his testimony any more than true. Others will swear to anything that enhances the prospects of the side that retains them, and they are a good deal clearer about their duty to say whatever has a general tendency in that direction, than they are about the necessity of telling the exact and undeviating truth. As for the oath, they pass that over as a sort of ceremony of introduction between themselves and the clerk of the court.

Justice has two defenses against perjured testimony—one is the respectable character of the witness, and the other is the penitentiary.

I have been told that the ceremonial of the oath lends dignity to the administration of justice—something, I infer, like the shaking hands between two pugilists before proceeding to discuss the merits of the case. But to me that is one reason why the oath should be abolished. Formality is apt to conceal a fraud. There are many institutions which, if you should happen to peel the glamour off from them, would be found not to have anything underneath. Dignity, in a man, covers as many sins as charity—in fact, it covers more, because it costs less. It takes money to be charitable, but one may be dignified on a small salary. There is nothing so cheap as personal dignity, and generally nothing is so exasperatingly stupid. But the dignity of state and of public affairs is another matter—to the extent that, while it retains all the stupidity, it loses its merit of cheapness.

The judicial oath, when analyzed, means absolutely nothing. Who will venture to say what the phrase "So help me God" has the distinction to mean? What clerk of a court, if asked by a witness to explain it, could say a word by way of definition? I need not tell you that eminent jurists differ as to its true meaning. When eminent jurists agree on a subject it is a sign that there is no further market for opinions about it. It is precisely for the reason that it cannot be construed in the language of sense that it is deemed sacred and is called solemn.

Lord Starr, who composed the "Institutes of the Laws of Scotland," appears to have held the opinion that only "Quakers and fanatics" could object to taking the formal oath. Freethinkers were ignored. Members of the English Parliament—until Bradlaugh came to teach that nation some sense—swore or perjured themselves, as the exigencies of the case might require, "upon the true faith of a Christian."

According to Mc Masters, the restrictions of American governments immediately after the Revolution were such that no Atheist, no Freethinker, no Jew, no Roman Catholic, no one but a Protestant, could be governor of New Jersey, New Hampshire, Connecticut, or Vermont, while in Massachusetts and Maryland the restrictions were the severest possible, for there none but "rich Christians" were eligible. An inquisition into a candidate's belief necessarily preceded his induction into office, and inability to take the Protestant oath and swear upon the Protestant Bible was the bar to political rights. As a scheme to keep the offices in the hands of Protestant Christians, the oath has been a great success.

Prior to last year Atheists were not permitted to testify in the courts of Tennessee. In 1894 a witness in that state who wanted to avoid testifying against an acquaintance who, to his knowledge, had been guilty of a crime, asked to be excused on the ground that he was an Atheist, which was a lie. He was too ignorant to know an Atheist from an Antediluvian. The court had him stand aside until the next day, when, having slept and prayed over the problem, His Honor decided that the witness was competent. The court did not state its process of reasoning, but it must have been something like this: The witness had told a falsehood when he said he was an Atheist, which being the case, he was of necessity a Christian; and being a Christian, though an untruthful one, and not being a truthful Atheist, his testimony was admissible. With such a court and such witnesses, the justice that is dispensed in Tennessee is a natural product. What can't be settled by praying and sleeping and lying, might as well be left to destiny.

Even legislators could see the monstrousness of a case like that, and so at the last session of the Tennessee legislature, an act was passed permitting Atheists to affirm; but the new law has a string on it, and Tennessee juries may take a witness's unbelief into account in judging of his credibility. In courts where a witness is rejected one day, on account of unbelief in a supreme being and future rewards and punishments, or where his unbelief is allowed to vitiate his testimony, he may appear on another day professing a change of sentiment and become altogether reliable.

These are some of the absurdities of the judicial oath, which has as many more absurdities as there are other aspects of it to be discussed. It is as empty in legal proceedings as are the series of interjectional expletives that are used by profane swearers to illuminate their speech, and not once in a hundred times is it one-half so sincere. It belongs to a group of religious observances and incantations which are yet to be weeded out of legal, judicial, and legislative proceedings. Then, in place of being sworn in the name of some deity of which he knows nothing, the witness in a court of law will be warned that, whatever may be his habits as to the practice of veracity, in the present instance he is expected to tell the truth under the terror of an indictment for perjury. Then, as now, the dishonest witness will take his chances; but the man who tells the truth every day of his life will make no invidious distinction when talking for the enlightenment of a court and jury.

The address of Franklin Steiner, vice-president of the organization, will appear with the other official addresses in the Union's official report, to be issued shortly. He spoke on the "Necessity of Freethought Agitation," which is an important subject, for whatever may be done in the way of secularizing the state, the truth will remain that the foundation of a secular state is the secular individual.

At the Sunday morning session, Henry M. Taber gave the following address:

CHURCH TAXATION.

My subject is capable of a very wide range and is of momentous importance, embracing many questions of incalculable interest to this community and to the country at large, such as the arrant injustice of exempting church property from taxation; its serious effect on property other than that of the church, and the, doubtless, fearful consequences of enormous aggregations of ecclesiastical wealth by reason of such exemption.

The injustice of exempting church property from taxation may be illustrated by supposing that the property of a certain community is owned one-half by a church corporation and the other half by an individual. We will suppose it necessary that the sum of $10,000 be raised by taxation. If the property be equally and equitably taxed, the church and the individual pay one-half (or $5,000) each. But if the church is exempt from tax, then, of course, the full burden of taxation falls on the individual, who is compelled to pay the whole tax, viz., $10,000.

The system known as that of exempting church property from taxation is an evasion of the well-known principle which underlies the Constitution of the United States and of the several states, with reference to the question of religion, there being express provisions against the appropriation of public moneys for the support of religion, or indeed of any recognition of any religion. We have the high authority of the late Judge Story, of the Supreme Court of the United States, for saying that it is unconstitutional for any one to be "compelled to support any place of religious worship or to maintain any ministry against his consent."

Are not Freethinkers and others opposed to the dominant religions now supporting places of worship, and now maintaining a ministry or aiding therein? What difference does it make whether our legislators openly present so much of the taxpayers' money every year to the support of the churches, or whether such churches are exempted by legislative action from the operation of a general tax law? None whatever. "Tax exemption is equivalent to direct appropriation." It "is simply the presentation of a receipted bill for taxes."

Let no one say that we have not a union of church and state in this country, so long as the practice of exempting church property from taxation continues. We are contributing, practically, to the support of the church, the same as if we had a state church—precisely the same as in countries where a union of church and state is recognized. Thomas Jefferson says, "It is wicked and tyrannical to compel any man to support a religion in which he does not believe."

The exemption of church property from taxation is one phase of the violation of that principle of church and state separation, which is the cornerstone of the republic, and which violation met the sternest condemnation of Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, Hamilton, Madison, and Paine.

Professor A. L. Rawson says: "This exemption of church property from taxation obtains in a government whose fundamental law contains a protest against the methods of government by the church."

Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States reads: "No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of its laws."

In contravention of this federal law, have not the several states of this Union made and enforced laws by which citizens of the United States, who are owners of property other than that belonging to the church, are denied the privileges and immunities accorded to property owned by the church?

Does not every state which permits church property to be exempt from tax, deprive tax paying persons of their property (their money), to the extent that is necessary to equal the amount of such exemptions? And is not this inequality and injustice perpetrated "without due process of law," when the states, in effect, confiscate the property of their citizens in the interest and for the benefit of the church?

Is it not, practically, a fact that those whom the states compel to pay an increased amount of taxes, by reason of the church being exempt therefrom, are denied that "equal protection" which the constitution of the United States guarantees to its every citizen? And can they be protected from the burden of taxation, equally with the church, when this money of the non-exempt only is arbitrarily taken possession of by the states, the church only being benefited thereby.

The late William Cullen Bryant maintained that "the separation of church and state should include the total discontinuance of contributions of public money—direct or indirect—to the support of any religious institution."

President Garfield insisted that "the divorce between church and state should be so absolute that no church property anywhere—in any state or in the nation—should be exempt from equal taxation."

The New York Times recently said: "There is no reason why large plots of land should be free from taxes, while the humble home of the poor has—on that account—to pay an increased share to the public revenue."

Rev. Franklin Wilson says: "Injustice is shown when the rich, refined church-goers of the elegant cathedral receive a far larger exemption bonus than the hard-working, devoted members of the mission chapel."

James Parton speaks of the "infinite wrong of taxing a workingman's home to its full value and letting a ten-million-dollar cathedral go tax free."

The theory of our government is that all interests that are protected by the state should contribute, equally, to the support of the state. If the churches do not contribute to the support of the state, they are clearly not entitled to the protection of the state. Churches are protected by our police and fire departments, and when injured or destroyed by mob violence, the city pays for the damage done; and yet they contribute not a dollar for the protection accorded them.

Rev. Doctor Shipman, of Christ church in this city, says: "That which is protected by government may justly be compelled to maintain it. . . . I would like to see all church property throughout this land taxed to the last dollar's worth."

Protests against the great wrong of exempting church property from taxation, we learn, is heard from a majority of the clergy of Wisconsin, and from very many of the clergy of other states; from the Independent, the Christian Union, and a large number of other religious newspapers; from the Baptist Preachers' Association of Baltimore, the Ministers' Association of the United Presbyterian Church in Pittsburg, and other similar Christian organizations.

The most frequently adduced reason why churches should be exempt from taxation is the moral influence they are supposed to exert. But do they exert such influence? Do they encourage that enlightened desire for knowledge, that persistent, unbiased search for truth, which is the basis of true morality? Do they discourage that injustice with the practice of which no morality can be genuine? Do they recognize the moral obligation demanded by the Golden Rule? Do they render to Cesar (or the state) the things that are Cesar's?

The late Dexter A. Hawkins has shown by statistics which he had gathered that attendants on the schools of the Christian church became inmates of jails in the proportion of more than three to one of those who were educated in our public schools!

This is not a question in favor of or against any religion, but of principle; the principle that every member of the community is entitled to precisely the same rights as any other member, and that no person should be required to pay for the support of the Christian religion any more than a Christian should be required to pay for the support of Mohammedanism or Agnosticism.

To quote from that mental Hercules of the Manhattan Liberal Club, Thaddeus B. Wakeman: "Those opposed to the exemption of church property have conscientious convictions against furnishing means to teach the doctrines of total depravity, hell, fall of man, atonement, forgiveness of sins by prayer, absolution by penance, baptism, infallibility of pope, church, Bible or revelation."

Dr. Wetmore, in his address on Friday afternoon last, quoted from Rev. James Freeman Clarke's "Ten Great Religions," which placed the value of church property in the United States in 1850 at $87,000,000; in 1860 at $171,000,000; in 1870 at $354,000,000. Samuel Roberts's estimate for 1880 was $746,000,000; that of Judge Westbrook for 1890 was $1,500,000,000, and that of General Grant for 1900 was $3,000,000,000.

The above estimates indicate that the value of church property about doubles decennially. On that basis the value of church property will rise in 1930 to $25,000,000,000; in 1950 to $100,000,000,000, and within the lifetime of many now living to $1,000,000,000,000. Enormous as is this sum, it does not include the value of institutions which are under the control and influence of the churches and which are also exempt from taxation. Nor is any account taken of assessments which are remitted to the church, nor of direct gifts to churches.

Are not these figures appalling? Are they not alarming? Do they not turn the thoughts of reflecting people to those periods in the history of the world when a remedy was found for the injustice of governmental support of the church (through exemption of church property from taxation)?

In the New York Tribune, some years since, appeared a communication from a Roman Catholic clergyman denouncing the wrong, to the non-exempt, of the exemption from taxation of church property and hinting at its possible confiscation in this country.

Dr. Wetmore has also called your attention to the well-grounded apprehension and doubtless prophetic utterance of General Grant—that "such vast amount of untaxed property will not be looked upon acquiescently by those who have to pay the taxes, and (if continued) will probably lead to great trouble in our land, possibly to sequestration and through blood."

E. J. Donnell, Esq., says: "The time always comes—sooner or later—when society recognizes as a truth that property exempted from taxation becomes, in time, the property of the whole community."

James Parton tells us that "at the beginning of the French Revolution more than one-half in value of the real property in France belonged to the church. What was the consequence? Bankruptcy, pauperism, revolution, and confiscation. The same causes produce the same effects. Let us then learn wisdom from the folly of others and make all property bear its share of the common burdens and thus escape injustice, dishonesty, pauperism, revolution, and confiscation. We commenced wrong by exempting any property from taxation. Let us take a new departure, before it is too late."

It is difficult to understand how any honorable Christian can defend such a wrong as that of compelling non-Christians to contribute to the support of the Christian religion, unless it be that Christians regard the dogmas of the church of more importance than principle, than justice, than constitutional provisions of law. It is also difficult to understand how any intelligent and patriotic Christian can shut his eyes to the calamitous consequences which, in time, are sure to result from the enormous and alarming growth of church property by reason of the unwise and inequitable system which obtains of exempting church property from taxation, and against which system all right-minded and patriotic citizens will, or should, unite in a chorus of profoundly earnest and solemn protest.

The National Reform Association's deadliest enemy on earth, E. C. Walker, devoted a forty-five minute paper to unearthing the conspiracies of this Protestant Jesuit organization, most popularly known as the God-in-the-Constitution party. We may hold, as many Liberals do, that Christianity as a belief is undermined, and that it is bound to fall before the attacks from without and the pressure from within the church, but what better off are we if that belief is embodied in the law and we are robbed of liberty by hypocrites instead of fanatics? Mr. Walker's address will appear in these columns in its order.

T. B. Wakeman's Lay Sermon should be heard by the missionary societies, provided those societies are amenable to reason. He spoke of the efforts making to engraft the religion and civilization of modern Europe and America upon other and older races of people. This could no more be done, he said, than apple-tree scions could be grafted into old-growth forest trees. The attempt was sure to result fatally to the race upon which the experiment was tried. No Chinaman, for example, could be made to understand Western civilization, and no Chinaman could become a genuine convert to the Christian religion. Missionary effort in China had resulted in the present execution of some twenty-five heathen, who of course had gone to hell anyway, so that more souls had been precipitated into perdition than could have been saved if the Christian religion were true. The same results that are seen in China are visible in Egypt, whose ancient inhabitants are a departing race. Contact with modern civilization, even to the adopting of our clothing, is fatal. All we can do for these races, farther than to break up their barbarous customs, such as sacrifices and cannibalism, is let them alone. These customs they appear, as a general thing, ready to abandon, and they acknowledge themselves better off without them, but their national life, their forms of civilization, such as they are, and their national religions, are so bound up with their very existence that to destroy these is to destroy the race. Incidentally Mr. Wakeman said that those who come to us with their oriental philosophies and endeavor to engraft them on our civilization are introducing a mildew as fatal to healthy thought as leprosy is to a sound body.

The Brooklyn and Newark friends made the Sunday afternoon meeting memorable by their presence and numbers, and Henry Rowley voiced a sentiment that was bound to be uttered when, after listening to the splendid music of the quartet, he remarked that it was good to be there. It was a common enough saying, but the surroundings made it immensely significant and expressive. The meeting was a glorious occasion.

In the evening came the resolutions, published last week, and Washburn's address, which will pass through these columns, thence to pamphlet form, and onward into literature.

Nothing could be better as a peroration than the following letters from the champions of Freethought in England:

LONDON, Oct. 12, 1895.

MY DEAR PUTNAM: My present letter must be brief, for I am upon the eve of starting for a three weeks' tour, during which time I shall be lecturing or debating every night.

You are about to hold your Freethought Congress. I sincerely hope that it will be in every way a grand success, as it deserves to be. If all the friends are as earnest and energetic as yourself, failure will be impossible.

Judging from the papers, America stands in need of practical Freethought as much as ever she did. Superstition is active, persecution is far from being dead, and theology is still blighting the happiness and impeding the progress of your great country. I sincerely hope that at your coming Congress much will be done to check the influence of these three mighty evils, which have ever been the persistent enemies to mental freedom, personal rights, and national advancement.

I know from experience that you have brave hearts and willing hands in America; all that you need is united action in fighting the common foe. With such a force as Colonel Ingersoll, aided by workers like yourself, the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and his able brother George, you are bound to do work for which generations yet to come will be indebted to you.

The Freethinkers of England will watch your progress with much interest, for our aims are mutual, and our goal—true liberty—is the same. It is my desire that at your next Congress I, with my friend and colleague, Mr. G. W. Foote, shall be present, and once more, for a brief time at least, mingle with those toilers for humanity with whom I have worked in the past, and of whom I have the most pleasing recollections.

In the meantime, go bravely on with your noble work, and "never say fail."

Give my warmest regards to my many personal friends among you; and with every wish for your united success in the cause of freedom and justice, believe me as ever, Yours most sincerely,

CHARLES WATTS.

NATIONAL SECULAR SOCIETY, }
LONDON, ENG., Oct. 14, 1895. }

To the Annual Congress of the Liberals of America at New York:

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: President Putnam desires me to send you a communication from England, and I do so with great pleasure. Some day or other—next year probably—I shall have the deeper pleasure of greeting you face to face.

I should begin by saying something about President Putnam's visit to England, which he found still solidly rooted in its old position in the sea, just where Shakspeare died and left it. It is prophesied that our island is to be towed over to your continent for safety, but I fancy it will stop here after all; and the world, and even Freethought, will be the better for variety. We have something to learn from you, and perhaps you have something to learn from us. It is given to no country to monopolize the wisdom and originality of the planet. Mr. Putnam found many things here to admire; on the other hand, he brought with him a most welcome spice of your American humor. He has none of that stiffness which the platform has too often inherited from the pulpit. He is a proof that a man may be serious without solemnity, enthusiastic without fanaticism, and earnest without ceasing to be genial. And this is as it should be, for it is not enough to break away from the fetters of faith, unless we steep ourselves in the finer spirit of humanity. Mr. Putnam struck us as being full of the milk of human kindness. There seems no envy or enmity in his composition. The man who falls out with him must have a genius for quarreling. We congratulate you on having such a leader at the head of your army. The soldier who smiles when he sees the enemy will be the last to run away.

We gathered from Mr. Putnam, that America is "free and independent" in theory, but a good deal the reverse in practice. It is under the curse of religion and priestcraft. You seem to have developed in a single century most of the evils that with us are the legacy of ages. This does not prove that you have a double dose of original sin. It proves that theology is the one great overwhelming evil of human society, and that if it be not checked it will sweep on like an advancing tide on a level shore, and drown the noblest conquests of political and social progress.

We have an endowed religion; so have you. We have a hired man to say prayers in the legislature; so have you. We have blasphemy laws; so have you. We have laws that rob Freethinkers of the common rights of citizenship; so have you. We have the Bible thrust into public schools; so have you. We have Sabbatarian laws, maintained by clerical protectionists, who hate the competition of a free and open market; so have you. We have a huge black army exploiting our industry, and promising fine things to fools in the next world in return for cash and comfort in this world; so have you.

Let us shake hands across the Atlantic. We are companions in misery. Your duty is the same as ours. We have both to fight theology in the name of humanity. We have to enter the Bible-darkened school and liberate the children. We have to destroy every kind of privilege, and inaugurate the reign of equality. We have to secure freedom not for one or some, but for all; freedom to investigate, freedom to think, freedom to speak, and freedom to live. We have to annihilate the despotism of authority, and establish the free republic of reason.

Happily the bane in your case was followed by the antidote. The poison of theology came to you from Europe, but from Europe came also the counteractant of Freethought. Names that dwell upon our lips are not foreign to yours. It is one flag that flies over the forces of true Liberalism, though they be scattered to the ends of the earth, and never touch each other's hands for the width of sundering space. One flag, I say; the grand old flag of Freethought; shot-torn, blood-stained, but ever flying in bold challenge to Xerxes hordes of tyranny and wrong. It was this flag that inspired the heart of Bruno till it burst in the fire of his martyrdom; it was this flag that Voltaire held high over Europe for half a century, while his eye melted with pity for the persecuted, and his brow darkened with the prophecy of doom to their oppressors; it was this flag that Thomas Paine grasped afterwards, and to which he was faithful in prison and amidst the vilest ingratitude; it was under this flag that Charles Bradlaugh fought and won a hundred battles for human liberty; it is this flag that Ingersoll carries over your continent, while engaged in what Whitman says is the business of all true poets: "To cheer up slaves and horrify despots."

We are not Brunos, Voltaires, Paines, Bradlaughs, or Ingersolls, but we are all men and women, and may all be soldiers in the great army of liberation. And under the flag consecrated by their eloquence, their toils, their sacrifices, and their blood, we may be glad to stand, and happy to fight, and proud to die.

American soldiers of the grand army, I salute you in the name of your English comrades. Be bold and brave; be also vigilant and skillful; let courage go hand in hand with wisdom, and your victories will cheer us in our own fight with the enemies of mankind. Yours faithfully,

G. W. FOOTE, President.

All persons indorsing the Demands of Liberalism, and desirous of propagating the principles involved therein, may become members of this organization by signing the constitution, or sending their names to the secretary for that purpose together with one dollar or more for the treasury. Such persons shall be enrolled as annual members, be entitled to a certificate signed by the president and secretary, and be entitled to vote at any meeting or congress of the society after being enrolled for three months. All life members of the National Liberal League, formed in 1876, and of the American Secular Union, shall be continued as life members of this society.

Article V. Annual Congress. An Annual Congress shall be held at such time and place, and with such sessions, as the Board of Directors shall arrange for, and public notice shall be given of the Congress one month in advance.

Article VI. Officers. The officers of this society shall consist of a president, two or more vice-presidents, a secretary, and treasurer. The president, two vice-presidents, secretary, and treasurer shall constitute a Board of Directors, and this Board shall be entrusted with the management of the affairs of the society.

Article VII. Election of Officers. The officers shall be elected annually, and shall hold office until their successors are elected. All elections shall be by ballot.

Article VIII. The duties of officers shall be those generally pertaining to those of president, secretary, treasurer, and Board of Directors.

Article IX. All moneys contributed to the funds of the society shall be used for practical campaign purposes, and for the distribution of Freethought literature.

Article X. All local societies now in affiliation with the American Secular Union continue in such relation to this organization, and all societies based on the Nine Demands of Liberalism are invited to affiliate. All such societies shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their affairs, and shall simply be united in cordial fellowship and efficient co-operation of the freest kind with this society and its congresses. Neither shall this Union be responsible for the acts or utterances of any local society or any individual.

Article XI. No change shall be made in this constitution except by a two-thirds vote of the members present at any regular meeting called by the Board of Directors, notice of such change to be given one month previously in the call for a meeting.

Notes of the Congress.

—Charles Watts's pen slipped when he addressed his letter to the Congress, and his greeting came "backed" to Mr. Putnam at New York, "U. N. S." But it couldn't go wrong. Anybody could see that U is U, N stands for nited, and S is States all over the world.

—There were three master mariners at the Congress—Captain Latham, of Noank, Conn.; Captain Handy, of Cotuit, Mass., and Captain Kinnier, of Nyack, N. Y. They were of interest to the observer as belonging to a class whose members never use profane language.

—George Francis Train attended the Saturday evening session, but did not speak. Mr. Train's diction as a public speaker is said to be somewhat archaic, reminding the listener of that style which is preserved to us in the writings of Smollet, Dean Swift, and the jocular parsons of their day.

—Mr. E. C. Reichwald, secretary, is a conservative on the subject of extending the scope of the Union and Federation beyond the Nine Demands of Liberalism. He says that since he has been in the office he has met a great many generous people who, while not joining or contributing, were willing to help the organization fight their battles.

—Secretary Woodbury, of the National Spiritualist Association, brought with him a handsome American flag, with which he draped the speaker's stand. It was the one that rested on the desk at the Spiritualist camp-meeting at Lake Pleasant, where Ingersoll spoke this summer. Mr. Woodbury says he can talk better across this banner since the great orator magnetized it. Colonel Ingersoll will be pleased to learn that his aura is all right.

—A word properly placed may express more than a long argument not strictly relevant. Contrasting the New Woman with the Old Woman, Susan H. Wixon observed that when the latter was assured by the minister that nineteen hundred years ago a child was born without a human father, she believed it. Tell the same story to the New Woman, and she will say "Pshaw!" The point did not require further elucidation; the soberest auditor smiled, and the speaker passed to the consideration of other matters.

—While Dr. Foote, Sr., was addressing the audience Friday night on the subject of Comstock prosecutions a gentleman arose to inquire why the American Bible Society was not indicted on the same charge as J. B. Wise. That gave Dr. Foote a chance to tell the story about Goethe, who was called upon by a delegation of ministers to help organize a society for the suppression of immoral literature. Goethe acquiesced, and proposed that they begin with the Bible. Nothing further was heard of the movement.

—The supreme pity and commiseration which a Spiritualist speaker never fails to express for his hearers when addressing an audience of Freethinkers should impress the latter with the deeply sympathetic nature of their spiritual brethren and their own lost state. "We are with you so far as you go," observes the kindly speechmaker, "and we are no less so because we go farther on." But this only amuses the Materialist, who will have it that belief in a future life is one of the illusions which his spiritual brother has omitted to leave behind.

—The evolutionary doctrine of adaptation to environment was fairly well illustrated by a story told by Henry Bird, president of the Newark Liberal League, who spoke on "Evolution." A woman who raised chickens found her hen-house full of water and her poultry drowned. She went to the landlord for redress, but not getting any appealed to the court. Relating her grievance to his honor, the judge, she told about the fate of her chickens. "And then," said she, "when I asked the landlord to pay for my birds, the only satisfaction he gave me was to ask, 'Why the devil didn't I keep ducks?'" In localities where the ability to swim is necessary to survival, fowls will be found to have webbed feet.

—Mr. Henry M. Taber, of this city, did the handsome thing by the Congress. Besides giving a good address, he contributed liberally to the funds, decorated the platform with a banner wrought by the hands of his mother when past ninety years of age, and made the lady entertainers grateful and proud with splendid bouquets of costly flowers. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" contains the following reference to the subject of these remarks: "Henry M. Taber is my friend and one of the best of men. In business he is just, honorable, faithful, reliable. He keeps his word and does as he agrees. For integrity no man's reputation is better than his." The foregoing words were written by Robert G. Ingersoll.

—Dr. J. Hartmann, of this city, addressed the following communication to the president of the Congress: "Will you please announce that young ladies and gentlemen between the ages of twenty-two and thirty years, who desire to receive a gratuitous education in the several natural sciences, may do so (on condition that they pledge themselves to serve the cause we are advocating) by sending name, occupation, residence, and statement of present educational acquirements to the office of the Truth Seeker Company." Dr. Hartmann is an educated gentleman, and is known to New Yorkers as a practical philanthropist who distributes one thousand loaves of bread to the poor on every New Year's day. He is the author of a work published at this office entitled "The Creation of God."

—The London Christian Evidence Society had a representative in the hall—at least, there was an individual present who described himself as such, though he exhibited no credentials. He kept his sign up as a debater, and maintained his bluff during two sessions. Putnam and Steiner were ready to engage him whenever he could produce documents in evidence that he was an accredited representative of a Christian church, but they had no time to waste combating his individual opinions. Rowley, however, being a free lance, offered to joust with him in public or in private, which cooled his ardor for debate. To observe the light to which the president of the Brooklyn Philosophical Association towered above the champion of the Boiling Over.

DOYLESTOWN, PA., Oct. 23, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Man's days are few, and his troubles many. Your remarks on a quotation, not quite in this shape, in your issue of October 12th, caused me to boil over. When so much has caused me to get up to boiling point of late, shall I simply simmer down and hope? That man Caron up in Canada is enough to make a man sick, and my hope is that they will go on showing their teeth and put the screws on tight as possible. Nothing else will bring about a reform so quickly. By Jove, I wish they would put the boots to the Sunday papers. Inclosed find $2. Mark me paid to Jan. 1, 1896. With best wishes, Yours, J. HART.

Canada Has Drawbacks.

MELROSE, MONT., Oct. 24, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The books I ordered of you came all right, and I enjoy them hugely. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is a jewel. I never could have thought that such a humane man lived one hundred years ago, and from what I had heard of him it was an agreeable surprise to me. As soon as I can I will send for several more of your books.

THE TRUTH SEEKER also comes regularly. Oh, I feel thankful that Caron, of my nativ land, has no control over my mail. Canada's climate, politics, and religion do not suit me. These are enough to keep me away, and I tell you, Friend Macdonald, you have a job to civilize or, as I may say, humanize that country. Even my own folks give me the cold shoulder because I am an infidel, except when they want money. I remain, Your well-wisher, J. P. LAMOTTE.

A Vigorous Octogenarian.

CHEHALIS, WASH., Oct. 11, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1.50 due you for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I am now in my eightieth year. I was born on the 10th of the tenth month (October), 1816. I feel that the time is near for me to hand in my "chips." I have outlived all my brothers and sisters. All my brothers lived and died infidels in the estimation of the Christians, and there is no doubt that I will die one also. I am in belief an Atheist, and do not believe in spiritism or soulism after death.

I have read THE TRUTH SEEKER from the time it was first published by D. M. Bennett, and still read it, and do not want you to stop sending it to me. If I am in arrears you are sure to get it in the event of my death. I like it better since you have taken hold of it; give the holy flock, the sky-pilots, and all such men as Comstock, Talmage, Cook, and others, with the Puritan Christian Statesman, and all other bigots a showing up. Hold them up to your readers and warn the latter of the dangers that threaten them.

Thank the gods, you have already done good; already we see the change that has taken place in this and other parts of the country in the awakening of people to the danger of the Sunday laws and God and Christ in the Constitution.

You seldom, if ever, find an educated, honest man who believes in the holy Bible as the word of God.

Continue to expose the untruthfulness of the holy flock, for I am convinced that the contributors to THE TRUTH SEEKER and its Editor are appreciated and thanked for writing what they think is the truth.

Yours for the good of humanity,
N. BEERY COFFMAN.

Much Danger in Optimism.

ENID, O. T., Oct. 10, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I am not entering the field of discussion with H. Clay Wilson and yourself as to whether or not the alliance "between the churches and Uncle Sam is every day growing closer," but I am glad to furnish an extract from a sermon by Dr. J. E. Roberts, of Kansas City, which indicates to my mind that there is a broader and more Liberal discussion of the subject within the churches, and this will insure thought, and thought will find fact, and facts will convince the reasoning mind. I believe in the reasoning of the great body of people, that they will arrive at just conclusions. I do not think we have much to fear from the churches now as churches, but I do think that their leading, designing adherents see a vast field for their designs in the various auxiliaries which are among the young who are not reasoners as yet.

I look upon the church influence in legislation as a desperate effort to withstand the advance of Liberal thought which, but a few years ago, was not, to their thinking, dangerous, but which has asserted itself now so as to cause alarm to them. Twenty-one years ago THE TRUTH SEEKER was started at Paris, Ill., for the reason that the public newspapers would discuss the subject of religion only on one side, while now the big dailies print a whole speech of Col. Ingersoll in such discussion as a news item. Times have changed, and I think for the better, but patriots must not desert their colors.

On the 8th instant Rev. J. J. Stanton, a Methodist minister of this place, was expelled from the church for keeping open his ice cream parlors on Sunday the past season. Some of the congregation had purchased goods from him on Sunday, and the presiding elder had seen his place opened before, and had passed upon his character once before, since he had seen it open. Respectfully, JAMES H. PARKS.

An Interminable Sunday.

NEW YORK, N. Y., Oct. 22, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: At a Socialist Labor Party mass meeting at Grand Central Palace, New York city, Monday evening, October 7, 1895, Chairman Matchett said:

For the benefit of those who may happen to be in this hall, who think that God has told them that they must try to enforce their blue law—their idea of how some certain day in the week should be observed—I should like to make a few remarks, to propound a query.

It is said in the Mosaic description of the creation that the world was made in six days; that God got through with the job on the sixth day, Saturday night, and he said everything was good and all hunky-dory. Then he was going to rest the next day; going to celebrate that day by resting on the completion of so good and grand a work. And God told Moses that we must observe that day and keep it holy; we should do no work on that day, but we should worship him and thank him for giving us this happy world, don't you see? in which we live.

Well, it used to be taught when I was a child, and I do not doubt it is taught still in some back-country districts, that the world and the systems of planets were all completed in six days. But science in the last thirty or forty years has been so popularized, thanks to the press, that the people have found out that that is an absurdity, an impossibility. They have found out that beyond a peradventure it has taken millions of years of growth to produce the world and what is in it to-day. The church people, those who used to teach that the world and all of the universe was made in six days, now hasten to say—seeing they are put in a hole—"Oh, no, no! the world, of course was not made in six days as we understand days; not six days between the setting and rising of the sun or between the rising and rising of the sun. It means six cycles—six periods comprising millions of years in each period. That is what is meant in this history of creation."

Now, I would like to ask these people who undertake to despotically force upon us their interpretation of what God's will is regarding a certain day of the week, if they will be kind enough to inform us whether this is Sunday, or whether it is Monday. If this is the day that God ordered us to abstain from work; if this is the day that we are to observe and they can compel us to observe it, we must observe their idea of what we can or cannot do on that day—then I shall be compelled to ask them whether we are living to-day in a Sunday or a Monday. Because, if we are living in a Sunday, it is going to be a Sunday probably for the whole lifetime of the human race; and if Monday, there will never be any Sunday for us to observe. (Applause.) Reported by L. D. CRINE.

Rensburg in Texas.

COMMERCE, TEX., Oct. 25, A.M. 295.

MR. EDITOR: This little priest-ridden village, with its five temples of superstition, has just passed through a storm that shook it from center to circumference, said shock being caused by the appearance of the "silver-tongued brunet" from Kansas. Mr. J. E. Rensburg delivered his lectures, "The Bible and Morality;" "Some Flaws in Christ's Credentials," and "False Claims," at this place on the 14th instant, and to say they were grand would only be putting it mildly. The most gratifying feature of the lectures was the triumph of truth over fanaticism, the churches having raised a dismal howl and a storm of opposition against the lectures. We had rented the Odd Fellows' Hall, paid for it, and had written permission from the secretary to use it. A large crowd had gathered to hear the lecture billed for Sunday afternoon, the 13th, but when Mr. Rensburg arrived, and the hour came, the hall was barred and locked, and locked and barred, and those cowardly assassins of free speech refused to allow us to use the hall, after accepting our money and granting permission to use it. They had us handicapped, but only for the moment. We secured another hall, but could not get it in shape until next day, owing to the Sunday law. The lectures were at 10:30 A.M., 3:30 P.M., and 8 P.M. Monday. The audiences at the day lectures were small, but at night a magnificent crowd was on hand, and every one present was well entertained. Mr. Rensburg certainly knows how to capture an audience. Only one preacher attended, and he held his peace. However, after the last lecture he started a conversation with Mr. Rensburg, objecting to the statement that "forgiveness for sin is a license to commit crime," and asked Mr. Rensburg to "suggest something better than forgiveness." The Kansas brunet replied: "If you sin, you must stand the consequent penalty. 'As ye sow, so shall ye reap.' The effect of a cause cannot be arrested, so the only remedy is to quit sinning." The reply was so apt and quick it brought roars of laughter from those standing around, and completely floored the sky-pilot.

Mr. Rensburg did not forget the hall episode and used it with telling effect. The Odd Fellows, in seeking to injure us, did our cause a service that will be more lasting in its influence than a dozen lectures.

Mr. Rensburg is a noble man engaged in a noble work. It is really wonderful how he sways an audience with his magic eloquence, while his argument is so well-grounded, his premises so well-taken and so self-evident that conviction is carried deep to the heart. He is a dangerous man—dangerous to falsehood, bigotry, and fraud, but the friend of true manhood, truth, and honor. HARRY C. BAILEY.

To Convert Ingersoll.

RICHMOND HILL, L. I., Oct. 23, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: According to the New York Herald, Sunday, Oct. 20th, it appears that various amusing though fruitless efforts are being made by the Salvation Army and Methodists to convert Colonel Ingersoll to Christianity, the latter of the two sects being the more persistent. We are informed that the Rev. Doctor McCabe, of the Board of Home Missions of the Methodist Episcopal church, is in the habit of writing a letter or leaflet each month, in which he points out to the great unbeliever that there is yet time for him to join the Methodist church. His latest letter, according to the Herald, is as follows:

"Since you began to lecture against the Bible thirty years ago, the Methodist church has increased greatly, while other denominations have grown also. We now have 2,800,000 communicants—a gain of 1,800,000. Our church property has increased in value from $29,000,000 to more than $161,000,000, a gain of $13,000 daily for thirty years. In the meantime you have not been able to overthrow a single church altar. Colonel, we have beaten you. Colonel, you had better join the Methodist church. Saul of Tarsus persecuted the church, and he came in. You had better come in."

No Freethinker who chances to read the doctor's exhortation, and for a moment considers the mathematical facts in the case, can deny that the growth of Methodism as well as of other denominations has been, to say the least, truly phenomenal—that is, if figures mean anything. And should the eye of any devout disciple of John Wesley chance to fall upon the doctor's statements, he would undoubtedly be unable to suppress the involuntary "amen" or "hallelujah" at the encouraging prospects of the speedy overthrow of and visitation of divine vengeance on all infidels. But if the same disciple (or even the doctor himself) were to read the left hand column of the same page of the Herald, we think he would not be at a loss to know that not all the people (the Freethinkers especially) are ignorant of the fact that quantity is one thing, while quality is another.

The article to which we allude and quote from states how the prison chaplains, the members of the Salvation Army, and at last Lady Henry Somerset have, it is said, been balked in their efforts to reclaim one who has acquired the reputation of being the wickedest woman living. In said article Sir Haverlock Ellis is quoted as saying in his book on the "Criminal" that "no class of the community has so large a percentage of Christian believers as the criminals. Rarely, if ever, do you find an avowed Atheist, seldom a Deist, but almost always a firm believer in some orthodox cult," the so-called wickedest woman (Jane Cakebread) being not an exception to this almost invariable rule.

Taking these observations together with Doctor McCabe's figures, we think that Colonel Ingersoll, or any other Freethinker, may with pride say that he is thankful to the evolution of circumstances that he does not happen to be a "Christian believer." T. L. BEEBE.

Some Curious Bible Sayings.

NATIONAL MILITARY HOME, OHIO, }
Oct. 1, 1895. }

MR. EDITOR: I got my book, the "Crimes of Preachers," all right; it is just splendid.

I propose in this to give the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER just a few of what we will call the curious sayings we find in the Bible. In fact, they would be curious sayings to be found in any book, but they come to us through the Bible, so we will call them by their original names. They are sayings that seemingly at least, have not a particle of truth, reason, or good sense to support them, yet they are palmed off on us as Bible truths, and we are expected to believe them. The first that shall claim our attention will be what it says in regard to the man "Melchisedec." Hebrews vii, 1 to 4, tells us that there was a man whose name was "Melchisedec." Moses tells us about the same man in Genesis xiv, 18. It says that he was a priest of the most high God; that he was king of Salem, king of Righteousness, king of Peace; that even the patriarch Abraham gave him the tenth of all his spoils. Then, to cap the climax, it says that he was without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days nor end of life. Now consider, he says, how great this man was. Truly a great man, if there was any truth in the statements made concerning him; but they are as void of truth and reason as a horse is of holiness. If the statements the writer makes there in regard to his genealogy were true, it would knock that of both God and Jesus into the shade, because the Bible tells us that even God had a beginning. St. John says (i, 1, 2), "In the beginning was the word, and the word was with God, and the word was God. The same was in the beginning with God." If that don't say that God had a beginning then we don't know what words mean. We could cite plenty more instances where it speaks of the beginning of God, but one is as good as a hundred for our purpose. We take it word for word from the Bible, and that is enough. But this man Melchisedec is to have neither beginning nor end, and as for Jesus, we all know what the Bible says in regard to his genealogy; it is not necessary to repeat it here. Now, we don't dispute that there may have lived a man called Melchisedec; he may have been a great man, but we do dispute most emphatically that he or any other man, Jesus included, ever has, or ever will, come into this world, or go out of it, on any other conditions than those nature has provided. If there ever were a man called Melchisedec, he was born into the world the same as other men are; had a father and mother, and lived and died thousands of years ago. That is what nature, reason, and just a little good sense would teach us, but if you want to be a Bible dupe you must believe what it says, let it be true or false, reasonable or unreasonable.

In speaking of Jesus, we find some very curious sayings in the Bible. In the very first verse in the New Testament it is said that he is the son of David; it tells us in as many as twenty different places through the book that he is the son of David. St. John tells us that he is the only begotten son of God. Matthew tells us that he was begotten by the "Holy Ghost," whatever that is. Mary, his mother, tells us that Joseph is his father. In as many as fifty places he is called the son of man; it don't say what man—we wish it did. One seems to have about as good a claim as any of the others, for it is impossible to tell which one it is; if either, we should like to know. Jeremiah xxxii, 27, says: "Behold, I am the Lord, the God of all flesh. Is there anything too hard for me?" Yes, we should say there is, if the Bible tells the truth. It says (Judges i, 19) that he drove out the inhabitants of the mountain, but could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley because they had chariots of iron. Iron chariots were a little too hard for the Lord to handle.

JOEL M. BERRY.

Death-Bed "Conversions."

CONDON, OR., Oct. 6, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Seeing a picture in your paper some time ago representing that the different "Saviors" of the world were born on the 25th of December, prompts me to inquire, Did Christmas always come on that day?

[No, Christmas was formerly observed in April and May. It was changed to December in order to conform with the custom of the so-called pagans, who celebrated, on the 25th, the lengthening of the days, which begins about that time.—ED. T. S.]

Human beings are so constituted that, so far as my observation goes, they are more inclined to tell things as they want them to be than they are to tell them as they occur. A while back somebody told through this country that Mrs. Katie Kehm Smith had five preachers praying over her and had become converted and joined the church. Many good Christian people were happy in telling and having this told to them. They loved the best woman on earth for her true worth. They were glad that she would not burn forever in hell, and were much concerned that she should get into the right Christian lifeboat. However well the report may have pleased many, the cold and unsympathetic truth is different. She was surrounded and cared for by infidel friends, from the time she was taken sick until she died. No man of God was there. If it had been otherwise, she would have been so incapacitated by the delirium of fever to avail herself of his counsel, however the hope of heaven or the fear of hell might have persuaded her.

But death-bed conversion amounts to little anyway. Grandpa Littleton Younger was an infidel and an excellent violinist. When he had lived to be so old and childish that he didn't know anything, and mixed up Yankee Doodle and Old Hundred on the fiddle, he joined the church. And thus it is, "Here, God, I give myself to thee, 'tis all that I can do," though when the body and soul are both worn out there is not much to be given; let the church have all the glory of such conversions.

Poor "Little Curly Head!" She is dead now, worn out in the cause of humanity. How many appreciate the sacrifice? It was no ordinary star that went out at her death, but the brightest in intellect, and the noblest in character. On the 19th day of last month (it was my birthday) they laid her to rest on the sunny hillside of Hay Stack valley (I never see the place with my mind's eye but I think of sunshine), with a pansy on her breast. She thought little of jewelry, but she loved the flowers. I was not there, but they tell me she looked wasted and pitiful. Dear little woman friend. How she suffered! The waste of nature is indeed cruel, if the grave ends all, as in many instances it may well do; but in this particular case, who can say? She was so honest and true that she would not believe that others could lie. In debate she was too good. Her opponent never "lied," but was many times mistaken. To her, her enemies were such through ignorance, and her friends were honor personified. I cannot write of our friend as she deserves. GEO. W. CRAWFORD.

Steiner and Rowley in Philadelphia.

PHILADELPHIA, Oct. 21, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I am highly delighted to report that we have enjoyed these last two Sundays intellectual treats from two very able speakers. The first Sunday Mr. Steiner gave us two discourses, his afternoon subject being, "The Tyranny and Absurdity of Sunday Laws" (which is the issue of the day), and in the evening, "Jesus Christ: Is He a Proper Guide for Humanity?" which can also be truly said is not a dead issue, notwithstanding our Single Tax friends think that it is, and, I regret to say, some professed Liberals also.

The lecturer handled his subjects very ably and made his mark. The debate that followed was insignificant, the chief remarks being from a Single Taxer, who claimed that our Liberal lecturers were fighting a man of straw; that Christianity is a dead issue. You may be sure this warmed up our speaker, as in his reply to his critics at the close he completely demolished these notions.

Notwithstanding the very inclement weather, it raining all day, we had a much larger audience in the afternoon than we expected; in the evening it was our pleasure to see the large hall filled to hear the discourse upon "Jesus Christ." This false teacher was very skillfully disposed of as an unworthy guide for humanity to follow, and the proofs were drawn from the Christian Bible; he proved conclusively that to be a follower of Jesus a person would land either in the penitentiary or in the lunatic asylum. Criticism followed the lecture as usual, but the defenders of the so-called meek and lowly Jesus were very weak in their arguments, so that the lecturer had a very easy task to demolish what they presented. It is a great pity that we cannot get an able clergyman to come and meet our champions of Free-thought; but no, they know that we know that they do not know, as Colonel Ingersoll truly remarks. The lectures, I am pleased to say, were a grand success; the applause that greeted them was immense, which shows that Mr. Steiner is very highly appreciated here. We were pleased to learn that he is kept busier than formerly. We hope he will be kept constantly on the go, as he is a very promising young worker in our ranks.

Now I come to Henry Rowley; though last, he is by no means least, for it is the general opinion here that he is the intellectual giant of America, not even excepting Colonel Ingersoll. Had his lectures been in print he might have disposed of a great many. His discourse for the afternoon was, "What is Atheism?" and we must say without any exaggeration or bias that it was the grandest philosophical lecture in defense of Atheism ever given before our society. Nevertheless he kept the audience in roars of laughter most of the time. He very aptly described the difference between the Agnostic and the Atheist thus: The former when he goes in the water to bathe touches the water

Dr. Westbrook was present and is looking well after his summer vacation. He gave a few remarks after the lecture, but as I was called out by a reporter I did not hear what he said. I learned later that Mr. Rowley is anxious to debate the subject of "Theism vs. Atheism" with the doctor a month hence. I hope the debate will take place. The doctor has promised us a lecture in defense of Theism whenever we are ready for it.

Mr. Rowley's evening discourse was "Miracle and Prophecy," which I can assure your readers he handled without gloves, and created roars of laughter and applause. Every seat was filled, while people stood in the aisles. Mr. Rowley has a splendid, soft, musical voice, and having a fine physique, has a very commanding presence. In his reply to his critics, who consisted of lawyers and doctors, he showed great skill as a debater, without taking any undue advantage of his opponents. At the close a vote of thanks was tendered unanimously to Mr. Rowley for his very able lectures, with the expressed hope that he would give us another visit soon.

As my letter is getting rather lengthy, I will conclude by saying that such a brilliant talent should never rust for want of opportunities to work, and that I pledge my word that no Liberal society will ever regret having engaged Henry Rowley to lecture for them, for he is, without exaggeration, the very best philosophical speaker up to date in our ranks, and the Philadelphia Liberal League wishes him success wherever he goes.

GEO. LONGFORD, Sec.

Shall We Live Forever?

LOS ANGELES, CAL., Oct. 20, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Spiritualism teaches that man is immortal, and Noah Webster says "immortal" means lasting forever; having unlimited existence. Mr. Swan asserts that unless the phenomena attributed to spirits are produced in some other manner, we have "proof positive" that man is immortal. The work "unless" is what makes the question debatable, for if the claims of modern Spiritualism were fully established, doubt would disappear. We do not know that the manifestations which excite wonder and credulity in many, are the work of disembodied spirits, for science has found out that many of them are not, and will, in time, probably demonstrate that none of them are. Hypnotism, thought transference, illusions of the senses, optical delusions, and unconscious cerebration, have been found to remove the necessity of a spirit to account for certain phenomena; and all that cannot be accounted for by those explanatory methods are now very few in number. It was never supposed that the victim of delirium tremens saw anything but mental images of snakes, and it is safe to say that all spooks, phantoms, or phasmas that ever appeared to any human being were produced solely by the action of the brain. Thanks to science, we are beginning to know something about the brain and the possibilities that are embodied in the nervous system; and while definite details are somewhat lacking in complex modes of motion, facts are becoming so numerous in relation to the powers of mind and body that a spirit world will not much longer side-track the man in pursuit of causes.

All philosophy and science end when they get to disembodied spirits, same as all explanations that terminate in God are no explanations at all. A natural cause exists for all things, and to seek it outside of this objective world, and apart from force and matter, is to desert the path of reason and common sense. Matter, such as that of which this world and our bodies are composed, has always been despised and held in contempt because of theological and metaphysical doctrines; and Spiritualism now comes to the front and talks about our "casket of clay" and the disadvantages the soul labors under while united to a body of flesh and blood. All this in the face and eyes of the fact, that outside of hope and desire, mixed with faith, there is no positive certainty that what is called the soul survives the death of the despised body. Mr. Swan denies that evolution has any bearing on the subject of immortality as proclaimed by modern Spiritualism, but the origin of man must have some connection with his end. The advent of man upon this earth was as evolution declares, or by special creation according to Genesis; and Mr. Swan seems to accept the latter explanation. But, whichever is true, the fact that the human race had a beginning, and no form of life at one time could exist on this earth, is something no one will dispute. If as conscious individuals, we have been produced by force and matter after a beginningless eternity of time, what reason have we to suppose we shall remain conscious individuals for an eternity to come? Hope and desire are the principal factors in sustaining such a belief; but when the unreliability of hope is mentioned, Mr. Swan says, Don't discourage hope; we need it.

I will admit that hope is a good thing in its way, and has much to do in keeping us agoing in this world; but there are a limited number of the human family that prefer facts to fiction, and seek for them regardless of their influence on the emotions. Materialism has the strongest indications of being a stubborn reality. If it is true, all genuine truth seekers want to know it, and to science, instead of sentiment, do such people turn. Credulity exists without effort, but doubt results from thought and study; so while it is an easy matter to believe what we think is desirable, like another life and a heavenly father to protect us here and there, thought and study produce doubt every time.

Spiritualists, as a rule, any more than Christians, do not read much that conflicts with their faith, and one side of the question is all they look at. For many years I was what is known as a ghost chaser, and when my faith in another life was the strongest, the least was known of the facts which Materialism puts forth. I was continually in search of more tests, and always felt not quite satisfied; so the following, in a recent Spiritualist paper, was noted with some interest: "We have asked for phenomena until we stand to-day with our lives full, and thoroughly saturated with it, and yet the instant we see a medium, we rush forward for phenomena."

I never knew it to fail, and a lecture that does not wind up with a test medium on the rostrum never draws like one that does. Mr. Swan asks authority for the statement that Spiritualism denies the immortality of animals. My reply is that spirit communications and noted advocates of it have so declared. "Are all or any animals immortal?" was once asked a prominent author and lecturer. He said, "I emphatically answer, So far as my knowledge goes, not one!" He then stated that the faculty of independent seership was born with him, and yet never had he seen or heard of an immortal dog, cat, or any other animal; and while seeking the cause for their non-immortal nature, he found they were not high enough in the scale of life to elaborate the indestructible essences of the spirit body. It is true that some "spirits" and writers assert the contrary, but the testimony that predominates is against animals in spirit life. The awful possibilities which open up with the belief of Mr. Swan that animals and every other form of life are immortal, must on reflection cast a damper on celestial anticipations; for that eighty-foot tapeworm would be a resident of the spirit-world, and some spirit would have to pack it around through an endless eternity, as all forms of life are there immortal, and no compound of spirit medium could exterminate the divinely favored creature. It would be there to stay, and when I meditate on immortality with the possibility of endless life with a tapeworm in my spiritual stomach, annihilation at death seems greatly to be desired; and with all the other uncertainties which confront life in another world, I am led to hope, as I now believe, that we shall not live forever. cross made any sort of contest between them ridiculous to think about. The gospeler must have been impressed that way, for nobody saw him afterwards.

—Some of the visitors used eloquent language with reference to the American flag as the symbol of everything that is free and enlightened. The veteran J. K. Ingalls remarked aside that patriotism or love of country was commendable provided it was worthily bestowed, but it must be remembered that all flags symbolized the invasive tyranny of governments as well as their guarantee of protection to citizens. It may be recalled by some that Old Glory has shielded slave-holders when serfdom was outlawed under the flag of Great Britain, and that at the present time American citizens are tried for religious offenses in courts over which float the Stars and Stripes. It is better, on the whole, to stand by a principle than by a piece of cloth, the significance of which is subject to perpetual revision by parsons and politicians.

—A lady physician who was present from New Jersey had a good thought to offer not only to the Freethinkers but to all the residents of New York. It related to the school question. We have a law making it compulsory upon parents, and all persons standing in parental relations to children between the ages of eight and sixteen years, to send those children to school. But as it happens there are more than six thousand five hundred children in New York city for whom there is no room in the school-houses. The lady's proposition was that the school board should take possession of some of the church buildings that stand empty six days in the week and fit them up as school-rooms. Since the city protects the church buildings without recompense, such as other protected property makes in the form of taxes, the right of the public to use the sanctuary for school purposes cannot be disputed; and since the churches make loud professions of friendliness to education, they cannot object to such a practical method of doing education a service.

—A queer character drifted into the meetings once or twice when the wind set from the direction of the luny orb. While the revised constitution was under consideration, he inquired, with suppressed emotion, if that was just for this society or for the whole United States. Learning that it was restricted to the Freethought Union, he snorted and then sat down, showing very plainly that he was not satisfied. Later, after Mr. Woodbury had spoken, he arose and said that now the audience had listened to a Spiritualist he supposed a Freethinker might speak his mind. He was allowed to go ahead, when he made the most rambling address he had in his repertory. E. C. Walker raised his voice to a point of order, and the orator went away, leaving a trail of red-hot expletives behind him. He came back later and tried to speak, but was ignored. He volunteered the information that he was used to that sort of treatment. His particular delusion is that the creator resides in his cranium, and that his thoughts are emanations from the divine mind.

—E. C. Walker scored a good point in his paper on "The National Reform Association"—a point so clear and sharp that the National Reformers cannot help seeing and feeling it—when he said: "We read in an old legend that 'in those days came John the Baptist preaching in the wilderness . . . and saying, Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.' Therefore John has been called the Forerunner of Christ. He announced his coming, it is said, and prepared the way for him. We read in the records of our time that in these days comes the National Reform Association preaching in the wilderness, and saying, Repent ye, for the kingdom of Rome is at hand. The leaders of the God-in-the-Constitution party are the John the Baptists of the Church of Rome. They are its forerunners. They are announcing its coming and preparing the way for it." The church of Rome gets from the public treasury two dollars for every one dollar drawn from that source by her Protestant accomplices. Protestants crack the safe and she robs the till. Let Protestantism place a chair of theology beside that of the president of the United States, and the pope will sit in it.

—Mrs. Cadwallader, the medium and inspirational speaker, thinks she has the joke on the Boston Freethinkers. While the present odious Sunday law was before the Massachusetts legislature, and while Mrs. Cadwallader was lobbying for an amendment permitting mediums to hold seances Sunday nights, she heard that a lecture was to be delivered in Paine Hall on "Sunday Laws." She canceled an engagement in order to be present, expecting to get some points about the law then threatening the rights of Freethinkers in that state, but the lecturer made no reference to it, and at the close of the meeting she learned that no one present had heard of it. The Massachusetts Liberals who read THE TRUTH SEEKER evidently were not interviewed by Mrs. Cadwallader, for this paper devoted considerable editorial space to the matter at the time. Mrs. Cadwallader remarked that she found it somewhat difficult to address a Freethought audience on account of the different vocabulary necessary to be used. Those who have listened much to inspirational speakers have doubtless observed this distinction.

—Through some oversight a resolution condemning the action of the Philadelphia authorities in arresting spirit mediums failed to get before the Committee on Resolutions. One like the following would doubtless have been well received: Resolved, That while Catholic priests are permitted without molestation to display the alleged relics of defunct saints, ostensibly for the cure of diseases but in reality to increase the revenues of the church and the superstition of its members; and while the entire Christian ministry subsists by vending for money its professed knowledge about other worlds and the sure method of reaching the right one, the interests of impartial justice demand that the same immunity should be extended to so-called spirit mediums; that the future, except as it may be judged by the past, is to us wholly unknown, but persons asserting their ability to reveal the events which it has in store should be on an exact equality before the law; and furthermore, were all such persons to be regarded as impostors, still, as between the mediums and the ministers, the former are so weak in numbers, and their professions are so modest when compared with the preposterous claims of the latter, that they should be secure in the practice of their chosen calling so long as any pulpit in the land is occupied by a minister of the Christian gospel.

Calling the Ministers to Order.

From the New York Sun

The Mormon missionaries have as much right to propagate the religion of Mormonism in the state of North Carolina as the Presbyterian missionaries in China have to propagate the religion of Presbyterianism there. We should like to know the difference between the conduct of the Chinese mandarins and Vegetarians who drove out the Christian missionaries and that of the clergymen of North Carolina who have sent a written warning to the Mormon missionaries there to "retire from our community, and at once." The Chinese have degraded the anti-missionary viceroy, and chopped off the heads of a lot of the anti-missionary Vegetarians. What kind of punishment should be given by somebody to the Rev. M. D. Bynum and the Rev. H. J. Jennett, of New Hill, Wake county, N. C.? The stories told in China against Christian missionaries are even worse than those told in North Carolina against the Mormon missionaries.

Our Missionary Work.

Several of our good friends have written us that in their opinion the work, "Self-Contradictions of the Bible," should go along with Paine's "Age of Reason" as a missionary pamphlet. Mr. J. R. Perry puts it thus: "As a missionary document the 144 Self-Contradictions will go hand in hand with the 'Age of Reason.' I think any person getting the one will get the other. It is the grubbing process, clearing out the roots and stones, necessary to preparing the soil for good seeds of common sense." And as it is our delight to furnish the implements for this sort of agricultural operations, we are willing to do our part and will send the "Self-Contradictions of the Bible" to those who will distribute it among their Christian friends, FOR A DOLLAR A DOZEN. Or we will send twelve copies to as many different addresses for one dollar.

Now let the friends of Freethought turn to and circulate "Self-Contradictions" as well as the "Age of Reason." Send both books out by the thousand and watch the result. Flood the country with them, and let the Christians know what their holy paper fetich, the Bible, is like and why it is worthless as a guide to any good.

THE TRUTH SEEKER's offer to send eight copies of Paine's "Age of Reason" to eight different addresses for $1, to be used for missionary purposes, is still open. The best results are reported from this method of reaching intelligent believers and giving a new direction to their thoughts.

The Canadian Censorship.

From the Light of Truth (Spiritualist).

The not unexpected announcement that The Truth Seeker publications have been prohibited from the Canadian mails is the latest in the line of present persecutions. It appears that The Truth Seeker has been suppressed without notification or trial on its mailability by a Roman Catholic postmaster-general named Caron, who pronounces it "scurrilous" and "blasphemous," and from whose decision there is no appeal in the Canadian law. This is a tremendous power to place in the hands of one man who is amenable to nothing or anybody, and who cannot be reached by any legal process. Yet the Canadians have given this power to a Roman Catholic bigot and put him at the head of their post-office department. When a man can say officially that he "has no hesitation in deciding that on account of the character of its contents the paper ought to be excluded from the mails," as was said in the case of The Truth Seeker, and has the power to construe the terms "scurrilous" and "blasphemous" to suit his own opinion, the day of liberty for the press has set in a dishonorable oblivion. The Truth Seeker is a Freethought publication, and it is against Freethought that this suppression has been aimed. Any other publication of like character would suffer the same fate. As we understand it, no particular issue nor any article in it is condemned, but the whole publication is refused transmission in the Canadian mail.

The power to thus tyrannize over one publication implies the power to set up a sort of Index Expurgatorius over any other obnoxious paper, and we may soon look for the tentacles of the Canadian post-office octopus to be placed upon some Orange, American Protective Association, Methodist, or any political journal that advocates measures not congenial to the Romish hierarchy.

Mental liberty in Canada is a meaningless term. Protestant papers in Quebec are under the thumb and at the mercy of Cardinal Taschereau, who owns Postmaster-General Caron, while Catholic papers in Ontario truckle to a dominant Protestant regime, and between the two free thought and a free press have a sorry time of it.

But the question here brought forward is this: What shall be the nature of the protest against this persecution? Plutocracy and its crass churchianic annex have about strangled the freedom of the press on this continent. In this case there should be a vigorous movement set afoot at Washington to find out why it is that a Freethought paper published in this country is denied transmission through the mails of a country at peace with ours.

From Secular Thought.

The postmaster-general's disallowance of the Canadian mails to the New York Truth Seeker has called forth some comments, a few of which we reprint. No doubt the bulk of the papers are orthodox, and rejoice at the set-back given to Freethought. All the more honor, then, for those who speak out boldly for liberty.

Ingersoll's new lecture, "The Foundations of Faith," is for sale at the low price of twenty-five cents. Same style as his other recently issued pamphlets.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Nancy's Nightmare.

I am the doll that Nancy broke!
Hadn't been hers a week.
One little squeeze, and I sweetly spoke;
Rosy and fair was my cheek.
Now my head lies in a corner far,
My body lies here in the other;
And if this is what human children are,
I never will live with another!

I am the book that Nancy read
For fifteen minutes together;
Now I am standing here on my head,
While she's gone to look at the weather.
My leaves are crushed in the cruellest way,
There's jam on my opening page;
And I would not live with Miss Nancy Gay,
Though I shouldn't be read for an age!

I am the frock that Nancy wore
Last night at her birthday feast.
I am the frock that Nancy tore
In seventeen places at least.
My buttons are scattering far and near,
My trimming is torn to rags;
And if I were Miss Nancy's mother dear
I'd dress her in calico bags!

We are the words that Nancy said
When these things were brought to her view,
All of us ought to be painted red,
And some of us are not true.
We splutter and mutter and snarl and snap,
We smolder and smoke and blaze;
And if she'd not meet with some sad mishap,
Miss Nancy must mend her ways.

The Freethought Convention in New York.

"Tell us something about the convention," were the parting words of a friend of the Children's Corner, when we said good-bye at the pier in New York, bound homeward. But you will all read the report well told by others, and it would take too much time and space to go over the same ground in our little corner. But it was a glorious gathering of noble men and large-hearted women in Hardman Hall on the 25th, 26th, and 27th of October, and those who were unavoidably absent, for it is not to be conceived that a true Liberal would purposely stay away, missed much. The weather was superb, and the sun shone brightly every day. There was the best of good cheer and hearty greetings that made light, brightness, and warmth, indoors as well as out.

There is something in the grasp of a Freethinker's hand that is inspiring and health-giving—a cordiality and graciousness that does not come with any other sort of hand-clasp. The editor of the Corner was pleased to meet some very dear friends, some she had not seen in a long while, others she had known but met for the first time. The music was excellent, both vocal and instrumental, and it will be long ere the echoing notes of Mrs. Eugene Macdonald and the strains of the king of instruments in the hands of Mr. Kelly will cease to vibrate in our ears.

Among the very little folks present, like new plants springing up in the dew and sunshine of Freethought, were handsome Master Macdonald, son of the inimitable George and the mother who is all Grace, and pretty, bright-eyed Gertrude Gillen, and sweet baby Harman, who came all the way from the West to plead for human rights. There were other little ones present whose names were not learned. Daisy Wixon was not there, but she will come another time. Her grandpa and grandma Thorpe and aunt Hattie were on hand, distinguished by all the old-time earnestness and energy.

It was a representative congregation throughout, distinguished by high thought and noble resolve. There were brows on which was written intellectual development, eyes that sparkled and flashed with wit and wisdom, like sunbeams on the dimpled river.

There were no "old folks" at the Congress—that is, the Editor of the Corner didn't see any. People baptized in the waters of Liberty never grow old. The years run lightly over their heads, mingling here and there a silver thread with brown or black, and tracing delicate lines upon faces that are always like the morning, but they do not leave decrepitude or old age. So if you desire to be always young, keep in line with Liberal thought, move with the current of the times, that is ever tending toward a larger freedom of thought and speech.

Wakeman, solid as a rock and gentle as a child—can he ever grow old? No, not even if he were governor of New York, and he ought to be. Can Eliza Burnz, the Ingallses of Glenora, Dr. Wetmore, Henry M. Taber, whose roses, cosmos, smilax, and chrysanthemums adorned the rostrum at the hall and were a sweet and delicate offering to the recipients thereof—can such grow old and wither and perish? Never! Through their brave and blessed deeds they live in perpetual youth and become immortal.

S. P. Putnam was the presiding genius of the convention, bright, breezy, and thoughtful; aided by his handsome lieutenant, Franklin Steiner, he made everybody happy. Edward Dobson was one of the younger speakers, and carries truth to every listening ear. He is a correspondent of our Corner.

E. C. Walker, quiet, serious, and hard-working, made pleasant hours for every one. There was no need for anyone to be sick in the convention. If they were, coming into the genial presence of Dr. Foote, Sr., and Dr. "Ned," Jr., they would be cured by the pure personal atmosphere of these worthy and devoted followers of truth and progress. And Mrs. Foote is as lovely and charming as you can imagine. No wonder they are good who come within the range of her sweet influence. E. C. Reichwald and Henry Rowley, both intellectual men, resemble each other so much as sometimes to be mistaken one for the other. E. C. Chamberlain is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, pledged eternally to that which is in accordance with truth and right. It was good to see Washburn again on the platform, as vigorous against injustice as ever, and Daniel T. Ames, Mr. Oppenheimer, and the Bird who won't sing for the new woman; it was a pleasure to know they all are for liberty and truth. Mr. Macdonald, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, like one of scriptural mention, went about doing good, very quietly, but always effectively. Florence Johnson, graduate of the Emerson School of Oratory in Boston, made Hardman Hall ring many times during the Congress with stirring recitations. She has a deep, full, flexible voice, and, as an elocutionist, is well qualified to attract and entertain.

This running scribble should be brought to a close, and must be, with much still left unwritten. Too bad, but it must be so. Our home in the city was with the Broadbelt family up-town, in a most delightful locality, and with friends whom to know is to admire, esteem, and love. Bethia accompanied the editor of the Corner, and joins her in full expressions of appreciation of the hospitality that made our stay in the elegant home above mentioned a perpetual pleasure and delight. Mr. Broadbelt is a genius, a designer, inventor, and builder of homes; fearless and outspoken, a lover of humanity who has made his own way in the world, his career is still onward. The attractive row of houses, recently completed, is a credit and honor to his comprehensive mind. Dear Mrs. Broadbelt has a great heart in which to hold her many friends, and a winsome grace that charms and blesses every one. Geraldine and Portia are the lovely names of the lovely daughters of the household. They are distinguished by gentle manners, strong, good sense, and the wisdom to apply it, hence they are Freethinkers, from whom, one day, the world will hear.

"Beauty," the white cat, white as snow, goes daintily about the house, while "Guvvy," the intelligent dog, knows his own place at meal times, and other times as well. He is one of the family, and he knows it.—Ed. C. C.

Health and Happiness.

I.—INTRODUCTION.

The subject of health and how to maintain it is one in which all are interested. The problem is familiar to everybody, for the reason that the slightest deviation from the normal state of health invariably produces an unpleasant impression. No sooner are we made aware of the disagreeable presence than we hasten to do our utmost to remedy the evil, or seek for some one to remedy it for us. In ordinary disturbances, simple in character, Nature, the impartial nurse, the great healer of ills, comes to our aid and rectifies and re-establishes the lost equilibrium. This aid is conditional, however, on our implicit obedience to her laws, and will not be rendered unless in proportion to our intelligence we exercise discretion and judgment in our conduct. Animals are entirely dependent on Nature as a healer; and although they possess neither the intelligence nor the inventiv power of man, they seldom suffer from ailments due to violation of her laws, such as excesses or immoderate indulgences.

Not having actual knowledge, the ancients tried to explain abnormal bodily states or conditions (ill health) by methods which had no relation whatever, direct or indirect, to nature except as a total misconception of natural facts. Consequently the seeds of grave errors were planted in the minds, and these developed into supernatural wonders and miracles; and, to sustain them, faith and belief were necessary. Credulity, which is the result of ignorance, is a very important factor in producing superstition, imposition, and fraud. This in part accounts for belief in the many wonderful "faith cures" we hear of in modern times; but in this age of advancement in the medical sciences the general public ought no longer to be deluded and misled by the notions of our unenlightened forefathers. The state of our health does not in any sense rest on any imaginary supernatural interference, but on natural and well-regulated conduct in life.

In order to have a clear idea of the matter of health and of sickness (or derangement), we must first learn to regard the human body, like that of the lower animal, as nothing more than a living or vitalized machine. We must think of the various organs in the body as vital mechanical contrivances that are constantly in motion while the system is in a living state; and when any organ or one part of the machinery is impaired the whole structure suffers. The idea of supernatural interference of a religious kind, such as miracle, faith, etc., must be entirely dismissed from the mind.

Human happiness—our joys and pleasures—depends upon health; contentment depends upon sufficient nourishment, clothing, and shelter. To obtain the latter, we must exert ourselves and pursue some active occupation, physical or mental; in short, we must work. In other words, everyone is bound to struggle to preserve and protect the body against external and internal encroachments.

To establish and maintain the health is a very important task, and at the same time it is our imperative duty. If we wish to participate in the pleasures of life, to contemplate the beauties of nature, or look at the world and see it in its brightest aspect, the body must be in a state of health. When health is wanting, or the system is impaired, we are unfitted to perform our duty properly, nor are we able to concentrate our thoughts; mind and body are out of tune and out of harmony with nature.

Is there anything on earth we are so solicitous about as our own well being? How anxious is the mother for the health of her child; how pleased when it is well, smiling, and playful, and how sad, alarmed, and grieved when it is ailing, peevish, and sickly? Would it not be well for mother and child—indeed, for everyone—to know how to shun errors and mistakes in the art of living, so as to avoid trespassing on the laws of nature? These laws teach us not to overtask our physical abilities; not to overstrain the physiological functions by excess of food or drinks; not to overtax the organs of our appetites; to avoid exposure of our bodies to the inclemency of the elements; unnecessary expenditure of the life forces of the animal economy, etc.

The infant is the miniature man or woman. Raise a healthy infant, and you raise a healthy child, which in turn becomes a healthy citizen. The beginning of life is exclusively in the hands of the mother; she nourishes it, tenderly cares for it, nurses and clothes it, sees to its hygienic condition, watches over its growth and development. It presents the mirror of nature to her; when she holds up her own offspring she sees her own image reflected in that of her child. How carefully she examines the still undefined features of her babe to discover some resemblance, some parental likeness, some slight expression. This contributes by far the most interesting subject in the world to her; it is the topic of the hour, the anxiety of the time, the hope of the future, and all the wisdom she possesses, with no small amount of pride, is concentrated in the love, tenderness, and affection for her infant.

The next article will be the first of a series on the art of nursing and raising children. M.D.

Gems of Thought

MANY a bloody war has been fought merely to promote the political interests of a cowardly squad of ambitious demagogues.—Galveston News.

It will be a marvelous thing—the true personality of man—when we see it. It will grow naturally and simply, flower-like, or as a tree grows.—Anon.

KEEP as near the shrine of truth as you can. It is not always the most popular place to be, but it should be the place in all the universe most dear to you.—Progressive Age.

IF we guarded well the passes of private freedom, the by-ways of social and religious emancipation, the political forces as an immediate sequence would vanish for want of sustenance. Political tyranny is birthed in social intolerance.—Traubel.

WHETHER in parent or child, anger, however caused, and to whosoever directed, is detrimental. But anger in a parent towards a child, and a child towards a parent, is especially detrimental; because it weakens that bond of sympathy which is essential to beneficent control.—Herbert Spencer.

WE have lost many good things of Cervantes' and other writers because of the tribunal of religion and dulness. One Aonius Palearius was sensible of this, and said that 'the Inquisition was a poniard aimed at the throat of literature.' The image is striking, and the observation just; but the ingenious observer was in consequence immediately led to the stake.—I. D'Israeli.

IF you wish depth, genius, imagination, taste, reason, sensibility, philosophy, elevation, originality, nature, intellect, fancy, rectitude, facility, flexibility, precision, art, abundance, variety, fertility, warmth, magic, charm, grace, force, an eagle sweep of vision, vast understanding, instruction rich, tone excellent, urbanity, suavity, delicacy, correctness, purity, clearness, elquence, harmony, brilliancy, rapidity, gaiety, pathos, sublimity, and universality—perfection indeed—behold Voltaire.—Goethe.

ANOTHER discovery, also very recent, has enabled us to throw light on the prehistoric or forgotten past. We have found that much of it, thought to be long since dead, is still alive and in our midst, under forms easily recognized when our attention is directed to them. This branch of anthropology is known as Folklore. It investigates the stories, the superstitions, the beliefs and customs which prevail among the unlettered, the isolated, and the young; for these are nothing less than survivals of the mythologies, the legal usages, and the sacred rites of earlier generations. It is surprising to observe how much of the past we have been able to reconstruct from this humble and long neglected material.—Prof. D. G. Brinton.

It can, says Mr. Lecky, be no exaggeration to say that the church of Rome has inflicted a greater amount of unmerited suffering than any other religion that has ever existed among mankind. The Protestant church prosecuted to the full extent of her power; and, although the persecutions at her hands were never so sanguinary as those of the Catholic, the principle was affirmed quite as strongly, was acted on quite as constantly, and was defended quite as pertinaciously by the clergy. And the examples given by Mr. Lecky of the persecutions by Protestants in England, Germany, Holland, Ireland, Scotland, France, Sweden, and America, and the fact that persecution was advocated or practiced by Luther, Calvin, Beza, Jurien, Knox, Cranmer, Melancthon, and other lights of the Protestant church, prove that the spirit of intolerance of unbelief and heresy was quite as bitter with them as with the Catholics.—Literary Guide, Supplement.

No less fruitful [than the researches in Assyria] have been modern researches in Egypt. While, on one hand, they have revealed a very considerable number of geographical and archaeological facts proving the good faith of the narratives entering into the books attributed to Moses, and have thus made our early sacred literature all the more valuable, they have at the same time revealed the limitations of the sacred authors and compilers. They have brought to light facts utterly disproving the sacred Hebrew date of creation and the main framework of the early biblical chronology; they have shown the suggestive correspondence between the ten antediluvian patriarchs in Genesis and the ten early dynasties of the Egyptian gods, and have placed by the side of these the ten antediluvian kings of Chaldean tradition, the ten heroes of Armenia, the ten primeval kings of Persian sacred tradition, the ten "fathers" of Hindu sacred tradition, and multitudes of other tens, throwing much light on the manner in which the sacred chronicles of ancient nations were generally developed.—Prof. Andrew D. White in Popular Science Monthly.

"COULDN'T your husband be induced to try the faith cure?" "I think he could. He's tried dozens of things he didn't believe in."—Vogue.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHER: "What is faith?" Small Boy: "Takin' an umbrella to church when the minister's goin' ter pray for rain."—Truth.

DICK: "I say, Bob, what's Pantheism? Heard it mentioned in church." Bob: "Don't know. Sounds like Darwin. Religion for panthers, probably."

JONES: "I ate a piece of mince pie for breakfast last Sunday morning." Brown: "Well, what of it?" "I had terrible dreams at church."—Town Topics.

"I DON'T see much difference between your sacred concert programs and your secular concert programs." "The sacred concerts are given on Sunday."—Life.

MOTHER: "I don't know what in the world to do with my son. He is a born rover." Neighbor: "Why not make a Methodist minister of him?"—New York Weekly.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHER: "You knew your lesson perfectly this time, Tommy." Tommy: "Yes'm. Pa said he'd let me go fishing this afternoon if I didn't miss any of it."—Life.

MRS. WATTS: "Why were you not at the church Thursday night?" Mrs. Potts: "I was out of the city. What was going on?" Mrs. Watts: "We celebrated the silver anniversary of the boy evangelist's work in the missionary field. Oh, we had a lovely time."—Indianapolis Journal.

A PORTUGUESE artificer who was suspected of Freethinking was at the point of death. A Jesuit who came to confess him, holding a crucifix before his eyes, said: "Behold the god whom you have so much offended; do you recollect him now?" "Alas! yes, father," replied the dying man; "it was I who made him."—Argonaut.

GRANT ALLEN relates that he was sitting one day under the shade of the Sphinx, turning for some petty point of detail to his Baedeker's guide-book. A sheik looked at him sadly and shook his head. "Murray good," he said in a solemn voice of warning: "Baedeker no good. What for you use Baedeker?" "No, no; Baedeker is best," answered Mr. Allen. "Why do you object to Baedeker?" The sheik crossed his hands and looked down on him with the pitying eyes of Islam. "Baedeker bad book," he repeated; "Murray very good. Murray say, 'Giv the sheik half a crown'; Baedeker say, 'Giv the sheik a shilling.'"—Frank Harrison's Family Magazine.

ON WHEELS.

One parson says a multitude—
E'en leaving out the ladies—
Upon their bicycles, to-day,
Are steering straight for hades.

Another vows he's visions had Much more to mortal liking,
Wherein he saw on heaven's gold streets,
The blessed angels biking.

Their wheels, we're told, were gilded, too,
To match the heavenly highways;
And pretty saints in bloomers sped
Along the gleaming byways.

Thus, parsons tho' they're prejudiced,
Betwixt 'em make us feel now
Whoever way a body's bound
He "gets there" on a wheel now.

Male cyclists still may take short cuts
To shoel thro' Chicago,
Tho' biking saints in bloomers there
Are under an embargo!

—M. N. B.

SOME little time ago the minister from Scarborough, Me., exchanged pulpits with the minister from Sacarappa, in the same state. When the Sacarappa minister arrived at Scarborough he was met by a deacon, who said to him: "Mr. Jones, I do hope to-day that in your prayer you will make an especial effort for rain. Our crops are being destroyed, and I can see nothing but desolation here." So when the minister was about making his petition, he said, "O Lord! I pray the that thou wouldst send copious rains upon the soil of Scarborough, that it may bring forth a bountiful harvest, and that the people will be made glad, and, O Lord! they will bless you for it. I desire, O Lord, to state that I make this petition in the name of the good people of Scarborough, for O Lord, I know that thou, in thy divine wisdom, wilt say it is not rain that the soil of Scarborough needs. It is more top dressing."—Boston Budget.

THE Lincoln monument at Springfield, Ill., is a ruin, and Governor Altgeld and the other trustees favor its being torn down and a substantial one erected in its stead. Apparently of solid granite, it is in reality a rickety structure of brick, veneered with granite slabs. It cost over $200,000.

HERMAN W. MUDGETT, alias H. H. Holmes, was found guilty of murder in the first degree for the killing of Benj. F. Pitzel. The jury (Philadelphia) took but one ballot. At the trial in Berlin of the editors of the Vorwaerts and Volksblatt for having attacked the emperor, the presiding judge explained the charge of lese majeste on the ground that in view of the inviolability of the emperor nobody has a right to say anything against him. HENRY GEORGE was announced to speak on the Single Tax at Wilmington, Del., last Sunday. The city attorney held that the address would be a profanation of the Sabbath and in violation of Delaware law. It was finally arranged that the police should attend the meeting and use their judgment as to whether or not Mr. George in his address departed from the ethics of his subject and descended to politics. These infallibilities decided that the address was all right.

SENATOR TILLMAN has won his fight in the South Carolina Constitutional Convention—the clause of the new constitution disfranchising illiterate Negroes while leaving a loophole for the admission of illiterate whites was adopted by a vote of 69 to 37. It was declared during the debate that it was all nonsense to talk about this provision giving the whites a majority—the Negroes were learning, and hence to think of depending on a "fair vote" was suicidal for the whites.

In the South Carolina Constitutional Convention woman suffrage was voted down, 121 to 26. Senator Tillman favored it, with a property qualification, as the best means of maintaining white supremacy, and Ex-Senator Sligh asked: "Which would you sooner have, white supremacy maintained by the votes of white women or white supremacy maintained by the musket? There is no other alternative." Mr. Miller, a Negro delegate, appealed for universal suffrage for men and women.

By R. WHEELER.
This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

A CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR—MORAL INFLUENCE OF CHRISTIANITY.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, ; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

SPECIMEN PRESS NOTICES.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

Send us a new subscriber and get the book free of all expense to you. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us $3 and get the book and the paper for one year.

Darwin and After Darwin

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professional naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers: "Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. A Curious Confession.

"The postmaster-general of Canada has prohibited transmission by mail, in Canada, of a Freethinker's paper issued in this city, on the ground that it is a scurrilous and blasphemous publication. Authority to do this is conferred on the postmaster-general by the Canadian post-office act. The editor and manager of the prohibited journal has sent to the newspapers of the country a circular in which he begs them to come to his aid. 'We appeal,' he cries, 'to the editors of the country, to public opinion, as the only tribunal which can rebuke such acts. Where is the freedom of the press on this continent? Where has our boasted religious liberty gone, when a Freethinker is denied the right to put his thoughts into the mails of a country supposedly at peace with ours?' It is not necessary to examine this man's paper very closely to ascertain that the postmaster-general of Canada was fully justified in preventing its transmission in Canada. Everything a Christian holds sacred is reviled in its columns."—New York Catholic News.

The gist of all this is that an official is justified in suppressing publications that Christians do not like. It is a curious confession, after all. The TRUTH SEEKER is said to revile "everything a Christian holds sacred." Suppose we analyze this statement a moment; it is probable that we shall be surprised to see so many things that the ordinary mortal respects but which the Christian does not. For instance, this paper has never "reviled" the truth; it has always searched for it; it has never proclaimed the demoralizing doctrine that it is better to keep on the "safe side" by pretending to believe when the mind could not really render assent. This paper has not "reviled" science; it has said that men should search everywhere for knowledge and apply it for their own and their fellows' benefit. This paper has not reviled justice; it has always demanded that all the inhabitants of the country have equal opportunities under the laws, and speedy and fair trials when accused of crime. This paper has not reviled mercy; it has ever taught that we are all the children of heredity and environment, and that therefore punishments should not be vindictive and cruel, but corrective and protective only, and no greater than will secure the ends sought, especially protection. This paper has not reviled liberty; it has strenuously insisted that persecution for opinion's sake is unwise, unjust, and atrocious. This paper has not reviled the principle that human life is sacred; it has insisted that life is to be taken only under the severest stress of self-defense. These are a few of the differences between

THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Christian, if the Catholic News is to be believed when it says that we revile "everything that the Christian holds sacred." As THE TRUTH SEEKER does not revile truth, nor science, nor justice, nor liberty, nor mercy, nor human life, it is clear that the Christian does not hold any of these sacred, if it be true, as asserted, that we revile everything that he does hold sacred. If the Catholic News is satisfied with the logical conclusion from its own premises we assuredly have no complaint to make.

The Election and the Sunday Law.

At the election on the 5th inst., New York city reversed the overwhelming rebuke which it last year administered to Tammany Hall and elected all of that organization's judicial and county candidates by large majorities. On the other hand, the up-state districts overcame the Democratic majority below the Bronx and gave the Republican state ticket a majority of about 90,000, while securing both branches of the legislature by a large preponderance.

What are the lessons of these results, and what is the prospect for a free Sunday in the city and state?

It is certain that the people of the city who last year voted for reform and this year for Tammany were under no delusions when they this year cast their ballots for the old corrupt organization. They did not expect to secure through Tammany a repeal of the Sunday law, nor did they believe that the tiger had changed its stripes. Their one purpose was to show the powers that be that they are opposed to a Puritan Sunday. The World—which is antagonistic to Sabbatarian legislation but worked for the fusion ticket and against Tammany—says that these voters were foolish, that they should have supported fusion if they wanted to secure a modification of the odious Sunday statutes. There is no evidence whatever in support of this proposition. Not one faction of the fusionists dared to demand anything that an honest friend of Sunday freedom could accept; nothing that was bottomed on a fundamental principle of equal freedom. The same was true of Tammany and the other organizations. But, on the other hand, the chief element of the fusionists—the Republicans—were pledged to the "maintenance" of the Sabbath in "the interest of labor and morality." It was certain that, whatever the result in this city, that party, if successful in the other parts of the state, would prevent any change in the blue laws. Had the independent people who last year voted against Tammany not been so distrustful of that organization its majority this year would have been doubled. But tens of thousands of anti-Sabbatarian voters preferred remaining away from the polls, or taking the slim chance of the fusionists doing something for Sunday liberty, to again giving direct help to Tammany Hall.

The election fight is over. In the state the Sunday worshippers are in the saddle. In this city Tammany has some offices, and it is seen that the inhabitants of this town would have brought it back to full power, if they could, rather than endure the rule of the Puritans. That is, as badly as Tammany is hated for its many offenses, the people of New York city prefer being ruled and robbed by it to submitting to the tyranny of the Puritans. That is one lesson of the election. The other is that the pagans are for Sunday laws and the inhabitants of the metropolis are opposed to them, at least in the form they have at present. While here the voters will take Croker in preference to Roosevelt, the country districts pile up an enormous majority in favor of the proposition that it is expedient and just to enforce in the city a law that is so distasteful to the large majority of its citizens that they are willing to again enthrone Tammany as a protest against that law and its enforcement.

Mr. Roosevelt announces that he shall enforce the Sunday law more rigorously than ever, if possible, and this in the face of the demonstrated fact that the people of the city do not want the statute. Mr. Warner Miller, who secured the insertion of the Sunday law maintenance plank in the Republican platform, declares that the result of the election in the state shows that the majority of the voters favor the legal maintenance of the "American Sunday," and it is probable that he is right. Last year his party made Sunday shaving and hair-cutting—perfectly innocent acts in themselves—crimes on Sunday, and not an opposing party in the state dared take issue with it. Therefore we may reasonably anticipate that the incoming legislature will increase rather than relax the stringency of the Sunday statutes.

In view of all these facts, it becomes Freethinkers and all other friends of the free Sunday to seriously face the probability that 1896 will repeat 1894 and 1895 and that at its close we shall find ourselves possessing still less freedom of action on the first day of the week, and that this will be true not only in New York but in many other states as well. The tide of retrogression is still flowing heavily, and it will take years of the hardest kind of hard work before we can have the satisfaction of seeing it on the ebb. The work of education that lies at our hands is altogether too great for our slender resources, but we cherish the hope that the masses of Liberal people will soon get their eyes open to the fact that there is really a serious struggle before them, and that that conflict is one to the death between the hordes of reaction and the forces of progression.

Some Queer Propositions.

A friend of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Mr. Harry Shaw, of Portland, Maine, had a discussion on religion with his employer, and the latter gentleman submitted in writing, under the head of "Science and Reason," eight propositions which he wished Mr. Shaw to send to Colonel Ingersoll or THE TRUTH SEEKER for consideration and answer. Our subscriber forwarded them to us and we now take them up in their regular order:

"I.—As far back as science and the human mind can trace, we find matter in a gaseous state, without life, motion, form, or light, and such all sciences acknowledge to be the beginning of the universe."

There are several errors in this statement. In the first place, there is not perfect unanimity among scientific men with respect to the nebular hypothesis; the aggregation theory of the formation of suns and planets has some adherents whose reasoning on the subject deserves respectful consideration. In the second place, it is not conceded that there was ever a time in the history of the cosmos when motion was absent. To the scientific mind, the proposition is unthinkable. In the third place, science postulates atoms as the primary components of all kinds of matter, and it is impossible to conceive of a division of substance, however minute, that has no form. In the fourth place, science has nothing to affirm in regard to "the beginning of the universe." No human mind can conceive of the "beginning" of the cosmos, as a whole. The scientific mind recognizes that all forms of matter, from molecules to suns, are subject to the law of growth and its complement, decay, or, rather, that all forms of matter grow and decay, and the observed sequence of this growth and decay we name law. But of the absolute "beginning" of the elements of which the universe is composed scientific men know nothing and affirm nothing.

"II.—The advent of life cannot be traced to this condition, and in no subsequent time can it be found that this dead matter ever generated living things."

While it might be admitted that the initial transformation of non-living into living matter has not been observed, it is a phenomenon of universal observation that living matter is nourished by so-called non-living matter, and that life has never been found dissociated from matter. Matter is here and life is here, and it is the first that manifests the latter. It is not a violent assumption to say that life is the natural manifestation of matter under certain conditions and forms. The alternative is the assumption of the injection of life into the matter of the universe, at some period, from outside the universe. But is there any outside to the universe? Can we conceive of a limit to the universe? If we can, what is beyond that limit? Is it life? If it is, how could we cognize it independently of the matter with which we have always found it associated in the universe?

"III.—As far as the best knowledge goes, life in the universe must have had a cause other than dead matter."

But it will not help us out of the dilemma to assume said cause. If the universe is inadequate to produce the phenomenon of life, how are we to account for the existence of the extra-cosmical cause of life which we have invented to supply the deficiency? It must, logically, require a still greater cause, and so on in an ever-augmenting ratio and an infinitesimal series. On the other hand, what warrant have we to assume that any matter is really "dead"? It would much puzzle the inquirer to find any matter that did not possess and manifest certain qualities, and he might discover that he had undertaken quite a task if he should attempt to show the dividing line between such a manifestation of those qualities as is exhibited by chemical affinity and that displayed by what is called organic growth.

"IV.—Life alone begets life, therefore there must have been life outside of the universe of dead matter, since every effect must have an adequate cause, and life in the universe had a beginning."

This covers substantially the same ground as II. and III., and the answer to them applies to this. There are the same assumptions that the matter of the universe is inherently lifeless, that there are limits to infinity, and that to posit a greater mystery to account for the mystery of life in the universe settles the question at issue between the teleologist and the naturalist. In addition, the previously-stated fallacy is given a new form in the assertion that "life in the universe had a beginning." But did it? Until we know exactly what life is, it is very rash to say that there was a time when this infinitesimal cosmos was utterly lifeless, when the ultimate atoms of which it is now composed and their aggregations did not in their relations with each other produce any manifestations of life whatsoever. To us it is more reasonable to hold that there was always life in the universe which is now permeated with it than to hold that life was at some date injected into a previously dead infinity by an "uncaused cause" lying outside of that infinity, the conception of two infinities or of one infinity and of something outside of it being in itself impossible to a sane mind.

"V.—All transformations are the effects of adequate causes, and since there cannot be an effect before a cause, therefore the first effect must have had an uncaused first cause."

All causes, so far as our observation goes, are themselves the effects of previous causes; we have never seen a first cause or an uncaused cause. It was invented by teleologists to help them out of their difficulties, which, it is needless to say, it did not do. We have already shown the fallaciousness of the idea in our remarks concerning an alleged extra-cosmical origination of life. As "all transformations are the effects of adequate causes," what were the adequate causes that transformed something else into the alleged "first cause"? "Nothing from nothing comes," and the difference between the teleologist and the naturalist is this: The naturalist accepts the universe as uncreated; he admits that he knows nothing of first causes or of last effects, and hence that he can examine only secondary causes and effects. The teleologist, on the contrary, refuses to accept the universe as uncreated, and insists that he knows the first cause, and that this first cause is an uncreated God, whose intentions he deems himself capable of making known to the human race. The naturalist deals with the tangible universe of which he is a part and of which he knows a little. The teleologist assumes to interpret the will of an intangible God of whom he knows nothing.

"VI.—The uncaused first cause must be greater than all effects."

As an "uncaused cause" is incomprehensible as a conception, we need say no more here than to refer the reader to what has preceded this. But it may be worth while to point out that when discussing causes we are apt to confuse magnitude and adequacy. A man is driving a span of horses attached to a heavily loaded wagon; just as the top of a hill is reached a hornet stings one of the horses and a runaway is the result. The frightened animals dash down the hill and when they reach the foot and start across the railway track an express train crashes into the wagon and is wrecked. Fifty passengers and employees are killed and twice as many mangled. In this case was the cause greater than the effect? The hornet was an initial force and was adequate, but it is an abuse of language to call it greater than the effects.

"VII.—The effects of the first cause furnish us with UNMISTAKABLE exhibitions of designs and plans."

All the small capitals we have used in these quotations were first employed by the Theistic objector.

If the last quoted affirmation is true, and if our critic was right in his previous averments, it is well to inquire why the designer created a universe wherein there was no sign of life for uncounted ages. And what of the goodness or wisdom of a designer who so prodigally wastes life in the effort to create immortal souls? Whatever design may be discovered in the operations of natural forces, it certainly does not manifest the best use of means to accomplish results. If we are to be permitted to use our reasoning faculties in determining whether or not there is evidence of design in nature, it follows that we must use those faculties according to the laws of their own development and manifestation. In other words, we will reach such conclusions as the facts that come under our observation appear to us to warrant. If, then, we can see no design in nature, who is responsible for our failure? The "uncaused first cause," we are told, designed all things, including our reasoning faculties. It seems a queer evidence of design for the brain of man to deny that it was designed. Did the first cause design that some of us should be unable to see evidences of design and thus be precipitated into hell?

There is another point of view that should not escape the attention of the believers in an intelligent designer. Designs, plans, are "unmistakable exhibitions" of weakness; they prove that the designer, the planner, was only a designer, a planner. Men have to design and plan because they are limited in power and wisdom. When you claim that your God designs, that he plans, you in effect say that he is limited in wisdom and power, which an infinitesimal, all-powerful being cannot be. This leads right into another and related absurdity, for it is preposterous to speak of infinity as a being. To be a being is to be limited, and infinity cannot be limited. But you must have a limited existence if you are to have a designer, a planner. So if the "effects of the first cause furnish us with unmistakable exhibitions of designs and plans," it proves that that first cause is lacking in wisdom or power or both—is, in short, a finite being.

In the universe we see evidences of growth, of adaptation, but it is only in the work of man and some of the more highly organized animals and insects that we perceive what we call design, and so we give to the operations of nature the name we bestow upon our own and related manifestations of intellect. But there is a wide difference between growth and making. Our bodies grow; we make wagons.

"VIII. The entire universe did not come about by chance, is not run by chance; hence must have a supreme mind back of and through it."

As we are unable to conceive of a time when the universe, in some form, did not exist, we are ready to agree that it no more came "about by chance" than it was designed by an "uncaused cause." There is no evidence that it "came about" at all; so far as we know, it always was. Modern science knows no such accident as "chance"; neither does it admit that the universe is at the mercy of the caprice of a man-like law-giver residing somewhere outside of it. It contains within itself all the powers that it manifests. It is, it does, and that is all that we know about it. We are parts of it and we cannot transcend our environment. We see that causes produce effects and so we formulate the "law" that like causes produce like effects. The law is subjectiv; the facts to which it refers are objectiv—objectiv to others even when subjectiv to a certain thinker.

If we are so illogical as to posit a supreme mind which ordains all that comes to pass in the universe we at once find ourselves in a labyrinth of ethical contradictions. We find ourselves treating our fellows as criminals for doing, by retail, acts that the "supreme mind" is constantly doing by wholesale. In other words, we in effect hold that the "supreme mind" teaches us that it is wrong for our fellows to do exactly what it designed that they should do and what it is itself doing all the time on a scale immeasurably greater than it would be possible for the entire race combined to compass.

"The Never-Ending Audacity of Elected Persons."

The president's unconstitutional thanksgiving proclamation this year is more than usually unctuously pious. It might easily have been written by Rev. Father Lambert or Rev. Dr. McAllister. It is a disgrace to the president as a man and to the office he holds. He is the executive of the whole nation and as such he is neither Christian nor Infidel, and hence should be, as an official, absolutely silent on the subject of religion. Instead of being so, he seemingly takes particular pains to obtrude his personal belief in Theism and in divine providence upon the dissenting citizens of the country. He starts out with the assertion that "the constant goodness and forbearance of Almighty God which has been vouchsafed to the American people" in the last year "call for their sincere acknowledgment and devout gratitude." Even if that were strictly true, it is not a matter for official proclamation and enjoining, but for personal recognition and spontaneous individual rendering. But of what portion of the American people is it true? Is it true of the maimed victims of fires and railway and steamship accidents, and of the sorrowing relatives of the dead? Is it true of those whose homes are in the drouth-stricken or the flood-swept districts? Is it true of the sufferers from the actions of murderers and burglars and swindlers and legislative and municipal looters? It is so easy for us to be cheerful and thankful under the afflictions of others!

"To the end, therefore, that we may with thankful hearts unite in extolling the loving care of our Heavenly Father, I, Grover Cleveland, president of the United States, do hereby appoint and set apart Thursday, the 28th day of the present month of November, as a day of thanksgiving and prayer, to be kept and observed by all our people."

Imagine a man dying by inches from cancer or gangrene "extolling the loving care of our Heavenly Father"! Would the meanest of earthly fathers knowingly fasten in the flesh of his child the roots of cancer or plant therein the germs of gangrene? How loving was the care of this ghost for the sailors who last winter clung for days to the icy masts of their vessels stranded and storm-driven on the Long Island shore, and slowly stiffened and fell at last into the waters raging below! Ah! Grover Cleveland, you talk as your masters, the priestly medicine men, talk, without wisdom, without truth, in cruel and hollow mockery of the groans of the agonized and the stony and despairing grief of the bereaved.

Is this thanksgiving pronouncement a recommendation or a command? It sounds much more like the latter than the former. "I . . . do hereby appoint and set apart Thursday . . . as a day of thanksgiving and prayer, to be kept and observed by all our people." That is an order, and nothing less. It does not suggest, it demands, it decrees. It is not advisory, but mandatory. It is certainly altogether too bad for a political official to even suggest in a state paper the propriety of performing a religious act, but when his tone and words are those of a czar commanding his subjects to pray to the national deity the usurpation has become simply intolerable, and every defender of civil and religious liberty owes it to his own self-respect and to the cause he loves to openly and conspicuously perform his usual labors on the day selected for the adoration of the ghosts and to set the zeal of effacement on the individuality of the citizen. If we tamely submit, without protest by example, as well as by utterance, it will not be long before the thanksgiving proclamations of our emperors and the satraps of the provinces are commands in fact as President Cleveland's is this year a command in form and manner.

"On that day let us forego our usual occupations, and in our accustomed places of worship join in rendering thanks to the giver of every good and perfect gift for the bounteous returns that have rewarded our labors in the fields and in the busy marts of trade, for the peace and order that have prevailed throughout the land, and for our protection from pestilence and dire calamity, and for the other blessings that have been showered upon us from His open hand. And with our thanksgiving let us humbly beseech the Lord to so incline the hearts of our people unto him that he will not leave us nor forsake us as a nation, but will continue to use his mercy and protecting care, guiding us in the path of national prosperity and happiness, enduing us with rectitude and virtue, and keeping alive within us a patriotic love for the free institutions which have been given us as our natural heritage."

"On that day let us forego our usual occupations." We take it that we may be pardoned for assuming, Mr. President, that you will on that day forego your usual occupation of slaughtering and mangling for "fun" the birds which "the giver of every good and perfect gift" endowed with life and the capacity to suffer, according to your creed. No doubt they would be glad if you would keep every day of the year as a Sabbath or a time of thanksgiving. Then those inoffensive creatures would indeed have something for which to be thankful.

"In our accustomed places of worship"? Perhaps President Cleveland is not aware that there are many thousands of the people of this country who have no "accustomed places of worship"; who are so poor that they cannot possibly dress in a way that will open to them the doors of our fashionable churches. And perhaps he is also not aware that there are many others who never enter a church from the beginning to the end of the year because they have no belief in the doctrines preached there, and no patience with the tyrannous methods of those who patronize these untaxed temples of superstition. At all events, he tells us that this day of thanksgiving and prayer is "to be kept and observed by all the people." Between those who cannot and those who will not do as he so imperiously recommends, there are multitudes who will disregard or defy his illegal proclamation. It might contribute to the enlightenment of the nations if some one could induce him to frankly answer this question: Where do you, as the civil executive officer of the United States, get your authority to officially perform a religious function and officially recognize a particular religion as divine and true?

Our political high priest is discreetly silent regarding those whose "labors in the fields and the busy marts of trade" have not been rewarded with "bounteous returns," although he implies that they should be equally thankful with the more fortunate ones. We are slightly curious to know how he would have phrased his unconstitutional platitudes if the crops had generally been a failure. And yet his words are just as much a mockery to the ones who lost their season's labors as they would be if the sufferers were double their present number. "Our" protection from "dire calamity" will not call to life those who were not so protected, as, for instance, the hundreds who went down with the prow-pierced Elbe, or those who only the other day were torn to pieces or burned into unrecognizable cinders in the Detroit Journal building. To these, and to many more, "His" was not the "open hand" of benefaction but the clenched fist of malevolent destruction.

If "the Lord" will induce the people to incline their hearts to him he will feel so good that he will not "leave us nor forsake us as a nation"! That style of composition would make a primary school-boy very proud. It is the same as saying that if Williams can induce Robinson to like Williams, Williams will be good to Robinson. It all depends upon Williams whether or not Robinson can like him, but if Williams does not make Robinson like him he, Williams, will incontinently kick Robinson out for not liking him.

It appears to be necessary to inform Mr. Cleveland that no one, not even a god, can endue another with wisdom and virtue. We may have wisdom and virtue, but we cannot be "obsessed" thereby. We cannot put them on and take them off as we would an overcoat or a hat, and neither can another do that for us. As for the "free institutions which have been given us for our natural heritage," we question whether that which is given to us can properly be said to be a natural heritage. If anything comes to us through nature we have a prescriptive right to it and no extraneous power can give it to us. But our institutions we inherited from our forefathers, who won them from priest and king. Therefore they are a political, not a natural inheritance. But they are rapidly losing their free attributes through the scheming of priests and other enemies of liberty, not excepting presidents who violate their pledge of office by preaching sermons in proclamations and otherwise trampling the Constitution, which guarantees absolute religious freedom, under their feet.

"With Voltairean inconsistency, THE TRUTH SEEKER, while caricaturing Christianity in its low, ribald fashion, talks about 'the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-five.'"—Catholic Union and Times.

Father Cronin doesn't stick to the record. THE TRUTH SEEKER never uses the expression "the year of our Lord" except in quotation marks or in a satirical vein when referring to some particularly atrocious example of "Christian morality" or to some more than usually marvelous exhibition of superstition. In our business relations it is convenient to use the date in which "Christian nations" express the passage of time, just as Father Cronin would find it convenient if not imperative to use the date in common use in China, Siam, or other non-Christian countries, if he lived there. In neither case does or would such deferring to local custom imply an admission of the alleged divine origin of either of the dominant religions.

It isn't a great way from now to the sun festival known as Christmas—an adaptation of pagan rites to Christian necessities—and those who intend to follow the pretty custom of making presents to their friends on that occasion will find on another page of this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER a list of books suitable for that purpose. If our friends desire we can hold the books till a few days before the festival and mail or express them so that they will reach the destination at the right time. A present that we would recommend is to send to your Liberal friend who does not now take it, a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER a year for $3, which carries with it a copy of the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" in boards. For $3.50 we will send cloth bound book, with gilt side stamp—a handsome present indeed, with the added attraction of a weekly remembrance from yourself to your friend in the shape of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Such a present will do you good, your friend good, and us good—a combination of goodness which seems hard to resist.

Some time since a meteor flashed across the sky at Nocona, Texas. According to the veracious chroniclers, the stream of fire which it left in its wake at first assumed the shape of a capital S, then changed to J, and then to C. At that time a revival was in progress at Nacona and Rev. Mr. Humphreys, who saw the phenomenon, interpreted it as a sign of the second coming of Christ, and we are told that the revival was continued in order to give him an opportunity to materialize. It is not surprising that it is in Texas where Christian mobs burn criminals to death at slow fires, a la John Calvin. Ignorance and superstition are naturally associated with extreme cruelty and utterly unscientific methods of dealing with social offenders. The recent torturing and burning to death of a murderer at Tyler were witnessed by 7,000 people, including very many women and children. The revengeful Christians who thus interpreted their "master's" command to recompense evil with good and to turn the left cheek when smitten upon the right, were too ignorant of the force of example and the principle of heredity to realize that what they were doing was the most forcible of object lessons in crime, and that they were planting in the minds of young children, born and unborn, a thirst for blood and a disregard of human suffering that will be sure to produce in the future tenfold more crime than the awful death of the murderer will prevent. It would seem that even very stupid people could see how terribly demoralizing such exhibitions are, but in communities so Christian that mobs break down stockades and drive away guards that they may get into a prohibited inclosure to see a legal hanging, acquaintance with scientific facts must be wholly wanting. In comparison with such dense ignorance, stupidity is superlatively intellectuality.

That the coincident observance of a Sabbath by one part of the people and the pursuit of their regular labors by another part is not necessarily productive of "disturbance" or preventive of the opportunity to rest is demonstrated in the city of Westerly, situated on the boundary line of Rhode Island and Connecticut. The railway station and post-office are on the Rhode Island side of the line, and the public library on the Connecticut side. But the most distinctive feature of Westerly is its two-Sabbath week. We will let the New York Herald describe the situation:

"Many of its people are Seventh-Day Baptists. One of the largest churches in the town has a congregation whose members observe Saturday quite as sacredly as their Christian neighbors keep the following day. Their stores and factories are closed at six o'clock on Friday evening, and business is resumed again on Sunday morning. One of Westerly's daily evening papers is published on Sunday, but its presses are religiously silent on Saturday. To the stranger the strangely contrasted scenes of Saturday and Sunday are surprising. Church bells ring, the organs peal, and congregations assemble, while on all sides is heard the hum of busy commercial industry. The best of feeling, however, prevails among the religious denominations."

What a pity it is that all over the country there cannot be the same harmony in diversity! There could be easily enough were it not for bigotry and intolerance, for it is not reasonable to suppose that human nature at Westerly is materially different from human nature at other places. The secret of the anomalous state of affairs in Westerly is division of opinion with its consequent division of power. The lesson is that liberty is dependent upon the schisms among Christians. A speaker at the late Congress in New York said that it would be a good thing if all Protestant churches in a town would combine into one organization. By a parity of reasoning, it would be a good thing if the thus reorganized Protestants would then combine with the Catholics. As a grave matter of fact, nothing would be more disastrous to Freethought and progress generally. But to return to the Sunday question: Paste this item about the two Sabbaths at Westerly in your scrapbooks; it will be very useful to refer to when Sunday worshipers tell you that freedom on Sunday is incompatible with order and would make slaves of the wage-workers.

COLONEL INGERSOLL delivered his new lecture, "Foundations of Faith," to an immense audience in the Star theater, New York last Sunday night. In discussing the Sunday question, he alluded to the recent election, in which the Sabbatarians were beaten, and said, "Republican, as I am, I am glad they failed. I am delighted over their defeat." Bad laws, he added, should be repealed, not enforced; and if a bad law could not be repealed, it should be ignored.

The Old Story in Plain English, with Notes and Comments.

IV.

If a man put his hand into boiling water to-day whether a saint or a devil, we say that he will be scalded, God or no God. There is a physiological law which men must observe or suffer the consequences. If a saint and a sinner engage in combat, the best muscle and greater dexterity will win, and God will not interfere, nor does he care a rush whether justice triumphs or not.

This is rank heresy, but if we ever get out of the mire of superstition, it will be through natural law, truth, and reason. But against these Christianity has ever waged a relentless war. Mention the rise and growth of any science in modern times that Christianity has not opposed; mention any great scientist that Christianity has not persecuted or killed. As a consequence, as Christianity obtained sway over the minds of men, science declined and ignorance and crime increased. As civilization has advanced Christianity has declined, and ignorance and crime have been abated.

We can never make rapid advances toward a higher civilization until the minds of the people are lifted above the clouds of superstition. And the first step in that direction is to eradicate the idea that there is a God who is directing the affairs of men. God never protects the feeble. The cunning and the powerful always triumph, without regard to what is right or just.

If a man be thrown overboard in the middle of the Atlantic, he will drown. God will pay no more attention to him than he would to a porpoise, for the good reason that there is no God. Oh, how this statement will wring the heart of a Christian. You might as well take away the clay god of a Dyak. The Dyak thinks his clay god will help him out of innumerable troubles. In this respect the Christian and the Dyak are on the same level. Both are mistaken. All the evidence which could be brought to prove the existence of a God would not give a man a judgment in a court of justice for a peck of bran.

The next step is to break down the reverence for the old book of fables; to teach the people that a god had nothing to do in writing the account of creation as recorded in the book of Genesis; that the idea of making people out of dirt and human ribs is too childish to be entertained by men of rational thought; that the snake story and fish story—the flood story, and all about Samson and Samuel, and the three Hebrew children, and the great bear story, and the uphill journey of Elijah—are mere trash with which God had no more to do than he had with writing Hudibras.

We have seen that just in proportion as these nonsensical stories and the idea of an overruling providence controlled the minds of men, they were jealous, cruel, and intolerant; that there was a strange relation between crime and injustice and a belief in these foolish stories and a God who took cognizance of the affairs of man. It may be broadly stated that those who live the most blameless lives are those who have outgrown these superstitions.

In the times alluded to we have seen that the people verily believed that God directly managed the affairs of men, and that he would not suffer any injustice to be done, and that he would protect the innocent and punish the guilty. We now see how those acting under this hallucination tortured each other, and condemned the innocent to the most cruel punishments, and acquitted those who were guilty of the most inhuman crimes ever entered upon the calendar.

In nearly all of these barbaric proceedings ecclesiastics were either exempt or had favors shown them, so that they generally escaped trial or conviction.

O ye misguided men and women, learn from these lessons that there is no God who pays any attention to the goings on of this world.

Cannot all see that a belief in such a God as the Christians worship is incompatible with the crimes and cruelties which have at all times followed in the wake of the Christian religion? The feeble and helpless, the old and the innocent, have been tortured and imprisoned, and bloody wars have been waged, and millions have been slain, and yet God has never lifted a finger or entered a protest.

Facts will bear me out in the assertion that the stronger the belief in an overruling providence, the more brutal and inhuman men have proved to be. The more God, the more crime. The greater the anxiety for a state of bliss hereafter, the greater the suffering here. The greater the dread of hell, the more hell they had on earth.

Oh, the Bible! that great curse of man, written in a barbaric age by men of the lowest human instincts; filled with rape and murder, deceit and cruelty, incest and obscenity, superstition and filth, force, slavery, drunkenness, rapine, and war.

The Bible writers were guilty of all of these practices, and instead of God creating them in his own image, these barbarians fashioned a god which was but a reflex of their own ignorance, crimes, and debaucheries. And Christians of to-day have the mistaken idea that these men, filled with hellish hate, persecution, superstition, and low desires, are patterns of virtue worthy of imitation, and that the God which these writers clothed with cruelty and maledictions is worthy of adoration.

As far as I am able to learn, Voltaire was one of the most humane men of the times in which he lived. And Voltaire assailed the savage ideas and inhuman practices as narrated in the Bible with a keenness of wit and a marvelousness of sarcasm which were never equaled before or since. His highest ambition was the elevation of the race. And yet the church pursued him with its poisoned arrows of persecution as long as he lived, and then held the terror of Christian outrage over him when dying.

Compare the Infidels, whose writings have given the church the nightmare, with the Christians whose inhuman record I have alluded to. Will the Infidels suffer by the comparison? Cannot the tracks of Christianity be traced by human blood? Are there any atrocious crimes of which it has not been guilty? Have not the Infidels been instrumental in exposing the tricks and insincerity of ecclesiastics, and in leading men out of superstitious darkness, and in teaching lessons which have made men more tolerant, and are they not doing it to-day? And has not the church followed them with curses and denunciations, with lies and persecutions? Withdraw the efforts of Infidels and Christianity would drift back to the old crimes and persecutions as naturally as ducks take to water.

Science has put many of the old superstitions to the rout, and, in a measure, broken the teeth and pulled out the claws of the church, and the hounds of persecution are constantly on its track.

Instead of promoting good morals and elevating the race, Christianity has turned men into monsters, and caused them to torture and murder each other, and, instead of promoting human happiness, has turned the world into a scene of misery which would make devils dance with joy.

Every great discovery of science, and nearly every mechanical improvement, has met with opposition from the church. Astronomy, chemistry, geology, geography, philosophy, and nearly every branch of science during the last three hundred years have been gradually rolling back the waves of superstition, and the church has spent its force in cursing and decrying science and scientists. Copernicus, Galileo, Bruno, and many others might be cited as examples. The steam engine, the propelling of boats by steam, the fanning mill, and many other mechanical improvements, made the church gnash its teeth and froth at the mouth, because, as Christians asserted, they interfered with the arrangements of God.

The Christian is not only opposed to all improvements, but he is unfitted for American citizenship. He knows nothing of equality; he is favored with spiritual light, while others walk in darkness; he is connected with a celestial family, while others are children of the devil; he believes that he is half-brother to God Almighty, and first cousin to Jesus Christ, and claims special privileges on account of his superior family relations. Somehow, through the Bible, he believes that he holds the power of attorney from God Almighty to transact most of his business on earth. Being favored of God he cannot understand why he should not receive favors among men. If favors are not tendered to him, he will try to take them by force. He cannot stand before or among men as an equal; he is unfitted to sit on a jury or upon the judge's bench; he could not pass impartial judgment between a Christian and an Infidel; he has never learned that an Infidel has any rights which he is bound to respect. He tells the Infidel just how he must spend his Sundays and what books he must have in school, determines the character of the teacher, and dictates the management of the school. He insists that men shall read such literature as he may select, and ask him what they may send through the mails. If you study a Christian you will find this all true, but he never considers himself a usurper.

Christianity transforms a man into a tyrant. Tell a Christian what you think about God and he calls you a blasphemer and claims the right to roll you under his foot. If you differ from a Christian in opinion, instead of love and charity, he manifests all the instincts of a tiger. It turns him into a ferocious beast, and he will injure you in person or business, and only lacks the power to imprison you or put you to the torture.

Are not these the ear-marks of Christianity? Does not history establish the truth of every accusation and statement which I have made and a great deal more?

What does it mean that good citizens are in prison because they exercised their privilege to send matter through the mails? Why, they did not ask Christians what they might send. How does it happen that men guilty of no crime are behind prison bars? Simply because they did not ask Christians how they might spend their Sundays.

Now I want to show the difference between a Liberal and a canting Christian bigot. I presume the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER have noticed the articles in that paper under date of September 21st, p. 599, headed "The Mask Dropped." But I am afraid that all have not scanned the articles closely enough to understand their true inwardness. These articles are quotations from two Christian papers, and they show clearly enough that they dare not enter the arena in fair competition, paper against paper, brain against brain, but they abandon the field of open discussion and propose to crush out THE TRUTH SEEKER. These Christian vandals know nothing of the rights of others. They have no compunction about destroying the business of another when it comes in competition with their own. They care nothing about depriving the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER of the pleasure and profit of the weekly visits of the paper, not because of its immoral tendency, but on account of its tendency to scuttle the "Old Ship Zion," which has been freighted with ignorance, proscription, and superstition all through the Christian centuries. One of these God-befogged editors says that "the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER sees nothing of immorality in the blasphemies against God and Christ." Who is to judge of what constitutes blasphemy? Why, the Christian editor, of course. It would not be blasphemy to hold up a mud god to ridicule, but to ridicule his fetish is a great crime.

"But what is the view which the recognized authorities in criminal law take of such matters?"

We have no lawful God in this country against which a man can blaspheme. I have no power to prevent the editor of the Christian Reformer from putting up any kind of God which suits him. Neither has he any legal right to force me to do reverence to his imaginary sky monarch. Whether I pray or whistle jigs to him is no business of the law. As for law and authority, I wonder if the editor of the Christian Reformer has forgotten that women have been whipped, tongues torn out, eyes dug out; that men have been imprisoned, branded, cropped, slit, cut and mutilated in the most horrible manner, under Christian "law and authority." If there is a lawful God in this country, why are the Christians fighting for one now?

The Christian editor defines blasphemy as a "wilful and malicious attempt to lessen men's reverence for God by denying his existence or his attributes as an intelligent creator, governor, and judge of men."

Who knows about God's attributes, or that he exists at all? In the name of justice, is a man to be punished to please a Christian, when nobody on earth can prove that he has committed a crime? Besides, have I not shown that the more men were governed by this great bugaboo of the skies, and the more confidence they had in the Bible as a direct revelation from God, the more like unfeeling savages they acted? And the sooner this God is blown up, banished, or busted, the better it will be for the people.

"They [the authorities] all agree that blasphemy is a crime against the state, and that it saps the foundation of society and public order."

In a government where every man is a sovereign, one man's opinion is as good as any other's, and blasphemy cannot be construed into a crime against the state. But this editor, in his blind zeal, would pull down the bulwark of liberty and trample the rights of men under his ruthless feet to make the church the state.

This is what he is after, hence his ferocious charge on THE TRUTH SEEKER and every other influence which has a tendency to checkmate his nefarious scheme. This sanctimonious brigand would have you understand that he is much interested in the welfare of society, but when you get to the juice in the lemon you will find that he would pull down the temple of liberty, and dance with fiendish glee upon the ruins, to make the church the supreme power in the land. He is not singular—there are thousands striving for the same end, and the sun of liberty will cease to shine if their purpose is accomplished.

This hypocrite says of the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER: "It makes us tremble under the sense of this awful responsibility."

This language shows an earnest desire on the part of the Christian editor for the future welfare of the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, or else he would not tremble on account of his awful responsibility.

Judging from the spirit of his article, the Christian editor is guilty of two sins peculiar to most Christians—lying and hypocrisy. The truth is, if he had the power, he would send the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER to hell in a minute and stand on the hatchway to prevent his escape. This testy tyrant groups together the saloon, the gambling den, the lottery, and all other kindred evils, and then says that "THE TRUTH SEEKER is more disastrous to the welfare of society than any of them." Drink, even to beastly drunkenness; get the last cent that some poor fool has got by some gambling device; rob the unsuspecting people by any kind of lottery scheme; these, in the estimation of a Christian, are mere peccadillos compared to exposing the crimes of Christianity, or showing up the rottenness of the church, or exposing the tricks of ecclesiastics.

Now, my Christian friend, don't think that I am talking to that other fellow; I am talking to you. By the spirit you manifest, you would ruin the business of the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, break down his reputation, and that of all others of his philosophy, and reduce him and them to beggary, and then torture and imprison as in times gone by. Not because he or they have injured you, but because they have tried to substitute reason for superstition. Take away your religion and you would bear no ill will to either him or them.

JOHN PECK.

The Canadian Censorship.

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE HON. ADOLPH CARON, POST MASTER-GENERAL OF CANADA.

A censorship of the press, or any curtailment of the freedom of speech, should be odious to every man on the American continent, whether under a dependency of Great Britain, or the paramount government of the United States, based on the expressed will of seventy millions of persons. The principle and practice of a national postal service, sworn in the interests of the whole people, was well established in Great Britain long before it was made permanent by Constitution and statute in these United States, and any infringement of the rights secured under that department of the public service, even in a British dependency, on this American continent, should be resisted as a revival of a power that died with the "Dark Ages."

The faithful historian has recorded that that arbitrary power was formerly exercised in England by the well-known "Star Chamber," and after the abolition of that court, in 1641, it was wielded by Parliament, which, in 1662, attempted to regulate the matter by a statute which ran only a limited number of years, and, in 1692, this statute was extended two years more, but in 1694 the right of the crown to render the printing of writings, journals, etc., dependent on its permission—that is, the censorship—ceased entirely.

So much for British precedent in the matter of an established censorship, and I am not aware that any recognized official of the British government to-day attempts to wear the odious honors of that defunct institution. And if not, it then becomes a pertinent question, How can a temporary officer of a colonial dependency exercise such exploded and unwarranted powers in the suppression of free speech and its inseparable complement—free press? The answer of an enlightened statesman and true patriot would be, that no such power can now exist in a free community, much less could any merely delegated official of the British home government assume any such outrageous authority.

And as to the floating newspaper denial of the right of appeal from this wanton edict to the home government, that is non-existent bosh ab initio. No wrong believed to be suffered by a subject of Great Britain in Canada but may be properly represented in England for final determination. There can be no such thing as Dominion despotism superior to the power of Great Britain. And if a statute has been framed by a Canadian parliament pretending to grant any such outrageous power to the postmaster-general of the Dominion, it must, from the necessity of the reason and the law, be null. Hence the recent inhibition of the passage of THE TRUTH SEEKER, a weekly publication devoted to "Freethought and Reform," published in the city of New York, United States, through the Canadian mails, was not only the commission of a flagrant wrong, but a wanton invasion of the rights of the subjects of Great Britain in Canada, and a distinct and irritating insult and defiance of the just claims of the government and citizenship of the United States to free intercourse with a neighboring and friendly people.

Did Mr. Caron forget that the United States is vigilant in the defense of the plain rights of its citizens, even on foreign soil? If a condition of war had existed, something might be said in defense of embargoes on the free transit of mail matter, but it happens that Great Britain and the United States, in their interrelations, as sovereign powers, are at peace! Had the postmaster-general of Canada been a true-born Englishman, and thereby a patriotic vindicator of British liberality and justice, I might quote for his edification the noble sentiments of the grand old Milton, on this very theme of free speech and free press.

Two centuries and a half ago that loyal subject of the crown of England said: "A fair stage and no favor. Let truth and falsehood grapple. Who ever knew truth come by the worse, in a free and open encounter?"

And the patriotic and enlightened founders of the government of the United States simply followed in the footsteps of that noble man when they imbedded in the Constitution the grand doctrine of Mental Liberty, by securing to all freedom of speech and of the press. And without stopping here to discuss the imaginary offenses of ecclesiastical and theocratic lunacy, I will only reiterate the words of the immortal Thomas Jefferson in his second inaugural in regard to the treatment of all questions of public interest. He said: "The public judgment will correct false reasonings and opinions on a full hearing of all parties, and truth needs no other legal restraint."

But Mr. Caron may attempt to reply that these Jeffersonian doctrines, although they may be binding on the citizens of the United States, can have no extra-territorial operation—that they do not reach into the Dominion of Canada; but I have not failed to show that these salutary doctrines of the right of free expression on all themes of public interest are of British origin, and are, in Great Britain, maintained to-day. Even with church and state connections still retained there, freedom of the press has so liberalized public opinion that no special creed can be enforced by law, although public revenues may be perverted in that direction.

The real trend of political and social progress, especially in the British empire, is toward a freer enjoyment of speculative or religious opinions; and the popular movement to-day in North Britain is the disestablishment of the Scottish kirk—that theology (religion) may be separated from the state and made to rest on its own merits. It is too late in the day of human progress to introduce retrograde courses in the governmental treatment of men's opinions. Speech and the press must be free in civilized communities. The dogma and the dagger of the inquisitor can no longer be applied.

So that, if Roman Catholicism is claimed to be the established religion of Canada, it must be a mark of wise policy in the propaganda to "make haste slowly."

But is it a fixed fact that the people of the Canadian Dominion are under the tyrannic foot of Rome? And must the Protestant population of that once favored colony be compelled to accept just such crumbs as fall from the table of a domineering hierarchy? That may, "in the course of human events," be an issue on which the people of Canada may be called to pass, and this ungracious ruling of the postmaster-general may, after all, be an unintentional factor in bringing about an adjustment of the people's rights. But the writer of this letter disowns all acrimonious feeling toward Canada and its inhabitants, many of whom he numbers among his friends; and it is in the spirit of true friendship and on principles of the most exalted comity that he would suggest the immediate rescinding of this odious and impracticable ruling of the postmaster-general.

That would be a statesmanlike handling of the vexed matter. And it is no humiliation, but rather an honor, to undo what has been wrongly done; and if, as I believe, the postmaster-general has, in this case, overstepped a wise discretion in interfering with the freedom of the postal service, the remedy is easy, honorable, and at hand.

The mail department of all civilized governments has its acknowledged proper and rational boundaries, and when the citizen or subject has paid the regulated fees for such service, he is then entitled to have his mail matter conveyed to its destination without inquisitorial espionage or undue interruption. I am, with due regard,

Yours truly,

W. C. STURROCK.

The Verdict of the Independent Press.

From the Farmer's Tribune.

The Truth Seeker, published in New York, criticizes rather caustically the religious beliefs of the day and has just been excluded from the mails in Canada. A doctrine or belief that will not bear the open light of investigation, criticism, and comparison might reasonably be suspected of not being altogether substantial.

From the Times, Monterey, N. L., Mexico.

The Editor of The Truth Seeker complains that his paper is proscribed in Canada. He ought to be happy; it is the best advertisement he could possibly receive. Those who wish The Truth Seeker will find a way to get it. The postmaster-general of Canada happens to be an indiscreet Catholic, from whose decision there is no appeal, and he naturally does not like The Truth Seeker, or, for that matter, any other paper that conflicts with his ideas.

From the Coosa River News, Centre, Ala.

The News is in receipt of a copy of The Truth Seeker, a journal of the Freethought religious character, published in New York city, in which an editorial explains that the postmaster-general of Canada, Mr. Adolph Caron, has forbidden The Truth Seeker to pass through his mails to Canadian readers. This is wrong, as the said official offers to cite no violation of Canadian law, and if the liberty of the press is to be abridged in this manner a newspaper which contained an advertisement of Ingersoll's lectures might as well be forbidden the use of that country's mails. We differ as far as the poles from the persuasion of the paper in question, but religion invites attack [!], and it appears as though the Canadian official has been guilty of a narrow and foolish act which he should immediately rescind.

From the Progressive Age (Populist and Prohibition).

The Truth Seeker, a Freethought journal, ably conducted, and clean and courageous, has been denied the Canadian mails. We do not understand why this should be. While not agreeing with all The Truth Seeker publishes, and feeling at times a disposition to criticize some of its cartoons, we have never seen anything in its columns that would justify such action on the part of the postmaster-general of Canada. It is a species of bigoted tyranny which should meet with reproof among all people of the Western world. Hon. Mr. Caron should be wiser than to give such importance to a paper he wishes to ruin. He has taken a good method to popularize The Truth Seeker. Ontario and Manitoba will not tolerate such impudent fanaticism, and Mr. Caron will find that Cardinal Taschereau, whose dictation in matters of this kind he follows, will be unable to stem the tide of indignation which his generalship has aroused. We hope The Truth Seeker will pursue him to the very gates of purgatory or force him to grant fair play.

From the Banner of Light.

The inherent right of a free press to an unobstructed circulation in the mails can scarcely be disputed with seriousness by anybody. Above all things, the regulation of such a right ought not to be allowed to fall into the hands of any one man, possessed of arbitrary power, to do as he chooses in any given case. No form of religion, and no standing in politics, should clothe any individual with such great power for good or evil. The Truth Seeker, a New York publication, has virtually been suppressed in Canada by the postmaster-general there of his own motion, and without at first any notification to the publishers. On being inquired into it is learned that it is refused transmission in the Canadian mails because the postmaster-general simply decides that "on account of the character of its contents the paper ought to be excluded from the mails" of Canada. He could just as easily, and for as little reason, exclude any or all other papers, on grounds that satisfy himself alone. There is no appeal from his decision, and it can be reached by no legal tribunal. There is no redress at present available but that furnished by public opinion. The United States has a postal treaty with Canada. If she can forbid our papers from circulating there because the opinions they express do not happen to suit a single official, what does the treaty amount to anyway?

From the Conservator (Ethical Culture).

The edict of the Canadian postal authorities against the circulation of The Truth Seeker is one as to which those who love freedom can be of but one mind. Goldwin Smith has written of it: "You may be sure that you will always find me on the side of perfect freedom of opinion. Beliefs which can not maintain themselves by arguments in fair lists against all comers ought not to be maintained at all." Many men who are strong enough to hold a club seem run away with the notion that judgment is in the butt of that club, and that they are special agents delegated to use it on some person or principle which has incurred their displeasure. The policeman who attended a labor meeting and hearing the expression "we must have a revolution of thought," threw himself between the speaker and the meeting, declaring "this thing must stop!" is brother-bludgeoner to the Canadian postal usurper who impudently steps between The Truth Seeker and its subscribers, presuming to dictate to grown men and women the terms upon which they may receive their intellectual pabulum. There are thousands of people on our side of the border who will view this invasion with a sense of joy. But it is safe to say that those who love liberty will give to The Truth Seeker entire sympathy and such practical aid as may in the conditions prove within reach. This official act does not injure The Truth Seeker. It hurts Canada a good deal. It shows how vast is the advance of The Truth Seeker beyond the halting place of Canada's official pietists.

From the Times, Logansport, Ind. (Prohibition).

The Times has received a marked copy of The Truth Seeker, published in New York, now in its 22d year. This paper has recently been prohibited from the Canadian mails by Adolph Caron, the Catholic postmaster-general of that country. The Truth Seeker is a Freethought paper, and while we have no desire to enter into any extended consideration of its merits or demerits, we wish to enter our protest against this dictatorial and absolute one-man power, from whose decision there seems to be no appeal whatever. What is to hinder Mr. Caron from prohibiting from the mails any paper against which he may chance to "get his back up?" It is not necessary to agree with the policy of a newspaper in order to accord to it a fair treatment. We think The Truth Seeker about as narrow and unphilosophical regarding the Sunday saloon question as it is possible for a paper to become, but we are not ready to say that it should be denied any one of the rights granted to our favorite paper—the New York Voice, which is published only two doors from the Truth Seeker office. There is no more liberal class of people in America than the Prohibitionists, but they do not regard license as synonymous with liberty; nor do they take kindly to such high-handed outrages as this latest caper by Adolph Caron.

From the Sunday Gazetteer, Denton, Tex.

The Canadian government, instead of keeping along with the procession in this era of supposed liberty of speech and freedom of the press, is over a century behind the times. It seems the postmaster-general has been vested with the extraordinary power of individual censorship over all printed matter that enters the dominion, and can suppress and confiscate at will. He has recently ruled that the New York Truth Seeker, one of the best edited and most liberal papers published in the United States, and, above all, the fairest to an opponent, cannot pass through the Canadian mails on the ground that it is blasphemous. When asked what there was about the paper that rendered it blasphemous, or what particular issue contained blasphemous language, he refused to give the information. It seems that neither the publisher of The Truth Seeker nor the Canadian subscribers have any redress, the postmaster-general being both judge and jury when it comes to saying what shall and what shall not pass through the mails. Of course the charge against the paper is absurd. In a free country there can be no blasphemy in discussing any question, involving religion or anything else; but then, Canada is far from being "the land of the free." Meantime, the paper is served to Canadian patrons by express, and we have no doubt its circulation, and thereby its influence, will be greatly increased by this bigoted attempt to suppress it. The postmaster-general will find, if he lives long enough, that even in Canada the only effectual way to dispose of a supposed error is to refute it. It's too late in the day to keep knowledge from the people by crying wolf, or attempting a censorship of the press.

From the Coast Seamen's Journal (San Francisco).

The Truth Seeker of New York has recently been refused transmission through the Canadian mails under an act empowering the postmaster-general to exclude matter of a "scurrilous or blasphemous" nature. As everybody knows, The Truth Seeker is a Freethought paper, run in the interest of secular government and education and of reason and science, as opposed to dogma and superstition. Whether or not we agree with this principle is immaterial; the thing that concerns us is that others may differ from us in principle, and if a mere difference of ideas, prejudices or convictions is to be the gauge of censorship, no paper in the country will have the assurance of a week's life. If we can judge by the evidence of our eyes and ears there are some people who disagree with the Journal upon radical grounds. No doubt these people if placed in positions of authority would exercise it to suppress what they consider dangerous doctrines. We deny our critics the power to prove themselves right by the argument of force, and if need be we will fight to maintain the untrammelled exercise of reason, as we consider it. In the case of The Truth Seeker, as in our own or any other, the critics may be honest—indeed, they may even be right in their view of the principle advocated by the objectionable publications. On the other hand, they may be dishonest and wrong. The proof of these questions is a purely personal affair and its whole scope may be summed up in the individual's undoubted right to quit reading the papers in question. At any rate, no person can be either honest or right in endeavoring to suppress opinions which do not concern him personally, and this rule applies equally to postmasters and to private citizens. The truth of this is finely vindicated in all cases by the fact that just in proportion as suppression is attempted publicity is widespread.

The Canadian postal law under which The Truth Seeker is excluded is a limited censorship in theory, but, as is shown in this case, it is the most absolute suppression in practice. The law does not define the words "scurrilous" or "blasphemous," but leaves the construction entirely to the humor of the postmaster-general, and from his decision there is no appeal! The grossest abuses follow as the inevitable result of such a law. Any amount of political mud-slinging, society scandal, etc., is allowed unquestioned passage, but unorthodox papers are stopped. So we see that in practice the law doesn't aim at the language of a paper so much as at its purpose. We hold that while the purpose is good the language is immaterial, and that where there is any question upon the merits of either purpose or language it should be settled by the public, represented by a jury of citizens, and not by an official censor, the very nature of whose being precludes the possibility of a fair decision. We trust that the postmaster-general of Canada will see the error of his ways, and that in the meantime The Truth Seeker will reap the full advantage of the big ad it is getting.

Observations.

Monsieur Caron, postmaster-general of Canada, who takes exception to the style of controversy in vogue nowadays, might have found a better field for his talents if he had lived a few hundred years ago—in the days, for example, when Catholics and Protestants were debating the Seven Sacraments. Martin Luther, at that time, expressing himself concerning the Catholic clergy, observed: "The papists are all asses, and will always remain asses. Put them in whatever sauce you choose, boiled, roasted, baked, fried, skinned, beat, hashed, they are always the same asses." Paying his respects to his holiness the pope, he goes on: "The pope was born out of the devil's posteriors. He is the ravisher of virgins, the greatest of pimps, the governor of Sodom." King Henry VIII., who appears to have been the Gladstone of his age, published a book against the new doctrine, and Luther touched off his majesty in the following lively style: "This rotten worm of the earth having blasphemed the majesty of my king, I have a just right to bespatter his English majesty with his own ordure. King Henry is a liar." On the other side, a papist, said to have been Sir Thomas More, concludes an answer to Luther by leaving him "cum suis merdis et stercorebus cacantium cacatumque." Which, being interpreted, means that Luther needed a bath in the worst way. John Calvin, who had no more use for a Lutheran than he had for a Catholic, was accustomed to gently conclude his remarks to an adversary with the question, "Do you hear, you damned dog?" Beza, the cultured disciple of Calvin, referring to a Lutheran minister, called him an ape and accredited him with the possession of parts similar in proportions to those of a wild jackass. He also expressed the conviction that the said minister should be hanged to the first tree. The Catholic party had the same vivacity of style, and if their language was translated into a newspaper the presence of the journal in a mail bag could be detected by the sense of smell. I do not understand that the works of these writers and reprints of their controversies are excluded from the Dominion.

A majority of the voting sovereigns of New York who cast a ballot last week indicated by their choice that they liked Tammany rule better than the Sunday-school discipline introduced by Dr. Parkhurst. A year ago they voted the other way, but then they had had no experience of life under Roosevelt. Now that they have had that experience they prefer the tiger to the anaconda. It is deemed better to be bitten somewhat, or to have the leg pulled, than to be constricted in a vital part. Tammany always gave the citizen his Sunday liberty provided he paid for it, though it was not always ready to accept eternal vigilance as legal tender for that necessary of life; but under the reform administration such liberty has been a contraband article altogether. The result of the voting is all the more diverting because of the Roman Catholic church professedly withdrawing its support from the winning side just before election and going over to the losers. That was an error on the part of Archbishop Corrigan, who allowed himself to scold before what he mistook for a popular breeze, and will now be compelled to claw back.

I did not vote. Between two evils it is sometimes vouchsafed to the citizen to choose neither. This was one of those occasions.

At the Manhattan Liberal Club the other night Mr. Henry Nichols and Mr. Henry Rowley debated the subject of Protection vs. Free trade. The manuscript address of Mr. Nichols, who opened the debate in behalf of Protection, was an attack upon England and the Cleveland administration. Mr. Rowley, who is an Englishman, discussed Mr. Nichols and Free trade, and the audience, sharing the belligerency of the speakers, got hot under the collar. It was beautiful. The chaotic state of politics gave Mr. Nichols an opportunity to attribute all national woes to Democratic misrule and all blessings to Republican influence; and of course Mr. Rowley could transpose the terms and make out just as good a case. Mr. Nichols showed very clearly that England was growing opulent at our expense by reason of the low-tariff Wilson bill, but at the same time her own Free trade policy has reduced her to such a condition of poverty that one person in every ten is a pauper and half the families of the United Kingdom are living in one room apiece. Free trade had also lowered wages in Great Britain so that the average pay of skilled labor, when employed, is a dollar a day. Mr. Rowley pointed out that England, with the exception of Turkey, was the only Free trade country in Europe, and that labor was vastly better paid there than in Germany, France, Belgium, or any other protected country. English miners got one dollar and a half per diem, while in Pennsylvania, the center of protected industry, miners received only 60 cents a day. The statement about families living in one room each he characterized as a lie. Mr. Nichols showed how values had shrunk under the Wilson bill, and made affairs look so bad that a hearer would be alarmed if he did not stop to reflect that the country was still here, that its area remained stationary, and that nothing had disappeared off its surface. He said that Protection needed to be supplemented by greater facilities for distribution, which was an equally important matter; and Mr. Rowley wanted to know how a toll of from ten to ninety per cent ad valorem could facilitate distribution or exchange. It was a beautiful debate, and demonstrated that not even an artificial impediment to trade, such as the tariff is, can wholly paralyze industry in a country with resources like those of the United States. It also demonstrated that the business uncertainty caused by tariff tinkering has a very strong tendency to bring about that kind of disaster.

The more discussion of the tariff I hear or read, the more vociferously I call for the previous question, to wit: Resolved, That no aggregation of individuals can possess the just right to draw a line across the surface of the earth and to deny themselves and all others the natural privilege of crossing it, taking their portable goods with them. In feudal days men grew rich and finally became barons by camping near a ford in a river or near a mountain pass and taking toll from merchants compelled to go their way. So tenacious is the said custom that governments like our own, professing to protect citizens in the possession of property, have uniformed retainers at each port of entry to levy the same form of blackmail upon the chattels of wayfarers.

Brother T. B. Wakeman, who was the New York Populists' candidate for secretary of state, got only about six hundred and twenty-five votes in this city, which will hardly be enough to overcome the pluralities of the other parties above the Bronx river that forms the northern boundary of the town. The election came too late for Mr. Wakeman to show his real strength. He would have got more votes if he had polled the Freethinkers' Congress ten days earlier.

This is a problem that has been submitted to a religious contemporary for solution: A man who concedes the right of divorce for scriptural reasons only is by his wife accused of unfaithfulness, and through perjured testimony she has got a bill from him. Now he knows that he has never violated his marriage vow, and that the divorce is therefore without biblical sanction. Hence, "in the sight of God," he is still the woman's husband. But she refuses to live with him, and the court has dissolved his claim to marital rights. What he wants to know is whether, under the circumstances, he may marry again. The clerical editor to whom he appeals says, No; not until the woman does. This I regard as no solution of the problem at all, for the woman may never catch another man, notwithstanding the contention of the elder Weller that more widows than single women get married. Besides, she has no more right to marry than he has, and it would be doing the Garden of Eden act over again for him to place her first in the transgression. I would advise him to step off at the first opportunity. That would indubitably remove the impediment which now exists, and he would kill two birds with one stone; i.e., he would at the same time free himself from the grip of his conscience, and get a wife; thereby so combining and realizing the means and the end sought that everything would seem to be coming his way. God might not be pleased, but I really don't see what he could do about it.

The Boston Herald helps a fool to publish his folly by reprinting (though with adverse comment) the assertion of a writer, discussing Ingersoll, that "as to real argument, many are the boys and girls in our high schools with a reference Bible in their hands who could wind him up so tight in Bible logic that it would bring the blush of shame to his face." If Boston has such bright boys and girls as that in her high schools she should call in her ministers and send the youngsters out to do battle with the Infidel. The Rev. Henry M. Field, the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, Judge Jeremiah Black, and other clergymen, statesmen, and jurists have taken a turn at the crank, and so far have failed to wind up the Colonel or to make him red in the face, that the Truth Seeker Company extensively advertises their discussions as campaign literature for Freethought. The Christian world is neglecting the means of grace if it doesn't set the aforesaid high-school youths and maidens at the cheerful task of coiling down the Colonel's sophistries. We should, then, of course, see some religious publishing house putting forth their work side by side with the arguments of the wound-up unbeliever. And at about that time we shall have an arithmetic in which two and two multiplied together will give a product of five.

A New York daily prints an illustrated article with a sextuple heading, the biggest line of which is, "Theosophy's Origin Exposed." The public has hitherto been led to suppose, or at least asked to believe, that Theosophy is an ancient East Indian cult with headquarters in the Himalaya mountains, where the immortal Koot Hoomi and other astral sages dwell. But Mr. Henry J. Newton, a prominent New York Spiritualist, now says that it originated in his house in 1875, and was carried thence to India by Alcott and Blavatsky. Mr. Newton produces documentary evidence, in the form of the original constitution of the Theosophical Society, of which a facsimile is published, to prove that this is so. The members pledged themselves "to ever maintain absolute secrecy respecting the proceedings of the said society." The pledge which heads the list of fifty-four charter members is in the handwriting of John Storer Cobb, who fifteen or twenty years ago was quite prominent in the reform ranks, and among the signatures is that of Dr. R. B. Westbrook, of Philadelphia. No wonder Theosophy has failed to establish itself among the accepted delusions of this country, for it began wrong. Colonel Olcott should have started it in India—or, better still, in Palestine—and then imported it. Or he might have taken Mormonism as an example, beginning among the superstitious and illiterate and importing proselytes of the same class from European countries. As soon as he had got the mob, with paid offices in the society, the educated sharpers would have joined him and he could have secured exemption from taxation, together with public appropriations for the founding and maintaining of Theosophical institutions, after the manner of the Roman Catholic and Protestant churches. His miracles were all right, but he erred in asking intelligent people to believe them before there were any votes behind the movement.

GEO. E. MACDONALD.

Ingersoll's new lecture, "The Foundations of Faith," is for sale at the low price of twenty-five cents. Same style as his other recently issued pamphlets.

When Death Takes a Christian.

The Christian was old and feeble, and lay on his death-bed. He had no fear of death, for throughout his long life his faith had never failed him, and he was confident that his God would receive him kindly and care for him. He had believed and tried to teach others to do likewise.

In business the Christian had been a hard, close man. He had ruled his employees like a despot. He exacted every cent that was due him when it was due. It mattered not who might suffer. He suspected everyone of wrong-doing. He trusted only God.

When he bought food for his family, he haggled till he got it at his own price. When the food was prepared and on the table the family paused while the Christian gave thanks to God for the blessing. The Christian's prayers were long and loud and full of sounding phrases. His bargains were sharp and one-sided. But he believed!

Now he lay dying. For days he had prayed pitifully to God to take him home (he was sure of a home), and ease his pains. God was busy at the time, and could not attend to the matter at once. Perhaps he was looking over the lists of sparrows which had fallen during the previous month. Anyway, the prayers were not answered. The Christian was a Protestant, therefore God's vicegerent or secretary of state, the pope, couldn't attend to his needs. So the Christian suffered on.

When the end drew near the Wealthy Daughter came and found him, and ordered the rest of the family about. The Poor Daughter had cared for the Christian and taken his jibes and insults for years. She had no religion, or at least expressed nor professed any. She loved her father. She cooked the meals, bought the medicines, sat by the dying Christian and nursed him. The Poor Son-in-law left his work, and although half sick himself he sat by the bedside and attended the Christian for twelve days and nights. When he rested a moment it was on the floor, in the spot which his wife, perhaps, had just vacated to relieve him of his charge.

The Wealthy Daughter, a professed Christian, slept each night on a cot loaned by the Infidel Relative, who was detested by the Wealthy Daughter. The Infidel did not loan the cot for the purpose for which it was used.

A Christian neighbor left his work one day and came in to assist the Poor Son-in-law who was about exhausted. The Wealthy Daughter offered him three dollars. He refused to accept pay for his services. The Poor Son-in-law lost several days' wages and bought medicines besides. No one offered him three dollars a day.

The Wealthy Daughter had lunches five times a day. The Poor Daughter prepared them. The Wealthy Daughter's husband, her daughter, and her son-in-law, came and ate and departed.

The Poor Son came early and stayed late. He worried about the old man's money and belongings. He wanted his share. He intended to have it. Before the Christian died he said everything was fixed and down in black and white. The Infidel Relative called each day to see the Christian. Sometimes he wiped a tear from his eye as he looked about at the hungry wolves gathering to rend the corpse, each anxious for a share and growling already.

The dying Christian told the Wealthy Daughter that she had always been good to him and he loved her. The same Wealthy Daughter had expressed the wish that the old man would not call at her home, as his clothes were not fashionable. The dying Christian told the Poor Daughter nothing. She had worked and slaved for him for years.

The Christian died. The preacher said he had been a good, kind man, generous and fair to all—and a Christian. He said other things. He also accepted two dollars for saying them. It was the last two dollars the Poor Daughter had after buying flowers for the dead. The Wealthy Daughter bought no flowers. She said enough would, doubtless, be given.

The Infidel was silent usually. He said he thought the preacher was a robber. He couldn't understand why a man who received a regular salary for attending to certain business should accept other money for work connected with his business or profession. The Infidel was frowned upon. The Christian was buried, and if he left anything in black and white, or in silver and gold, no one has been able to find it.

The wolves are snarling and fighting. The Infidel wishes he might speak his mind, but he is married into the family and for his wife's sake holds his peace. He is glad the Poor Son-in-law and Poor Daughter can now rest in their beds instead of on the floor, for the Wealthy Daughter has gone away again.

THE INFIDEL.

Pretty Good for Everybody.

Several thousand copies have been sold by the Truth Seeker Company of its recent book, "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," by Samuel P. Putnam. It is an exhaustive and striking showing of the work that has been done by men of advanced thought from the earliest times to the present. Colonel Ingersoll is among those who have commended it. Even such readers as are slow to sympathize with advanced thinking will be impressed by the record here made, while those who welcome the most liberal discussion will find it a perfect storehouse or mine of information.

NEWARK, N. J., Oct. 27, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 in payment for one year's benefits conferred by THE TRUTH SEEKER and a copy of the "Pictorial Text-Book." I may be putting a sad crack in the Sabbath by writing this little business communication, but my conscience, being elastic, does not twinge.

Sincerely yours, THOS. E. LINDSLEY.

LA HOMA, O. T., Oct. 25, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $21.50. Please send me the "Self-Contradictions of the Bible;" "Hard Knocks at Christianity;" Ingersoll's "Argument in Reynolds Blasphemy Trial;" "For Her Daily Bread;" "Glory of Infidelity," and for the balance of the money you will please offer those kinds of pamphlets free to the poor.

Respectfully, J. C. LOOMILLER.

Could Not Resist a Good Temptation.

FOREST CITY, IA., Oct. 21, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I have been taking so many papers that I thought I must forego THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I cannot resist any longer, for those sample copies have induced me to invest $3 more in literature that helps free men from the bondage of superstition. Please send me the paper for one year and the "Text-Book," and if you can afford it, put in the "Glory of Infidelity."

B. A. PLUMMER.

In Defense of Equal Rights.

LUMBEVILLE, PA., Oct. 30, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Although I take more papers than I can read, your paper fills a want no other one supplies, and as it is a duty that every Liberal owes to the country he lives in to support the advocates of Free thought, to oppose the encroachment of theological bigotry, and to aid that publication which is bearing the brunt of the unequal contest, and considering THE TRUTH SEEKER to be such a paper, I inclose for subscription $5, which you will place to my credit.

Yours for freedom of thought,

Judging Christians by their Utterances.

MARSH, IDA., Oct. 17, E.M. 295.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find sixteen cents for the list of pamphlets I here inclose. Raise the flag of liberty above superstition. I will try to help you some through the cheap tracts you advertise. Such rascality as the prohibiting of THE TRUTH SEEKER in Canada is some of the work of our modern enemy-loving Christians, who would cut our throats if they thought their God would bear them through in safety. I live in a priest-ridden country where Liberals are scarce and the days growing dark with superstition. It is necessary to try to spread the light of reason.

Yours as ever, A. E. BENOIT.

He Would Kill Them with Light.

NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y., Oct. 12, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I see that my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER has recently expired. I therefore send you herewith $3 to pay for another year. I am thoroughly in sympathy with your great paper in its active campaign against ignorance and superstition, the arch enemies of civilization. Let the good fight go on in the hope that ultimately the bats and owls of superstition may be routed from their hiding places—ignorance and credulity—and driven into the broad daylight of science, where their hideous deformities will be apparent to all mankind, and when "to be hated will be but to be seen."

Making the Light Shine.

SWAN RIVER, MINN., Oct. 24, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I delivered some forty or fifty TRUTH SEEKERS in Minneapolis last summer. In all, I think, I have delivered about three hundred copies of your paper in that city, and hope to deliver thousands of copies in the future, and it seems to me that, from the number I have given away in the last five years, some may have been sown on good ground and the receivers have subscribed for it.

Buddha may have been the light of Asia, but THE TRUTH SEEKER is one of the great lights of the world, and I think when I renew my subscription it will be for two copies a week instead of one, and if every subscriber who is able would do the same, it would help our cause wonderfully, and the good effected by so many copies scattered abroad would offset some of the devilish work of the preachers, and the Young Men's Christian humbug, and other superstition-fostering societies.

S. G. COOPER.

In Answer to the Theocrats.

RAPID RIVER, Oct. 26, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: "These are the times that try men's souls." So said the great Paine of his times, and our own are a more warped edition. We have stood on the borders of freedom and beheld the purity, liberty, and light of the land, and must not be driven back into theological filth, slavery, and darkness; better a grave. They have made an attack on THE TRUTH SEEKER, and every Freethinker must make it a fight to the death and furnish the funds to continue the fight for years. I hereby pledge my word to subscribe $25 every year while the fight lasts, unless some accident deprives me of the means. It seems plain from the utterances of the theocrats that nothing less than censorship and final suppression of the secular press is on their program; and as a great many of the secular newspapers are controlled by them, the editors will pile the fagots for their own literary and perhaps bodily cremation.

Yours fraternally, TOM WALKER.

An Inquiry After Mr. Bond.

REALITOS, TEX., Oct. 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: As the weather is changing to cool nights, I am reminded of my dear friend, B. L. Bond, who spent last winter with me. As we were the only two in this part of the world who did not welcome the preachers and their money-making schemes, we spent most of our time together. I became very fond of him and when he went to other parts, I could not help shedding a few tears of sorrow because of his leaving me all alone at the mercy of the Bible-sharks. I have written to him several times, but have got no answer. The last time I heard from him he was in Georgia, attending camp-meetings and making Baptist speeches. I am afraid that the chicken-eaters have captured him. If so they have a prize in him and we lose a friend and hard fighter for truth and justice. I still have faith in him and hope he will come out all right in the wash.

Please give the above space in your good paper, and should it come to the eyes of B. L. Bond, who is a subscriber, he will at least know I am still his friend, and a friend to truth and justice, and an enemy of all swindling schemes called religion.

Wishing your valuable paper success and hoping it will find a place in every home in the world, I remain

Your friend, PERRY DOWNS.

Yes, Wisconsin is at the Front.

WAUKESHA, WIS., Oct. 21, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I have just read your excellent criticism of Prof. Ely's scheme for the practical union of religious and secular higher education. I have read some of Prof. Ely's works, and was favorably impressed with one of them in particular, viz: "Social Aspects of Christianity." Of course it contains some pious nonsense, but on the whole the book is well worth reading by every liberal minded person. I was therefore surprised and disappointed to find he is advocating practically the union of church and state. He will, however, hardly convert many educators and thinkers to his way of thinking on that subject, especially not in this state. While stopping a few days in Milwaukee, I took occasion to visit the state normal school in that city, and was very much pleased with the way the "opening exercises" were conducted. In my day, only 15 years ago, the normal schools at Whitewater and Oshkosh, and of course all the other normal schools, always opened with religious exercises consisting of reading from the Bible, singing hymns, and offering prayer by the president. These were somewhat modified a little later, when Mr. Carl Doerflinger, of the Milwaukee Freidenker, at one time one of the board of regents, succeeded in making it optional for students to attend during these exercises, but did not succeed in breaking up the practice of holding religious exercises. A few years ago the question whether or not Bible reading in our public schools should be allowed was brought before the supreme court of the state of Wisconsin, and, to the credit of that body he it said, it decided against the religionists, showing that the reading of the Bible and other religious exercises were clearly unconstitutional. No doubt THE TRUTH SEEKER is familiar with the decision to which I refer. Since then, so far as I know, no religious exercises have been held in any of the schools of the state supported in whole by the state. At the Milwaukee normal school, no exercises of any description were held in the morning, but the afternoon session is always opened by singing some school song, followed by an address by the president or some one of the professors. The one I listened to was on the subject of child training in the public schools. I think Wisconsin's Freethinkers may well feel proud of the attitude their state has taken on the subject of religious exercises in the public schools.

Yours truly, J. J. SHIRLEY, M.D.

After Relics and Miracles.

ROCKVILLE, S. D., Oct. 27, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: At a meeting of our society it was suggested—in view of the fact that shrines are becoming quite popular as a means of working miracles and healing the sick, and also a fruitful source of revenue—that a committee be appointed to take under advisement the securing of sacred relics, to be inclosed in a tactile box—that is, a box susceptible of being touched—and bring the same within touch of the people. We herewith send for publication the report of said committee. It might not be amiss to mention in this connection that such publication might have the effect of softening the asperity of the postmaster-general of Canada to the extent that he would reconsider his late action denying to THE TRUTH SEEKER mail facilities in his dominions, as he is engaged in the same business.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

We, your committee appointed to consider and report upon the securing of certain sacred relics for the purpose of a shrine, beg leave to make the following report:

1. The flaming sword was in the hands of a cherub east of the garden of Eden. This cherub is a winged creature with a human countenance—he draws the chariot of Yaveh. Ezekiel visioned him; John, the revelator, was intimately acquainted with him. The cherub dropped the sword at the garden wall when Adam and Eve died. The Jews kept this sword red, and Jesus brought it to Peter, and the church has kept it flaming to this day. We hope to secure it when the church lays it down—probably to-morrow.
2. Cain's club was thrown eleven feet southeast from the blood of Abel in the field. God placed it in the hands of the Jews, and we can hear its dull thud from every quarter of the globe. It is not an infidel weapon—report unfavorable.
3. The jawbone of the ass is now in use by 111,000 clergymen of the United States to kill and dwarf the intellects of millions of people. Their strength has moved from the hair to the cheek and gall, and is made manifest by the brazen insolence of the priests. Report unfavorable.

4. Jonah's gourd grew up in a night to a height and size to protect a man from the rays of the burning sun. A worm ate it off at sunrise, and when Jonah saw its leaves wither he was willing to enter the pugilistic ring with old Billy himself. This happened 2757 years ago. It is not stated in the divine record that this gourd had seeds or that gourds were common before that date, but since gourds grow in all warm and temperate parts of the earth we may know this gourd had seed or that God dropped a few packages of them. Since the gourds of to-day are vines we evidently have lost the art of growing them like a god; he made them stand up like a tree; we can only make them crawl like a snake. God taught his chosen people the art of lying, stealing, murdering, making hair-oil and bread, but all the arts and applied sciences, such as poetry, painting, agriculture, medicine, telegraphy, railroads, printing, astronomy, government, etc., are purely the work of the devil. To raise gourd trees with our seed we must go to the devil for aid. If our seeds were exhibited as relics your committee is unable to say if miracles would be wrought, or the sick healed, or this society benefited financially—still it might be a novel exhibition and have a seductive effect. We recommend that the president of this society make a trial seed exhibition. Your committee respectfully ask for more time to consider this matter. Submitted, etc.

SEARCH LIGHT.

Katie Kehm Smith.

LONE ROCK, OR., Oct. 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: You already have the sad news of the death of Mrs. Katie Kehm Smith. I suppose it is unnecessary to tell you she died in the glorious faith she had lived, and for which she had worked nearly all her life like a young soldier. She was brought by Liberal friends sixty miles to Haystack and laid away by many loving hands in the Infidel cemetery, where they will raise a fine monument to her memory next summer. But, ah! the monument she has raised herself by the grand, noble, self-sacrificing work she has done for Oregon will be more enduring than the finest sculpturing on marble. An impressive burial service was read by Mr. Carl Wagner in a voice tremulous with emotion, but it lost none of its beauty by that. Still, there were seen some of the scandal-mongering lambs of God who had given their hearts to Jesus, laughing at the "sport." How could the poor, heartless things help it?

We need the tenderest sympathy of all Liberals, for we have lost the brightest star of the Pacific coast. I know I shall not wound anybody by saying this, for I feel that every Liberal heart in Oregon throbs with the same feeling. There is nothing we can say to her poor broken-hearted companion and relatives to heal such sorrow as this. Old Father Time, in his relentless course, had given her to us and he has taken her away; in his endless cycles he may blunt the most poignant grief, but never heal the wound. My heart is too sad to write more at present, but as we hid away the beloved and loving face we were admonished that the Lives of great men all remind us

We can make our lives sublime,
And, departing, leave behind us
Foot-prints on the sands of time.

By permission I send you the following song by Mrs. Smith:

SONG OF THE CREEDS.

AIR.—"Good-bye, My Lover, Good-bye."

The Ship of Truth is sailing on,
Good-bye, old dogmas, good-bye;
Superstition is nearly gone,
Good-bye, old dogmas, good-bye.
The People sit at Reason's feast,
Good-bye, old dogmas, good-bye;
No more to be duped by Preacher or Priest,
Good-bye, old dogmas, good-bye.
Bye, dogmas, bye-lo, etc.;
Good-bye, old dogmas, good-bye.

The Methodist hell is waning fast,
Good-bye, hell-fire, good-bye;
Good sense is gaining ground at last,
Good-bye, hell-fire, good-bye.
The brimstone pit is getting cooled,
Good-bye, hell-fire, good-bye;
The people who think will not be fooled,
Good-bye, hell-fire, good-bye.

Bye, Wesley, bye-lo, etc.,
Good John Wesley, good-bye.

The Pope of Rome is fallible, too,
Good-bye, confession, good-bye;
His cure for sin will never do,
Good-bye, confession, good-bye.
Our public schools will surely go,
Good-bye, confession, good-bye;
If left to those who kiss his toe,
Good-bye, confession, good-bye.
Bye, Leo, bye-lo, etc.;
Good-bye, Pope Leo, good-bye.

The Baptist faith is changing fast,
Good-bye, immersion, good-bye;
Freethought is doing her work at last,
Good-bye, immersion, good-bye.
In water alone they have lost their hope,
Good-bye, immersion, good-bye;
Unless it is used with plenty of soap,
Good-bye, immersion, good-bye.
Bye, Baptist, bye-lo, etc.;
Good-bye, immersion, good-bye.

The faith of Talmage is all a sham,
Good-bye, poor Talmage, good-bye;
His hearers full of lies he'd cram,
Good-bye, poor Talmage, good-bye.
Three times his church went up in flame,
Good-bye, poor Talmage, good-bye;
No help from Jesus ever came,
Good-bye, poor Talmage, good-bye.
Bye, Talmage, bye-lo, etc.;
Good-bye, poor Talmage, good-bye.

The Presbyterians have changed their creed,
Predestination, good-bye;
Their babies now are saved indeed,
Predestination, good-bye.
Such senseless faith must take its flight,
Predestination, good-bye;
When Reason sheds her beautiful light,
Predestination, good-bye.
Bye, Baby, bye-lo, etc.;
Predestination, good-bye.

MRS. A. M. CRAWFORD.

Mr. McBride's Wealth of Words.

SAMOTH, ILL., Oct. 23, E.M. 295.

MR. EDITOR: Permit me say—if it is not taxing your patience and space too much—that it seems to me that you have your facetious brother employed “to poke fun” and charge your correspondents who honestly differ with him of being non compos mentis, regardless of the influences of condition and environment. I'll say to THE TRUTH SEEKER'S “Gem” that you intentionally, or otherwise, never touched the subject under consideration.

You say, “These being the varieties of emotion cited by Mr. McBride to illustrate the utility of love, and none of them being the one I had in mind when I wrote the sentence that does not ‘pleasantly meet his approval,’ I am not harassed by any felt obligation to discuss them at length.” What “one” did you have in mind, if any? The Editor entitles my communication, “Arguing Against a Pleasantry.” Is it “pleasantry” for your friends to dub them apposit candidates for the asylum, simply because they think love better than a loveless life? Or, perhaps, you didn't have this “one in mind” when you “wrote the sentence.” Do you sincerely deem it “pleasantry” to call those “insane” who practice what they preach as much as possible? You or the Editor, or both, can tackle the above easy question. Is it “pleasantry” to assail a man with the accusation of “insanity” because he has wooed and won a wife, and reared a fine flock of children? If so, are you not cracking chestnuts at the expense of all the beautiful in existence?—of the heaven here? That you are “forced to distrust the analytical powers of my mind” is not strange, since I've read your “Observations” from their first appearance to the present time, and probably that will account for it. I admit your “denials.” I must also “deny” having exerted any painstaking efforts in my essay; but it was written one day while waiting for dinner; on the other hand you earn your livelihood by your assiduous literary applications. So, Mr. Macdonald, you'll surely pardon me, for I was hungry, besides it wasn't the “one I had in mind,” anyway. You say that my “work is too coarse.” Too “coarse” for what? I think you devote a pretty prolix reply to my extensiveness.

You ask: “I wonder if it is a fact that Mr. McBride thinks in words having the same initial?” If I were to adopt your diction of delivery, I'd retort: “That's none of your business;” but as I can afford to be morerefinéd and true to myself, I'll say that I usually “think in words having the same initial;” so you will readily see that the “effect is not bad,” for if it was I could pertinently point to your phrase of “stately salutation.” Could I not consistently say of you as you have of me, that “‘apt alliteration's artful aid’ in his case is not apt,” etc.? I'll refer you to your poem, entitled “Paine: The Knight Errant of Freedom,” in which you say:

Who fell where furrow and field ran red—
To crash of cannon and shriek of shell.

No alliterative display in that, are they? Do you thus woo the muses for “effect” merely, and is the effect “bad?”

Again, you philanthropically apprise me that “there is certainly something incongruous in the conception of a devil-fish as a dogmatist, as there is something ungrammatical in the use of the plural pronoun in the same sentence.” I employ the words “orthodox octopus” figuratively; therefore to use the “devil-fish orthodoxy as a dogmatist,” would, I think, be perfectly proper; while I cheerfully confess that the “personal pronoun” is “ungrammatical.” Once again I quote from your poem:

O champion, bravest of all the past!
O Freedom, fairest of all the dames!
Long may the pledges of your fealty last,
For ever united be your names.

And long as flowers from the soil shall spring,
Touched by the warmth of a May-day bright,
A blossom and tear shall the lady bring
To drop on the grave of her faithful knight.

Now, according to your logic, what do you mean by this line:

O Freedom, fairest of all the dames!

Why express “Freedom” in the feminine gender? and does the “fairest dame” wear bloomers and straddle a bike along with other “new women?” The other two last lines:

A blossom and tear shall the lady bring
To drop on the grave of her faithful knight.

What lady? the “fairest dame” Freedom?—and will this handsome knightess live perennially to drop tears and blossoms “on the grave of her faithful knight?” Did this knight get killed in a joust, or did he expire serenely in bed? What a spectacle! tears trickling down the comely cheeks of “Freedom!” Why weepest thou, “fairest dame?” Is it because thou hast a lasting job of dropping blossoms?

Now, Mr. Macdonald, by the light of your own logic, does not your lines reflect “incongruities?” According to your estimation, the similitudes, metaphors, and figures of speech of Burns, Byron, Shakspeare, Shelley, Whittier, and Whitman, and others, are all “incongruities.” I am painfully surprised that a word-weaver of your prominence has failed to perceive this. If you were a king's jester or “court critic,” the situation would be different.

“I would ask if ‘argus-eyed monster’ is approved diction in Samoth, Ill.?” you inquire. At the present I am agnostic on that, but I intend soon to make a canvass of the place, and will report the success of the enterprise for your especial edification. Of course I must observe the time-worn conventionalities of Samoth, else I'm not “in the swim!” “What is the matter with ‘hydra-headed?’” “Hydra-headed” is all right, although it may be a little bit soft in the upper story, like some luckless wights who fall in “love” and become “insane,” as though all of us, according to the specialist, have a link or two lost and cankered in our complex mental machinery.

You ask in a sort of “spooney” fashion if there's any “sense” in this question: “Is not ‘love’ the theme of the poet, the plot [!] of the novelist, the background [!] of the artist, and the forte [can he mean motif?], of the musician, and without ‘love’ would not all these be a lost art?”

I retort, Yes, sir! Could there be any poetry without the poet? Any art without the artist? Any music without the musician? And am I not justified in declaring, figuratively speaking, that without “love” the theme of the poet, and the plot of the novelist, etc., is futile? “Love” could not wholly be the theme of poetry, nor the plot of the novel, since it would monopolize the business, but it can wholly be the theme of the poet, and the plot of the novelist. See? Relativ to the “motif of the musician,” why dabble in the words of “alliteration,” after almost exhausting your vocabulary of invectives on the same?

He says: “I have not deprecated the sentiment of patriotism, though I hold that dying for a problem is a poor way to solve it, and that a man who will forfeit his life to maintain any government as yet established is afflicted with an excess of enthusiasm.” When the bugle of war blew a blast in each patriot's ear, and Father Abraham kept his steady hand upon the helm of the Old Ship of State, three hundred thousand more chivalric sons responded to his call for volunteers. In the South the black man labored for little food and lashes; and over the question of slavery the South seceded and stigmatized the map of the Union. In fancy we can see them all—John McBride, my father, Henry Macdonald, your father. Your father was numbered with the slain, along with 279,376 brave privates panoplied with glory; my father is to-day a physical wreck. Did not your father and those heroes die to “solve the problem” of slavery and secession? And did they not nobly succeed? And would you, as a patriotic soldier's son, accuse them of being “afflicted with an excess of enthusiasm?” “I pause for a reply.”

CHAS. D. McBRIDE.

MR. EDITOR: Your correspondent, Mr. McBride, is improving. He is evidently stirred to his profoundest depths, and a person so roiled is sure to write more vigorously than when merely waiting for his dinner. If his championship of the tender passion does not win him the lasting regard of all young women who agree with him, then chivalry is dead. I believe, though, that a warrior bold with spurs of gold, singing merrily his lay, and therein vowing to live for love or die, is still appreciated by some members of the female sex. Touching that peculiar state of consciousness known as the feeling of love, I might point to the killings, the suicides, and the various abuses (some sixteen per cent of the whole) having their rise in this aberration of the intellect, but a sense of compassion, which I admit to be unscientific, deters me from drawing a statistic on Mr. McBride. Sometime when, instead of writing a composition for THE TRUTH SEEKER, he takes his pen in hand to inform his Dulcinea of the condition of his mind towards her; and when, years afterwards, he reflects on what he said to her, this little discussion will recur to him and he will acknowledge that I was more than half right. In which opinion his Dulcinea, if she be then his wife, will doubtless coincide. The seriousness of the love madness is diminished by the circumstance that it is temporary, and in general the cure may be safely entrusted to nature. I have not recommended an insane asylum, and am surprised that Mr. McBride should accuse me of having done so.

Concerning the lines of poetry your correspondent has adduced, it is of course admitted that all of their peculiarities, including rhythm and rhyme, are introduced for effect. Whether or not the effect is bad, the reader must judge. But what is permissible in poetry may be wholly out of place in prose writing.

I see that Mr. McBride does not grasp the point of my criticism of his dogmatic octopus. The fact is, the figure is defective, because dogmas are altogether foreign to the octopus. Orthodoxy has been likened to the octopus for the reason that it has many arms or tentacles (which reach into the state house, the court, the school, and the home), and therein lies the force of the comparison. Mr. McBride's acknowledgment of fallibility in the matter of grammar gives hope that his present opinion on the correctness of his figures may not be final. As to “argus-eyed” and “hydra-headed,” the former means no more than a watchful jailer, while the latter signifies a multifarious evil, or an evil having many points of action, and “hence not to be repressed by a single effort.” One may be argus-eyed and yet benevolent, while the hydra-headed is totally bad. Mr. McBride meant hydra-headed when he wrote the church down as argus-eyed. He has not as yet acquired the habit of fixing an idea clearly in his mind before transferring it to paper.

Concerning Freedom and Thomas Paine, Mr. McBride's remarks are somewhat trifling. Freedom is frequently personified as a woman, and there is nothing out of the way, that I can see, in the notion of her weeping at the grave of Thomas Paine, her devoted champion. We are told that she shrieked when Kosciusko fell. Says Mr. McBride: “Now, Mr. Macdonald, by the light of your own logic, does not your lines reflect incongruities?” I must reply that I do not think that my lines does. He also misses the point in syntax which I raised over his query whether the poet, painter, novelist, and musician, without love, would not be “a lost art.” Since these are not an art, but its agents, they might become lost artists, but not “a lost art.” My idea was to prompt Mr. McBride to find out the meaning of his own mental operations and then to express that meaning in terms which would convey it to the minds of his readers. I suggested “motif” as a substitute for the “forte” of the musician because, in music, forte means powerful, while motif has reference to the subject. Musical composition may be, in one sense, the forte of the musician, but his theme is called the motif, or motivo. The misuse of terms is almost as immoral as untruthfulness.

Mr. McBride's denial that he “exerted any painstaking efforts” when writing his essay makes us wish dinner had been ready sooner; also to hope that the cook was more conscientious than the writer. Really, Charles, you should be ashamed of that confession, for whenever you offer an essay for publication you should be able to say: “Here are the best thoughts on this subject that have come to me, and I have chosen my words with the greatest care that I am capable of exercising. Respect for my readers and for myself would deter me from doing less.” You would also practice condensation and save the Editor the trouble of flipping so much froth off your communications with a blue pencil before they are set up.

The closing paragraph of Mr. McBride's letter is bungled. He should have reserved it for July 4. G. E. M.

Book Notes.

Boston Ideas says of W. H. Maple's new book, “No Beginning, or the Fundamental Fallacy”: “The book is an immense satisfaction. It begins with a true premise. It stands on firm foundation. It has a deeply earnest motif. It manifests freshness of thought in all directions. Mr. Maple makes with his words a very clear path before the reader's thoughts. He does not attempt to confuse by intricacies of dissection, though necessarily the depths to which he delves throw up to light many a problem-working utterance. Straightforward clearness marks his method of placing abstractions in the mould of concreteness. Mr. Maple's book is one of whose publication to be glad. It places certain truths powerfully before the reader's thought, and it keeps so concentratedly to the point of expressing itself clearly and directly as to constitute, as a champion of reason, one of the very strongest of essays we have ever read. Price of the book $1. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

A volume of 139 pages bearing the title of “Crimes of Preachers in the United States and Canada” may be accounted among the oddest literary curiosities of the day. The work, which purports to contain a list of offenses committed by pastors of churches of all denominations, was first published in 1881, and the present volume is the fifth edition of the book and brings the list of offenders down to the present year. The list is transcribed from newspapers, and certainly makes an imposing array of crime committed by professed teachers of morality and religion. They silently wandered, in pairs, and alone,
But took the direction the halo had flown,
And soon, lying under the southernmost wall,
They found the great halo, not damaged at all.

Children's Corner.

Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Lament of a Little Girl.

My brother Will, he used to be
The nicest kind of girl;
He wore a little dress like me,
And had his hair in curl.
We played with dolls and tea-sets then
And every kind of toy,
But all those good old times are gone—
Will's turned into a boy.

Mamma has made him little suits,
With pockets in the pants.
And cut off all his yellow curls
And sent them to my aunts.
And Will, he was so pleased, I believe
He almost jumped with joy,
But I must own I didn't like
Will turned into a boy.

And now he plays with horrid tops
I don't know how to spin
And marbles that I try to shoot,
But never hit or win.
And leap-frog—I can't give a back
Like Charley, Frank, or Roy.
Oh, no one knows how bad I feel
Since Will has turned a boy.

I have to wear frocks just the same,
And now they're mostly white.
I have to sit and just be good,
While Will can climb and fight,
But I must keep my dresses nice,
And wear my hair in curl,
And worse—oh, worstest thing of all—
I have to stay a girl.

A Letter from a Musical Student.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Perhaps you have not forgotten my having occasionally written you from Canon City, Col. About six months ago, in the freshness of their spring robe, I left, for a time, the wild and beautiful Rockies for the purpose of attending the musical department of "Bethany College and Conservatory of Music" in this little Swedish world, or Young Sweden as it is familiarly known. Often have I—in the heat of summer—sighed for a breath of the cooling western breeze and a draught from some rippling mountain-stream or gushing spring.

This little Swedish settlement is situated in the valley of the Smoky river, and is one of those numerous central points of the United States. It is also a central point of its own individual state. The town is small, surrounded by an extensive farming country, and these, the sturdy folk from the land of the midnight sun, are a live, industrious, and prosperous people. They are in this particular progressive and justly proud of their educational facilities. Bethany is young and growing steadily. It may be truly said that religion is the only whim these people tolerate. (Is there no possibility of our people establishing an institution even better through the extinction of this relic?) Its art, its music, its literary work, all its educational resources, are of high order. The school is a Lutheran institution and although superstition is thoroughly diffused throughout, I am glad to say that in at least one particular it is not of the radical orthodox type.

A few days since, I heard a new student—to use a Western expression, a tenderfoot—in the mathematical department define Algebra to a younger student as "a species of arithmetic;" therefore I feel safe in saying that this Lutheran superstition is a species rather than a branch of the old tree.

The people are constant attendants at church, but, unlike many other sects, they are rather liberal on the first day of the week and seem not so fearful that they will desecrate the "American Sabbath." The day with them is never too good on which to perform necessary work. We often have on Sunday band entertainments in the park or practice for chorus, band, or orchestra when a concert is near at hand. Although other sects might take a week day for it, should circumstances require it, they might even swear on Sunday.

The students of the school number over four hundred. The professors of music and painting are artists of a high order. The little Swedish settlement is even now noted for its music and art. An auditorium with a seating capacity of four thousand was lately completed and dedicated to education by a series of six grand concerts, which were, through rain and mud, attended by fully three thousand people. We had a chorus of three hundred voices and a band and orchestra of over one hundred pieces. Yes, on this occasion the storm king favored us once again. He has been quite attentive the past season, particularly on noted occasion. However, at intervals he has allowed to some extent a realization of what a dry season in Kansas means.

During the past summer, living near the open windows of a popular church, I received many a draught of religious enthusiasm, which, together with the hot winds, were sufficient warnings of the "wrath to come." I now have a better realization of that distant clime.

I once overheard a conversation on "Books," by a company of young people. One of the company—a young man—was dilating on the attractive features of a certain religious work. His remarks were concluded with the statement that the book contained the most "graphic description of heaven" which he had ever had the pleasure of reading. It struck me as on a parallel with that exclamation so often used by Christians on beholding a so-called likeness of Christ—"Oh, how very natural." Not having made their acquaintance I was unable to ascertain by what source the speaker was enabled to judge of a description of a country so unknown and remote. However, returning to my subject, I have the past summer felt that, had I sufficient command of geographical terms, I might give a "graphic" description of the opposite region. At any rate, I can now in better grace pardon Dante for his "Infernal Regions," as I have been able to feel something akin to the probable inspiration of Holmes in his production of "The Hot Season."

But autumn, with its frosty mornings, sunny noons, and beautiful sunsets, is with us once again. We need think no more of the heated summer winds until their return, and let us hope some western gold excitement, or the redemption of silver, will then have called us where, through the beautiful pines, sigh the cool, fresh breezes of far away mountain-tops, where snow and flowers are companions even on a mid-summer day.

No Quarrel With Jesus.

A friend of mine living in Middlebury, Vermont, told me of an old farmer who lived in a neighboring village and who, at the age of 96, found the "machinery" refusing its work as in former days and so made up his mind that he must die. The old man, though a sometime attendant on church, was not a member, but he had a pious daughter, who called in her clergyman (Rev. Mr. Bacon) to see her father. The clergyman, among other questions, asked the old man if he had made his peace with Jesus. "Made my peace with Jesus?" said the nonagenarian, "why, he and I never had any quarrel."

This is a true story.

Correspondence.

NEW YORK CITY, Oct. 27, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my second letter to the Corner. Quite a length of time has passed away, however, since I last wrote. I am now in the sixth grade in the grammar department. I have been at the head of my class ever since I was promoted into it in September.

My mother and grandpa (L. G. Reed) took me to Hardman's Hall to hear you at the Freethought Congress last evening. We all thought your lecture was splendid. I wanted to hear Miss Wixon very much, for I have some books written by you.

I am a Freethinker now, and mean to be one always. Often the girls in school ask me what my religion is? My answer is always, "I have none." I take music lessons, and have some very pretty pieces.

Your loving friend, ESTELLE BOYD.
[My dear Estelle, it would have been a great pleasure to have taken you by the hand at Hardman Hall, also your mamma and grandpa. When the girls at school ask you what your religion is, tell them it is to do good and be good.—ED. C. C.]

BELLEVUE, KY., Nov. 5, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write to the Corner once more. It has been nearly a year since I wrote last. I have been reading the Children's Corner every time papa gets THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I think Aunty Bright's lecture was very nice. My papa has a large picture of Thomas Paine and also the complete works of Paine. Papa is going to celebrate his (Paine's) birthday by inviting some of his friends and sending up some fireworks.

We had quite an exciting time at our Bellevue schools this week. The school board tried to have the Bible read in school, but the mayor and papa and a great many more of the people would not allow it. My teacher is a Catholic, and mamma says that if they read the Bible in school she (my teacher) would have the right to bring her prayer-book.

You asked me some questions when I last wrote you which I cannot answer, as I am only eleven years old, and do not know enough, but hope to be able to answer them some day. NELLIE J. HELD.

[An interesting letter, which we trust may be followed by others from Nellie. Papa has helped to gain a great victory in excluding the Bible from the public schools. Such schools should be entirely secular.—Ed. C. C.]

Health and Happiness.

II.—OBSERVATIONS ON THE ART OF NURSING.

Birth is a physiological process quite in harmony with the natural laws which prevail throughout the vegetable and animal kingdoms. The new product inherits all the parental properties which are the inherited qualities of those parents' ancestors, in addition to the tendencies acquired during the period of their existence. But although the infant at birth possesses all these endowments, the experience, culture, and education must begin anew with every newly born being. All mothers of the intelligent class of animals nurse, aid, care for, and nourish their young more or less. This is especially noticeable among birds and mammals. The infant of the higher vertebrate class is, for a time at least, dependent on its maternal parent for support. She watches over her babe, protects, guides, trains, and instructs it, and, so to speak, prepares it for an independent existence. She exhibits all the primary qualities of maternal duty, and, with instinctively motherly love, carefully guards her young against unnecessary exposure or injury. She is not without solicitude, anxiety, and pity, and, according to the intelligence she possesses, usually makes every exertion to surround the little one with all the comfort in her power to bestow. The human mother, endowed with intelligence of the highest degree, should be still more watchful in the particular care she gives her young, which contributes so largely to her own happiness. A mother who wishes to have her babe healthy, well-nourished, and prosperous must be observant, diligent, and painstaking, that she may notice every change in the infant in case anything occurs that is not quite in conformity with health.

Size of the Infant. The body of the child at the moment of birth varies in length from 16 to 21 inches. The male infant generally measures one inch and a quarter more than the female. It increases during the first month about one-quarter to one-half inches in length, one inch for the second month, five-eighths of an inch for the third, and one-quarter to three-eighths for the following months. The child increases in size, during the first year, about seven and a half inches; for the second year about three and five-eighths inches; for the third year two and three-fourths inches; for the fourth and fifth year about two and a half inches; and in the six following years about two and a quarter inches a year. The size of the child doubles during the first six years. An insufficient alimentation (or feeding), scrofulous bones, rickets, etc., retard the growth; acute febrile (feverish) diseases act in the opposite way; a too rapid growth enfeebles the child and makes it pale and thin, and it requires nourishment and hygienic attention accordingly.

Weight of the Infant. The weight of the infant varies from five to nine pounds, and averages about six and a half pounds at the time of birth. The male weighs more than the female, there being a difference of from four to eight ounces. Immediately after birth, the child loses weight in consequence of the evacuation of meconium and urine, and the elimination by the skin and lungs—a loss not counterbalanced by the alimentation, which is not yet very abundant. The diminution of weight continues for about the first three or four days, the loss in all being about three or four ounces. Frequently, on the first day, the diminution is three and a quarter ounces, and ceases about the third or fourth day, if the child is nourished naturally, or a little later if nourished artificially. The average increase of weight is from three-fourths of an ounce to one ounce per day during the first five months; from five to seven ounces the seven following months, and it weighs at the end of the year about twenty-one pounds, almost the triple of its initial weight. At seven years of age the child weighs nearly twice as much—forty to forty-five pounds—and at the age of fourteen, the weight is ninety pounds, more or less. The weight of the adult is twenty times the weight of the newly born. It is important, in order to be well assured that the nourishment of the infant by the mother is satisfactory, to ascertain, by weighing it regularly, whether the increase in weight is normal. The infant ought to be weighed immediately after birth, as soon as dressed. The weighing should be repeated every two or three days, always at the same hour, during the first few weeks; then every eight days up to about six months, and every fifteen days during the rest of the year. The time selected for these examinations ought to be furthest removed from the last nursing, and the result written down in a book kept for that purpose. Thus the mother may learn the actual increase of the weight of her baby. An increase of weight of about two-thirds of an ounce to one ounce per day during the first month may be considered normal, and all children who do not gain two-thirds of an ounce per day may be regarded as ailing or badly nourished. To this rule there are exceptions, however.

The Temperature of the infant at birth is slightly higher than that of the mother; later, it is the same as in the adult. (Normal temperature, 99.5.) M. D.

ROBT G. INGERSOLL

The Field-Ingersoll Discussion. Price, paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

In 1888 the Rev. Dr. Henry M. Field wrote an open letter to Colonel Ingersoll, with the intent to convert him. The letter was published in the North American Review, and was replied to by the person addressed. All our older readers know the value of this discussion. To those who do not remember it we can only say that they should lose no time in procuring a copy if they want a controversial treat.

The Ingersoll-Gladstone Controversy about Christianity. Price, paper, 25 cts; cloth, 50 cts.

When the Field-Ingersoll Controversy closed in the North American Review the Christians felt that their champion had been very badly worsted in argument, and the publishers of the Review engaged the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone to attempt to rehabilitate the Presbyterian creed. He wrote a long letter to Colonel Ingersoll, to which the latter replied at length and, it is generally agreed, completely demolished the greatest controversialist Christianity can produce. These letters are now for the first time available in pamphlet form.

Myth and Miracle. Price, 25c.

This is one of Colonel Ingersoll's best lectures, but never before put into print. Everyone who has heard it will most certainly want it, and those who have not heard it will have a rare treat in its perusal, as something new from the Colonel, which also is something that everybody is looking for.

Which Way? Price, 25 cents.

This lecture is a consideration of the difference between the natural and the supernatural, and some reasons why the former is the best way to go. Perhaps no one of Colonel Ingersoll's orations has won more general applause from enlightened audiences than this. It contains that most magnificent of perorations, his visions—"This was. This is. This shall be." The lecture was never before printed in pamphlet form. It is splendid. Send for it.

NOT IN TRADE.—She: "A penny for your thoughts." He: "I have none for sale. I am a free thinker."

FRIEND: "Are you happy?" Spirit (through medium): "Perfectly so." "Can you state what has pleased you most since you left us?" "The epitaph on my tombstone. It both amazes and delights me."—Texas Siftings.

JINKS: "Smithson strikes me as being a sort of religious broker, but I'm blamed if I can tell whether he's a bull or a bear." FILKINS: "Why not?" JINKS: "Because he's long on countenance and short on works."—Harlem Life.

ST. PETER: "You had five different failures while on earth, had you not?" Wraith: "Yes, sir; but I always settled in full with my preferred creditors." St. Peter: "Well, I'll send for St. Paul, and if I can get him to refund to me, may be I'll let you in."—Puck.

"The actions of some of these reformers," said the cornfed philosopher, "remind me much of the way my father used to pull weeds in the garden for about a minute to show me how easy it was. Then he would go off and sit down in the shade and leave me to keep at it all the forenoon."—Indianapolis Journal.

A CLERGYMAN asked an uneducated woman whether she liked his written or unwritten sermons the best. After thinking for a few moments she said: "Why, I like you best without the book, because you keep saying the same thing over and over again; and that helps me remember what I hear a good deal better."—Tit-Bits.

THE Boston Journal says that Johnny and Willie, aged respectively six and four years, were engaged in a hot discussion as to their ages. Willie of course claimed to be the older of the two, whereupon Johnny replied: "You ain't either the oldest, 'cause when I was born you wasn't nuffin' but dust layin' round up in heaven."

A SAGO young man who lives some distance out of town went to church Sunday on his wheel and as he was getting off was spoken to by one of the good brothers and reproved for using a wheel on the Lord's day and especially for using it in going to church. The young man turned around and looking at the horse that was covered with foam from his journey in the hot sun, remarked that in his opinion it was much more Christian like to use a wheel on such a hot day than go to church with a horse and then let him stand in the sun. The deacon was squelched.

BRIDGET O'HOOIHAN, an elderly Irish cook, had been induced to go to a quiet little suburban town to live in a wealthy gentleman's family. Two weeks after her arrival she declared her intention of returning to the city. "Why do you leave us, Bridget?" asked her mistress, in arieved tone. "We pay you the very highest wages." "Ye do, ma'am, an' yer a perfect leddy. Or'm not lavin' troo anny fault av de fam'ly, but this place is such a dead old place, wid no chance to do annything loively in it, that, begorry, oi hav to mek up a pack o' lies iv'ry toime oi go to confession, or oi'd hav nothing to confess!"—Harper's Drawer.

CHARLES A. DAVIS has been training with Colonel "Bob" Ingersoll so long that his mind naturally runs on the future state of mankind. He has an unfortunate impediment in his speech, but says Ingersoll can talk enough for both of them. The other day he was sitting in his office in Broadway gazing dreamily out of the window. An actor sauntered in and sat down by his side. "Charley" turned upon him those large blue eyes of his and asked somewhat abruptly: "Are you an Ag-g-g-gnostic?" "What's that? What's that?" "What's that?" asked the man, with a puzzled look. "D-d-d-do you believe in h-h-hell? Are you an Agnostic?" "Hell? Yes; I'm er—well, I'm again Roosevelt every time."—New York Herald.

AN editor, who died of starvation after making Dr. Tanner ashamed of himself, was being escorted to heaven by an angel who had been sent for that purpose. "May I look at the other place before we ascend to eternal happiness?" asked the editor. "Easy," said the angel. So they went below and skirmished around, taking in the sights. The angel lost track of the editor and went around hedges to hunt him up. He found him by a big furnace, fanning himself and gazing in rapture at a lot of people in the fire. There was a sign on the furnace which read, "Delinquent Subscribers." "Get a move on you," said the angel; "we must go." "You go on," said the editor; "I am not coming. This is heaven enough for me."

It cannot undertake to shield from the annoyance of their own bigotry and intolerance, those who imagine that others should do as they do and believe as they believe.—American Sentinel.

LET us assure to the individual an increasing measure of personal freedom. Dissolve legal darkness, dissipate political clouds, break down all barriers of law which keep men apart. Let the Sunday alone. The conscience will take care of the Sunday. Trust more to men and less to law. Do not spend too much time upon political movements. Remember the social monitors and conventions—the unregistered gods, who, after all, are the preservers of social health and the inspirers of social development. Let the political class disappear. Do not murder it. Outgrow it. Pass it by as the tree in autumn sheds its leaves.—Horace L. Traubel.

WALT WHITMAN.

Thou stood'st alone and sang'st thine unschooled song,
The crowds passed on and did not deign to hear
Or answered thy new music with a jeer;
But still above the hootings of the throng
Thy voice rose resolute, complacent, strong,
Till one by one thy listeners drew near.
And, when they heard, they marked thee as a peer
Of those great souls that to all time belong.
The pretty thoughts of pretty little men
Were not for thee to utter; strong and rude,
Upwelling from an ever untamed heart,
They flowed unhindered from an untamed pen,
Thy soul, content in its own solitude,
Refused the paints and pedantries of art.
—Sam Walter Foss, in Conservator.

IT is the duty of every man to destroy the superstitions of his time, and yet there are thousands of men and women, fathers and mothers, who repudiate with their whole hearts the creeds of superstition, and still allow their children to be taught these lies. They allow their imaginations to be poisoned with the dogma of eternal pain. They allow arrogant and ignorant parsons, meek and foolish teachers, to sow the seeds of barbarism in the minds of their children—seeds that will fill their lives with fear and pain. Nothing can be more important to a human being than to be free and live without fear. It is far better to be a mortal free man than an immortal slave. Fathers and mothers should do their utmost to make their children free. They should teach them to doubt, to investigate, to inquire, and every father and mother should know that by the cradle of every child, as by the cradle of the infant Hercules, crawls the serpent of superstition.—Ingersoll.

ETHNOLOGY in its true sense represents the application of the principles of inductive philosophy to the products of man's faculties. You are aware that that philosophy proceeds from observed facts alone; it discards all preconceived opinions concerning these facts; it renounces all allegiance to dogma, or doctrine, or intuition; in short, to every form of statement that is not capable of verification. Its method of procedure is by comparison, that is, by the logical equations of similarity and diversity, of identity and difference; and on these it bases those generalizations which range the isolated fact under the general law, of which it is at once the exponent and the proof. By such comparisons, ethnology aims to define in clear terms the influence which the geographical and other environments exercise on the individual, the social group, and the race; and, conversely, how much in each remains unaltered by the external forces, and what residual elements are left, defiant of surroundings, wholly personal, purely human. Thus, rising to wider and wider circles of observation and generalization, it will be able at last to offer a conclusiv and exhaustive connotation of what man is—a necessary preliminary, mark you, to that other question, so often and so ignorantly answered in the past as to what he should be.—Prof. D. G. Brinton.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

News of the Week.

THERE is much disaffection in Turkey and revolution may come.

A NEW ministry has come into power in Turkey with Hali Rifat Pasha as Grand Vizier.

ON NOV. 7th Timothy Healy was removed from the Executive Committee of the Irish National League.

THERE was a million-dollar fire at the corner of Broadway and Bleecker street, N. Y., on election night.

THE explosion of a locomotive on the Lehigh & Hudson railroad on Nov. 10th near Warwick, N. Y., killed four men.

THE council of the Choctaw nation has decreed that discussion of land allotment is treason and punishable with death.

NEARLY all maritime traffic in and about New York harbor was stopped last week for more than five days owing to a dense fog.

FIVE leaders in the Vegetarian riots in China in which English missionaries were killed were beheaded at Foochow on Nov. 7th.

THERE is more trouble in Armenia, and extensive massacres are reported, while reforms are promised by the Sultan's government.

THE Spanish government will, it is said, offer the Cubans modified home rule, and it is predicted that the latter will refuse to accept it.

MAYOR STRONG's new board of Park Commissioners consists of W. A. Stiles, Samuel McMillan, Smith Ely, and S. V. R. Cruger.

THE Leather Trust on Nov. 4th shut down the 100 tanneries under its control for 60 days, thus throwing 15,000 men out of employment.

SIOUX CITY is to have a glucose factory which will use 15,000 bushels of corn daily, and will be the second largest establishment of its kind in the world.

THE Chinese government has appointed Li Hung Chang Imperial Commissioner Extraordinary to suppress the Durgans' rebellion in the Northwest provinces.

REAR ADMIRAL ROBERT W. SHUFELDT of the United States Navy died at Washington on Nov. 7th. He was born in Red Hook, Dutchess Co., N. Y., Feb. 21, 1822.

AN overwhelming majority of the electors of New York cast their ballots for the appropriation of $9,000,000 for the improvement of the canal system of the state.

EUGENE FIELD, the poet, died in Chicago of heart disease on the morning of Nov. 4th. Mr. Field was also a humorist and journalist. He was born in St. Louis Sept. 2, 1850.

THE new, Bourgeois, ministry in France has forced the retirement of M. Christophle, head of the Credit Foncier, and promises to reopen the question of the Panama scandal.

ON NOV. 7th fifty Brooklyn clergymen met and organized for the purpose of securing the enforcement of the Sunday exercise and Sunday laws in that city.

THE morning dailies are rapidly coming down to one cent. Two of the latest to reduce their price from two cents to one cent are the New York Morning Journal and the Chicago Tribune.

THE premises and plant of the Illustrated American were destroyed by fire on the morning of Nov. 10th. The building contained the finest collection of photographs and drawings in America.

INSURGENT victories are reported from Cuba, and public meetings in Philadelphia, Boston, and elsewhere in the United States adopt resolutions demanding the recognition of the belligerency of the revolutionists.

NEW YORK Spiritualists have brought out a play, called "Miraoula," said to have been written under the direction of the spirit of Bartley Campbell. The opening performance was given on Nov. 8th at the town hall, Flushing, L. I.

THE Detroit Journal building was wrecked by a boiler explosion on Nov. 6th. More than thirty bodies have already been taken out and there are also a large number of injured. The collapsed part included the mailing department, the engine and the stereotypers, and also Hiller & Co.'s book bindery.

HERR LUTGENAU, a Socialist leader, who has been returned to the German Reichstag after a rebalot in the district of Dortmund, has been sentenced to five months' imprisonment on the charge of treason for reproducing in his newspaper, the Arbeiter-Zeitung, an article headed, "Another of These Imperial Speeches."

THE South Carolina Constitutional Convention has adopted the suffrage article. Qualifications for suffrage until Jan. 1, 1898, are either ability to read and write, payment of taxes on $300 worth of property, or ability to understand and explain a section of the Constitution when read. After 1898 the latter alternative is stricken off, leaving only a simple educational or property qualification. Those who cannot be registered for voting include all convicted of various crimes, omitting crimes of blood-guiltiness.

ANDREW CARNEGIE gave a million-dollar library building to Pittsburg. It was dedicated on Nov. 5th. The World says: "One of the great features of the library art section will be the perfect reproduction of sixteen of the greatest pieces of sculpture in the world. As a great howl against the nude has been raised the Board of Trustees decided to-day to add a slight drapery to the figures. Pittsburg sentiment in this respect, however, had been anticipated. The casts were made in London and each was furnished with a fig leaf, which could be taken off or left on. So, if Pittsburg feeling undergoes any change after acquaintance with the statues, a return to the original plan of the promoters will cause no expense. But this may involve some danger. While an attendant to-day was adjusting the fig leaf on Apoxyomenos, representing an athlete, the figure fell over and was smashed to pieces."

QUEEN RANAVALONA of Madagascar in the new treaty with France definitely recognizes the French protectorate, "with all its consequences." France will be represented at Antananarivo by a resident-general, who will control all external questions and dealings with foreigners, as well as the interior administration of the island. France assumes no responsibility with regard to engagements, debts, or concessions that the government of the queen may have undertaken prior to the signing of the treaty. This would seem to indicate that the Waller concession would not be interfered with if its legality can be maintained.

THE Democrats of Albany elected James Campbell Matthews recorder by a majority of 2,000. It is said to be the most substantial honor ever conferred on a Negro-American. The recorder of the city of Albany has the power to perform all the acts and duties that may be performed by a judge of the superior court in chambers, including proceedings supplementary to execution; he may sit in the court of Special Sessions; is ex-officio member of several important boards; in certain cases he acts with the state Board of Canvassers in canvassing election returns, and in case of riot he may call out the militia in his jurisdiction to aid the civil authorities in suppressing violence. In 1885 President Cleveland selected Mr. Matthews to succeed Fred Douglas as Recorder of the District of Columbia, but the Senate rejected the nomination, the opposition being led by John J. Ingalls, who coined the expression, "A black Democrat is a monstrosity."

THE results of the elections on the 5th inst. are, briefly, these: The Republicans carried Ohio by a plurality of about 100,000, defeating Ex-Governor Campbell, Democrat. In the legislative districts the Republican plurality is much greater, giving the Republicans a very large majority and insuring the election of a United States Senator of that party to succeed Brice, Democrat. In Pennsylvania the Republicans were triumphant by a majority of about 170,000. New York is Republican by 97,000, and the legislature is overwhelmingly Republican. In the city, Tammany won by about 20,000, electing all its candidates, while the Democratic state ticket ran ahead of Tammany some 30,000. In the 10th Congressional district Amos Cummings, Democrat, was elected to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Campbell, Republican. In Kentucky, Bradley, Republican, is elected governor over Hardin, Democrat, by a plurality approaching 10,000. The legislature is also Republican, giving them a United States Senator, another gain. Maryland also went Republican, electing Lounsbury governor by a plurality of 19,000. The legislature will elect a Republican U. S. Senator to succeed Gibson, Democrat. Republican successes in Kentucky and Maryland are remarkable. In Mississippi the Democrats won by 25,000. Utah adopted the new constitution and becomes the 45th state, giving the Republicans two more United States Senators. Massachusetts re-elected Greenhalge, Republican, governor by a plurality of about 65,000. An unofficial advisory vote was taken on the question of municipal suffrage for women, both men and women voting, and the proposition was defeated by an adverse majority of 77,000. In Nebraska the Republicans defeated the Populists by something like 15,000 plurality. Iowa elected a Republican governor and other state officers by a plurality of 75,000. In Virginia the Democrats elected two-thirds of the members of the legislature who were selected this year. New Jersey elected a Republican governor by a plurality of 22,000, the first time in twenty-seven years that that party has elected a governor in New Jersey. Mayor Pingree was re-elected in Detroit by a heavy majority.

SOME SNAKES IN THE GRASS.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, ; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

Darwin and After Darwin

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professional naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers: "Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible, and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world.

The Great "Moral Risk" of Preaching.

We should think that by this time Christian men and women would understand that God doesn't like ministers, and that the clerical is an "extra-hazardous" vocation. Every few days, at the most, we read in the dailies of the sudden taking-off of a preacher. Many are stricken down in the pulpit itself, while in the act of breaking the bread of life to the perishing. Clearly, these are dispensations of divine providence, heavenly warnings and visitations. Suppose that Colonel Ingersoll or S. P. Putnam or Susan H. Wixon should drop dead while speaking in a Freethought meeting—would not the fact be heralded from one end of the land to the other as "another smiting of the blasphemer by the hand of God"? Why, to make up the deficiency in actual dispensations of this kind conscientious Christian hoaxers now and again invent "blasphemers" and "judgments" upon them and telegraph and furnish to the newspaper syndicates careful descriptions of the first and detailed and horrifying accounts of the latter. This is merely preliminary to stating that on October 9th Rev. Samuel Y. Lum, a retired Presbyterian clergyman and missionary, was struck at Rutherford, N. J., by an express train and instantly killed, and that on October 6th Rev. Lawrence Lorain Langstroth, one of the oldest and best known divines in the Presbyterian church, was stricken with "apoplexy"—undoubtedly a miserable medical euphemism for "hand of God"—in his pulpit at Dayton, Ohio, and a few moments later expired in the arms of two physicians who happened to be in the congregation. Additional emphasis is given to this last "dispensation" by the fact that Mr. Langstroth had been retired from the active ministry for some years on account of his age, but had been called on this occasion to assist in special communion services and to deliver the address of the morning. Besides being a noted minister, Mr. Langstroth had done some useful work in the world, for he was the inventor of the famous Langstroth movable frame hive now used by bee-keepers in all parts of the country. Yahveh was always of an unreliable, petulant temper, according to the Bible, and it is probable that he hit Mr. Langstroth in a sudden outburst for the latter's participation in the communion incantation at the age of eighty-five, when he was certainly old enough to know better.

For and Against Peace and Civilization.

In the literary department of the Evening Post of November 9th inst., an editorial writer indicates some of the forces that are operating to make war unpopular and to unite the various races and nations in fraternal bonds. Referring first to the strong feeling of international friendliness produced by the rapid growth of Socialism, particularly in France and Germany, he continues:

"Besides the reasons for amity between nations which industrialism furnishes, the close intercourse which prevails between scientists is another bond that makes for peace; it would seem almost like a contradiction in terms for the scientific men of France and Germany to wish to go to war with each other—at least to engage in anything more than a war of arguments."

It is indeed inconceivable that the peaceful emulation of scientific investigators should lead to the perpetuation of the war insanity. Science makes for peace. Scientific men become acquainted, through their studies and publications, personally and by correspondence, and there is nothing to induce them to fly at each others' throats. Only in so far as they are still under the maleficent influence of religion and provincial patriotism will they encourage international quarrels. We feel instinctively that the scientific student who becomes excited in discussing politics and religion and expresses hatred of nations other than his own and of religionists who do not accept the creed professed by his mother, is at the most not more than half emancipated from the dominion of the old disturbing superstitions, and that his brain has not been cooled by the dispassionate methods of inductive reasoning. Literature, art, music, all have the same influence as science. In this connection the Post remarks:

"And now comes a new tie which, according to M. Brunetiere in the Revue des Deux Mondes, will do much to make France (the country most to be feared) look with more friendly eyes upon the nations of the North. This is the absorbing interest which she is taking at the present moment in the literatures of the North. When one is just awaking to the power and beauty of the life of a people as depicted by its great novelists and dramatists, one is not in the humor for taking up arms against that people."

Archæological investigations, undertaken by the more or less closely federated scientific societies of the world, also tend to make war unpopular. Freedom of international commerce; the dissemination of the books of each nation among the other nations; art and musical interchange; intermarriage; railways, telegraphs, telephones, all the agencies that cheapen transportation and make travel easy and safe, have their influence for peace. These may be called—taking them to include many not enumerated—the affirmative forces of modern civilization. They all are helpful to man and will eventually disband the armies of the world.

The negative forces are primarily race prejudice and religious exclusiveness. They are making about all the trouble now between the nations, aided by sensational journalism. When the people, under the uplifting impulse of science, art, literature, industry, and free commerce, become sufficiently enlightened to want the news that heralds the real progress of the race, instead of the chronicles of courts and cabinets, the bloody records of armies and navies, the daily paper will be almost wholly a truly educational and moralizing power; as it is to-day, apparently compelled to cater to the least desirable elements in human nature, it is so bad in many ways that at times one is tempted to believe that it does more harm than good. But probably this would be an extreme view to take; we will give the press the benefit of the doubt. However, there can be no question that it stands next to the pulpit in the extent to which it misleads the people. If we depended upon the daily paper for our information concerning reform movements and the principles that underlie them, we should know almost nothing about either that could be safely assumed to be fair or accurate. As before said, except the pulpit, the daily press is the least trustworthy of our sources of information.

But this is partly a digression—what we wished to say was that at present—as during the ages that have passed—religion is one of the most potent breeders of war. The so-called "Eastern Question" is very largely a question of religious differences and hatreds. In it are inextricably blended the issues that divide the Mohammedan and the Christian, and the Greek, Roman, and Protestant families of Christianity. In India there is perpetual jealousy and conflict between the Mohammedan and the Hindoo, greatly intensified and extended by the presence and dominance of the Christian. Mohammedan and Christian civilizations front each other throughout Africa, and they both war against the more primitive religions of the natives. Christianity is forcing its missionaries into China at the point of the bayonet, and it compels the Chinese authorities to execute by wholesale those Chinamen who forcibly object to the invasion. Were China equipped for war as are the Christian nations, the world would be shaken to its very center by the greatest religious struggle that ever deluged it in blood for the love of heaven.

Into the internal politics of every Christian nation enters the religious issue in one form or another. And it is everywhere an apple of discord, a firebrand threatening the temples of order and liberty. In Russia the orthodox Christian of the Greek church hates and persecutes the Jew and the Stundist. In Italy the Pope of the Roman church sullenly demands temporal sovereignty. In France there is simply an armed truce between the church and the state. In Germany Protestant reactionists join hands with the Catholics in the attempt to make illegal the discussion of religion and marriage, and the Jew is harried by the anti-Semites. In Spain and the South and Central American Republics the Protestants fare hardly at the hands of their Catholic brethren, and the Freethinkers receive more than their share of religious missiles. In Sweden to publicly advocate anti-Christian views means fines and imprisonment. Austria is intolerant of Free Religion, and at Jerusalem only Turkish soldiers keep the warring Christians from exterminating each other. Manitoba is torn by dissensions and threatens to secede from the Dominion because of a quarrel growing out of minor differences in a creed. In Ireland only the restraining hand of England prevents Catholics and Protestants from constantly fighting. England, Scotland, and Wales are always in more or less of a fever over church establishment and disestablishment. England is in a bitter struggle with the question of religious teaching in the public schools, and throughout the United Kingdom the Freethinker can make no bequest to a Freethought society and one-seventh of the time is monopolized in the interest of the church. In Mexico the Roman church is striving fiercely to recover the civil power she lost when Benito Juarez struck her chains from the limbs of his countrymen. In the United States and Canada the Freethinker and the Adventist are under the thumbs of Catholic and orthodox Protestant, THE TRUTH SEEKER is shut out of the Canadian mails, the aggressive Sunday law advocates are winning victories on every hand over the rights of man, and throughout the country the law-making bodies are acceding to the demands of Christians that their conceptions of truth and right be made obligatory upon all the citizens of the republic.

In a word, religion everywhere brings hatred, strife, and tyranny. With race animosity and venal or cowardly journalism it stands barring the march of science, art, literature, industrial comity, the fraternity of communities and peoples.

Hypocrisy Extraordinary.

THE TRUTH SEEKER assumes that none of its regular readers was deceived by any of the pretenses urged during the present Sunday closing crusade by our Police Commissioners in their own behalf or by their newspaper and clerical backers. But if we are mistaken, here are two little facts which throw a wonderful amount of light on their Jesuitical pleadings: It was very often said that the crusade was justified by the evil nature of the traffic which was most affected by Sunday closing. In the dailies of November 13th we learn that William Dihm, Secretary of the Retail Flower Dealers' Protective Association, complained to Captain Pickett, of the West Thirtieth Street Police Station, that the wholesalers and street peddlers were actually selling on Sunday such demoralizing articles as cut flowers. Captain Pickett at once detailed a roundsman to investigate, and that officer reported that the charges were true, that there was a large business done, especially in delivering on Sunday the flowers ordered on Saturday night, churches and funerals requiring a great many of "God's" beautiful and fragrant "gifts." Thereupon Captain Pickett instructed his men to notify all dealers that the business must be stopped. Then a delegation of the dealers called on the captain to present their side of the case.

"There are about 150 florists in the city who have a Sunday trade. On an average they sell $75 worth each Sunday or about $11,000 altogether. 'The authorities might as well try to stop funerals on Sunday as the sale of flowers,' said Mr. Thorley. 'It is neither practicable nor sensible to refuse to permit the delivery of flowers on Sunday. We supply twelve or thirteen churches with flowers and plants. Among our customers for Sunday flowers are some people prominent in the reform movement, and many people who are strictly religious. It is folly to say we could deliver the flowers on Saturday. They would never suit. Flowers are so perishable that they must be delivered on the day they are used.'"

Of course we are very glad that the churches and some pious "reformers" are getting their fingers pinched in their own trap, but the incident shows how little the character of the traffic has to do with the fight against the saloons, as, indeed, had already been shown by the numerous arrests for the crime of selling ice, hose, handkerchiefs, and other unquestionably "moral" articles. Another claim of the authorities was that they were enforcing the law "because it was the law"; they often insinuated and sometimes openly asserted that they did not like the law, but so long as it was on the statute book they were bound by their oath to enforce it to the best of their ability, without discrimination—but, by the way, they did discriminate. Now Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Parker and Mr. Andrews, of the Police Board, go to the dinner of the Methodist Union on the evening of November 12th, and Mr. Roosevelt makes a speech in which he demands more law so that he can still more oppressively enforce the law now on the book. His men cannot enter a saloon at any hour without a warrant; Mr. Roosevelt wants the law amended so that they can, and he wants several other changes in the same direction. And this is the man who has told us so often that he was enforcing the Sunday excise law and the Sunday laws merely because they were laws and he wanted to discipline his men! He did not like the laws himself—and now he wants more of them! Mr. Roosevelt declares that while "the election went the other way" "it will not alter our course in the least." In other words, while professing to enforce the law as the will of the majority, he will continue to enforce it after the majority of those affected by it have declared that they do not want it! Is it or is it not true that all laws derive their validity from the consent of the governed?

At the swearing in of recruits to the German guard the other day, Emperor William said to them: "You should trust to God to preserve your own honor, and be faithful to your emperor and country, whether against a foreign or domestic foe." William strangely neglected to tell the young warriors how their honor could be preserved by any other person, even by a god. To us it appears indisputable that honor is an attribute or a part of character, and character is developed from within, not imposed from without. Each man's character, including his honor, is in his own keeping, but his reputation may be brightened or tarnished by others, presumably even by a god, as when one traduces another. It is possible that Emperor William meant reputation when he said honor. Otherwise his remark was void of sense, even in intent.

"MADRID, Oct. 16.—The Archbishop of Damascus in an address to-day at Kittoria to the Spanish troops, who are about to depart to re-enforce the army in Cuba, declared that the Pope, like a new Moses, had raised his hand toward heaven, and was praying that the angel of victory might accompany the Spanish army."

Of course; religious imposture naturally foregathers with political tyranny. But it is equally safe to say that if Cuba secures its independence, Rome's infallible spiritual head will have a new revelation, just as he did when the last republic was established in France. It is a pity that his prevision does not equal his infallibility; if it did, he would be spared the mortification of seeing the "angel of victory" perching on the standard he had cursed. Strangely enough, "heaven's" vicegerent on earth seems to be totally unacquainted often with the policy of the home government.

"A circle of women, called 'The Twelve-O'Clocks,' is being formed to pray every day at noon for the Methodist American University about to be founded in Washington, D. C. May 'The Twelve-O'Clocks' bring much light and many graces to the new institution, so that it may soon come to teach the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Then it will become an annex to the Catholic American University."—Catholic Review.

A very kindly greeting from Catholic to Protestant, ending with a cordial invitation to be swallowed. And it is quite sure that if either swallows the other it will not be the Catholic who will take the Jonah part. The Protestant may think that he is insulted by the patronizing air of the Catholic, but he cannot afford to be very resentful; he stands in too urgent need of the help of the Catholic in his legislative schemes for the taming of the Free-thinker, and his schismatic Protestant brethren.

A correspondent of the Peoria Journal narrates the incidents of a robbery of which Colonel Ingersoll was the victim. Referring to the picking of the lecturer's pocket at Elmwood, which was reported in the dailies at the time, the correspondent says that this robber probably would not make any great profession of morality, in which respect he differs considerably from the chief actor in the daylight "hold up" in Chicago, where Mr. Ingersoll was also an involuntary contributor to the prosperity of others. The Advance is the leading Western organ of the Congregational church. In its issue of September 12th it printed "among its editorials, leaved as original matter, without quotation, remark, or credit, about a column from Ingersoll's magnificent address of the 5th inst., in Elmwood, word for word, paragraph for paragraph." So far as known to the correspondent, all the "secular papers, great and small, that printed all or parts of the address, did so with the usual proper credit to the author," it being reserved for the representative of a great denomination to appropriate without credit the brain-creation of the Agnostic. It would appear that the matter taken was so good that the Christian editor could not resist the temptation to lay it before his readers, but did not like to have them know that it came from an Infidel. But he should have had enough foresight to think of the consequences when such of them as also read the secular papers should discover the fraud.

On November 6th five Seventh-Day Adventists, on trial at Dayton, Tenn., for Sabbath-breaking, were acquitted by the jury without the latter leaving their seats. The Adventists have always refused to employ lawyers and have conducted their own defense, but at this trial Judge Lewis Sheppard, of Chattanooga, and Ex-Congressman Snodgrass, of Dayton, volunteered in their defense and made eloquent and successful appeals for reason and against prejudice. Judge Parks intimated in his charge that "the cases were trumped up on questionable testimony procured at the instigation of witness-fee speculators and fee-grabbing officers." It is said that this will probably end the persecution of the Adventists in East Tennessee, as any number of good lawyers are ready to defend them without request and without pay in order to vindicate religious liberty. We are very glad to hear this, for the sake of the Adventists and because it speaks in praise of members of the legal profession, who are commonly accused of working only for money, regardless of right or wrong. But these decisions do not touch the question of Sunday liberty per se. It is still to be determined whether human liberty will be recognized by the courts of Tennessee. All that has been partially decided is that there is a certain measure of religious liberty in that state. Men may work on Sunday if they religiously observe Saturday; now we want to know whether they may work or play on Sunday if they do not religiously observe Saturday or any other day. We want an affirmativ decision in which there will be no doubt about the facts—we do not want any question of incompetent or venal witnesses to be intruded. We want an affirmativ decision in which there will be no doubt concerning the principle at issue—we want to know whether or not an American citizen may rest seven days in a week or work seven days, as he himself elects.

"BALTIMORE, Nov. 12.—The Rev. E. T. Root made an address yesterday at a meeting of Presbyterian ministers, on the criticisms of the American missionaries in Armenia made by Admiral Kirkland, of the United States navy. Admiral Kirkland is quoted as having said that the missionaries are a 'bad lot.' Mr. Root said that it was at the request of the American Board of Foreign Missions that Admiral Kirkland was recalled."—New York Sun.

Presumably, Admiral Kirkland knows by this time that the American Board of Foreign Missions is very near to the throne, and that, while the occupant of that throne may without orthodox censure officially recognize the Christian religion as divine and virtually command his subjects to faithfully observe one of its holy days, it is an unpardonable offense for an officer of the United States Navy to express his opinion of some of the ministers of that official religion. Admiral Kirkland was removed from his command because he ventured to criticize the representatives of Christianity; what would have happened to him had he expressed an adverse opinion of the creed of that religion can only be conjectured; possibly he would have been cashiered and dismissed from the service in disgrace. It is all right for the ex-officio commander-in-chief of the armies and navies of the United States to set the seal of his unconstitutional official approval upon the dominant religion, but it would be nothing short of crime for a subordinate officer to call in question the truth or morality of any of its doctrines. Now that Admiral Kirkland has had his little experience with the Christian dynamo that runs the machinery of this government, it is probable that our naval officers will prostrate themselves in the dust whenever they chance to meet an American missionary abroad or come in contact with one of the home officials of the Board.

Owing to official procrastination and minor causes, the blanket ballots (4,200,000) ordered for use in the late election in this city could not be got ready without Sunday work. "No attention was paid to the Sunday law," says an account in the World, "and a policeman was stationed to see that there was no interruption of the important work going on inside." The contractors hunted over the printing and binding establishments for two hundred of the deftest folders in the city, and these girls worked from early morning until late at night. Luncheon and midnight supper were served in the building, and the girls ate without leaving their tables. The last truck-load of ballots, accompanied by a crowd of pressmen and decorated with flags, reached the folding room from the printery about noon, the men cheering lustily when the last bundle was delivered. During the day the folders were paid double the usual wages, and those who labored in the evening received two and one-half times the customary rate. "The cutting machines ran continuously. A dozen men and women with stamping machines numbered the ballots from 1 to 1,000 for each district." We suppose that this Sunday "desecration" was called a work of "necessity," but we do not now call to mind any passage in the Bible that excepts works of "necessity" from the operation of "God's law of the Sabbath." If the representatives of the people may determine what Sunday labor is "necessary" for the good of the people collectively, why may not the individual units of the "people," the source of all authority, determine for themselves severally what Sunday work is "necessary" for them as individuals? Have the officials constitutional authority and a right in equity to prescribe the conduct of the non-invading person? If the bill offered in Congress last year were to become a law, work, just as "necessary" for the individual as this ballot-folding was for the aggregation of individuals, and most of it far less harmful in its results, would be outlawed; while laborers, men or women, could be robbed of their hard-earned wages by "whoever should first sue for the same." Think of legislation as infamous as that seriously proposed and strenuously urged by a large number of "Christian men and women" here in "free America"! And, bear well in mind, the project is not abandoned nor its advocates discouraged.

A united Christendom means the checking of all moral and social growth, if not the killing of every germ of progress and the indefinite perpetuation of the superstitions and terrible evils that are indissolubly associated with the anti-naturalistic Christian régime. They are blind who cannot see that the church is more dangerous now than at any previous period of her history, because she is on the surface abandoning her strict theological orthodoxy and operating through all the channels that reach the untrained reasoning faculties and the prejudice-poisoned emotions of people whose ancestors for centuries have been miseducated and morally perverted in the schools she has virtually controlled. The word "schools" is here used in its broadest sense, as including every means through which the brain and passion of man has been shaped and fired. Once the shibboleths of the church oppressively were theological; now they are ethical, but the means employed are as nearly the same as circumstances will admit, and the end sought differs in no essential particular. Enforced conformity is the goal of the Christian. He has never been able to understand the principle of spontaneity, of choice, of free growth, of the survival of the most fit. He has never been able to differentiate righteousness from law-compelled evasion and concealment. His very terminology proves this. In this connection take a recent utterance of our Presbyterian neighbor, the Observer:

"Christian unity would manifest itself most effectively in allowing each denomination to preserve its theological and ecclesiastical autonomy, and in emphasizing the duty of combining for the promotion of temperance [meaning prohibition], social purity [meaning the enactment and enforcement of laws for the still more cruel crushing of the unfortunate victims of convention and deplorable industrial conditions], municipal and national righteousness [meaning the erection of sectarian walls to shut the Freethinker and other non-Christians out of public positions], and for the evangelization of spiritually destitute localities."

This is confirmatory of the position taken by THE TRUTH SEEKER, that "the movement in favor of ignorance" is intended to assassinate liberty in the name of "Christian morality," just as in the past it has been crushed in the name of Christian orthodoxy. "The times are ripe for the manifestation of such unity among the followers of Jesus Christ," continues the Observer, and it is sadly true. Are we prepared to face the issue?

New England News and Notes.

There is much of the poetry of life on the great Sound steamers that voyage from New York to Boston. There are happy crowds amidst the most brilliant surroundings. Music is in the air. A sumptuous repast is provided, and all that is needed is a dollar or two to enjoy the dinner like a prince. You are on a floating palace indeed, and for the time being can revel in felicitous scenes. If you are a wise man, and have paid your fare to the "Hub," you can forget the past and the future in the gorgeous present, with its flashing lights, melodious strains, and merry company, far more attractive than the angels of heaven. With what glorious movement the boat swings around the Battery and, between innumerable lights, pursues its majestic course along the broadening waters!

In the morning the quaint and somewhat ancient city of Fall River is before us—a manufacturing city where the spindles flourish, and dusty warehouses like battlements extend along the heights which loom from the sea. We are three Secular pilgrims, Mrs. M. Florence Johnson, Franklin Steiner, and myself; and in the early morn we climb the hills, and through the pathways of trade, and along the electric line, find the residence portion of this busy city, where old time elegance and modern fashion adorn the elevated view. Here we find the ancestral home of Susan H. Wixon and her sister, and receive a most genial welcome at this Freethought fireside, where the genius of New England breathes the spirit of the good time coming, the new woman and the new man. We are all capable of improvement, no doubt. We passed a delightful morning hour, even if it did rain.

Fall River is a tremendously orthodox place. It is crowded with Catholics. There is but little chance for Freethought to come to the front as a distinct issue. It can only exercise a general influence, which unquestionably it does notwithstanding the many temples of superstition scattered about this city of 90,000 people. It has some very fine houses and libraries. Fall River is by no means at the low water mark of civilization. There is considerable of the high tide of progress, and quite a latitude of toleration.

I was pleased to meet James Warburton and son. Mr. Warburton was originally from England, and was quite familiar with many of the places mentioned in my letters. He was for many years in the workshop, but love of flowers at last made him a florist. His gardens are well known for their excellence and beauty. His son now conducts the business, and Mr. Warburton, having lived the scriptural age, will now for the next quarter of a century enjoy philosophical leisure, without the shackles of church or creed. He was present at our New York Congress.

We had a pleasant variation in our journey to the "Hub." It was raining when we arrived here. However, our usual quarters, M. T. Rush's, 40 Blossom street, were ready for our use, and we had a good night's sleep. Sunday morning came with shining skies. A fine audience greets us in the familiar precincts of Paine Hall, Ernest Mendum of the Investigator, Ralph Chainey, Stillman, Dr. Noyes, Dr. Taylor, Mr. Palmer, Curtis, M. T. Rush, Ryan, etc., are present. I lectured on "Freethought in England." After the lecture there is quite a ripple of discussion, especially in regard to the questions of Socialism, God, and immortality.

I lecture two Sundays at Paine Hall. There is a large and varied element of Freethought in Boston. It is hoped that by united effort it may be brought to a better condition than ever before. Boston is an important place, with the Investigator, Paine Hall, and a radical constituency. Puritanism is fast disappearing with the rush of trade and the accumulation of wealth. The building of the subway creates quite an upheaval in the central portion of the city, but this will be of immense benefit when completed, and one of the most brilliant triumphs of engineering skill. Some of the most magnificent buildings in the world are being erected here, and add greatly to the appearance of the metropolis. If Boston should take in as much territory as Chicago, it would contain almost as vast a population. In some respects Boston is the most elegant and comfortable city on the continent. All parts of it are easily attainable. It is snugly and solidly built. Its winding and intricate thoroughfares, splendid shops, ancient structures, and crowds of people fascinate the somewhat bewildered traveler as he occasionally finds himself lost in picturesque mazes. Boston seems to date back to the antediluvian period in some of its remarkable strata. I sometimes imagine that Boston Common was the original habitation of Adam and Eve.

On Monday evening, November 4th, Steiner and myself visit the home of L. K. Washburn, at Revere.

Washburn has the true Yankee faculty of going ahead, and his home is a kind of Mecca for the Secular Pilgrim. It gives courage and enlightenment and more faith in Freethought and progress. As Washburn's lectures indicate, he has a comprehensive view of the intellectual qualities of the age. He understands the world of to-day, and the true method of reform.

I visit South Boston and the Rush Brothers, who as usual are in the swim of enterprise and business. I have the pleasure to announce that Mr. Thomas Rush is the father of a boy now about five months old—the brightest baby of its size in the world—

Fresh as a morn and brilliant as a star.

All hail the little stranger. It would be difficult to keep on the path of civilization if the babies didn't give us the benefit of their trials and tribulations; for notwithstanding these they make the sweetest music of our homes.

I was pleased to meet Russell Marston, who for so many years has been prominent in Freethought work. He is now 79 years of age, but is hale and hearty yet, with the bright eye, clear complexion, and dauntless spirit of manhood's prime. To meet such veterans reminds one of the exultant line, Hope springs eternal in the human breast.

Our friend Marston, like the captain at the helm, still looks forward.

I give two lectures at Brockton, Mass., and am quite delighted with my experience at this place, although I have to tread somewhat the rugged path of the pioneer. I have, however, the sturdy support of Mr. Thomas Tripp, who, with magnificent generosity, takes upon himself almost the whole burden of the campaign, and pushes on in spite of opposing forces. He is a Liberal Spiritualist, and has no limitations in his creed, either for this world or the next. He believes in all humanity, and would join hands with every soldier in the battle for freedom and justice. He is an all around thinker and a man of great practical success. He is the author of over seventy inventions, all of which are in use. Some of them are remarkable for their ingenuity and brilliancy of operation. It will be seen that my friend has a clear brain and can penetrate the secrets of nature. Whatever he may discover in the beyond, he certainly has mastered the world to good uses, and is a Secularist of the most pronounced type. I enjoyed the hospitality of his home. Mrs. Tripp is equally broad in her views and devoted to the Freethought cause. Their home is at Avon, near Brockton, a beautiful residence, where one can find both rest and inspiration.

At my first lecture Mrs. May S. Pepper, a test medium, was present, and her really interesting manner helped to fill the hall to overflowing. An orchestra also furnished excellent music, so the occasion was one of unusual interest. Mrs. Pepper is certainly an extraordinary mind reader, or spirit-revealer, or whatever we may call it. It is not necessary to discuss the question now. All these manifestations are of exceeding interest to the scientific student. They certainly attract the multitude. One thing is sure, whatever the source of the mental exhibition, it was thoroughly radical. There was no theology or Christianity in it. I heartily endorse every sentiment uttered, although I cannot say who uttered them. It might be subjective, or it might be objective, but it was infidelity to the core. My lecture was on the "Rights of Man," and I am certainly willing to join hands with anyone who will speak a word for this cause.

I did not have so large an audience at my second lecture. This was to be expected, for, after all, many like the glamour of "manifestations," but are not ready for hard, long thinking. However, there are those, both Spiritualists and Materialists, who desire to know the truth, and who do not expect to attain it except by intellectual struggle; who see the necessity of earnest action here and now, and give cheer and sympathy to an unpopular movement.

Ingersoll in New York.

The latest lecture of Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, which he has entitled "The Foundations of Faith," is one of his greatest. When it seems as if the Bible as a mine of impossibilities has been exhausted, the Colonel puts in another shot, and a new lead is opened. He delivered this lecture in New York on Sunday evening, Nov. 10th, in the Star theater, at Broadway and Thirteenth street. A block and a half below the theater is Grace church edifice, the most conspicuous structure in lower Broadway. It obstructs East Eleventh street, and travelers on that thoroughfare who wish to pass from Fourth avenue to Broadway must go up to Twelfth or down to Tenth. It has about a half-million dollars' worth of untaxed property, together with such a hold on the adjoining real estate that no building which would obstruct the down-town view can be reared at the northeast corner of Broadway and Tenth street. On the evening mentioned the managers of this church had men "working outside"—"pullers in," like those to be encountered in front of Chatham street clothing-stores—accosting passers-by and soliciting them into the sanctuary. Said one of them to the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, "Will you join our service this evening?" Said the Editor, "Not this evening. I can do better, having a press ticket for the Colonel's lecture." And so the twain parted.

There was no need for pullers-in that night at the Star theater, for expectant listeners performed the service of pushing one another in as fast as the man at the box office could accommodate them with the necessary certificates of deposit, while the sidewalk speculators did business on a rising market where quick sales and large profits was the commercial code. Colonel Ingersoll was present at 8 o'clock, and sat in the middle of a family group at the rear of one of the boxes, out of sight of all but a few spectators who had front seats. He wore a brown slouch hat with dents in it, and looked like a jolly farmer. He does not like to talk to an audience otherwise disturbed, and he therefore waited until the corners were filled before he appeared upon the stage. Then it was wonderful how the audience, which had been buzzing like bees swarming, became suddenly still. It was as if the sound had been turned off and silence turned on by touching an electric button, and it came so quickly that the ears sang as they do just after a loud report. The usual burst of applause followed. The Colonel is not growing visibly older or stouter, though he is tremendously heavy about the shoulders, which are so square that his coat drops straight down from the collar. He has a substantial girth below an expanse of linen that suggests a snowy hillside and coasting, and his dress suit sat upon his massive figure without wrinkle or fold. His countenance beamed in a way that showed he was glad to see so many of the friends present. He said "ladies and gentlemen" in a tone of voice which indicated that he intended to give them something worthy of their serious consideration, and then he launched his lecture. The address is in print, but, compared with the orator's delivery of it, the book is what sheet music is to the human voice. The pathetic passages brought out some of the women's handkerchiefs; other portions were responded to with a fervent "yes" from earnest male listeners, and its humor was caught in all parts of the house. The discovery that the creator must have rested on Tuesday, since according to the account he did nothing on that day, and that therefore we should have two sabbaths a week, created a good deal of merriment; and the suggestion, which nobody seems to have thought of before, that Judas had to betray his redeemer to secure his own salvation, must have made a deep impression even on the Christian mind. If there was a Roman Catholic in the house his discomfort can be estimated when the speaker, referring to the skulls of the wise men from the East, which the church claims to possess as relics, said he did not know what cemetery was overhauled to obtain them; that there was great uncertainty about relics generally, and that the investigator who should arise to inquire into their genuineness would immediately be told to sit down. "When the sleight-of-hand man is on the stage," said he, "don't meddle with the curtain."

Following are selections from the address:

The Age of the World and Man.

The geologists demonstrated that the author of Genesis was mistaken as to the age of the world, and that the story of the universe having been created in six days, about six thousand years ago, could not be true. The theologians then took the ground that the "days" spoken of in Genesis were periods of time, epochs, six "long whiles," and that the work of creation might have been commenced millions of years ago. The change of days into epochs was considered by the believers of the Bible as a great triumph over the hosts of Infidelity. The fact that Jehovah had ordered the Jews to keep the Sabbath, giving as a reason that he had made the world in six days and rested on the seventh, did not interfere with the acceptance of the "epoch" theory.

According to the Bible, Adam was certainly the first man, and in his case the epoch theory cannot change the account. The Bible gives the age at which Adam died, and gives the generations to the flood—then to Abraham and so on, and shows that from the creation of Adam to the birth of Christ it was about four thousand and four years.

According to the sacred scriptures, man has been on this earth five thousand eight hundred and ninety-nine years and no more. Is this true?

Let me give you a fact: The Egyptians were astronomers. A few years ago representations of the stars were found on the walls of an old temple, and it was discovered by calculating backward that the stars did occupy the exact positions as represented about seven hundred and fifty years before Christ. Afterward another representation of the stars was found, and by calculating in the same way, it was found that the stars did occupy the exact positions represented about three thousand eight hundred years before Christ.

According to the Bible, the first man was created four thousand and four years before Christ. If this is true, then Egypt was founded, its language formed, its arts cultivated, its astronomical discoveries made and recorded about two hundred years after the creation of the first man.

In other words, Adam was two or three hundred years old when the Egyptian astronomers made these representations. Nothing can be more absurd.

Two Rest Days.

According to the Bible, Jehovah made the world in six days, and the work done each day is described. What did Jehovah do on the second day? This is the record: "And God said, Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters. And God made the firmament and divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above the firmament. And it was so, and God called the firmament heaven. And the evening and the morning were the second day."

Now, we know that there is no firmament, and we know that the waters are not divided by a firmament. Consequently we know that, according to the Bible, Jehovah did nothing on the second day. He must have rested on Tuesday. This being so, we ought to have two Sundays a week.

David as a Collector.

We are told by this inspired book of the gold and silver collected by King David for the temple—the temple afterwards completed by the virtuous Solomon. According to the blessed Bible, David collected about two thousand million dollars in silver, and five thousand million dollars in gold, making a total of seven thousand million dollars. Is this true? There is in the bank of France at the present time (1895) nearly six hundred million dollars, and so far as we know, it is the greatest amount that was ever gathered together. All the gold now known, coined and in bullion, does not amount to much more than the sum collected by David. Seven thousand millions. Where did David get this gold? The Jews had no commerce. They owned no ships. They had no great factories, they produced nothing for other countries. There were no gold or silver mines in Palestine. Where then was this gold, this silver, found? I will tell you: In the imagination of a writer who had more patriotism than intelligence, and who wrote, not for the sake of truth, but for the glory of the Jews. Is it possible that David collected nearly eight thousand tons of gold—that he by economy got together about sixty thousand tons of silver, making a total of gold and silver of sixty-eight thousand tons?

The average freight car carries about fifteen tons. David's gold and silver would load about four thousand five hundred and thirty-three cars, making a train about thirty-two miles in length. And all this for the temple at Jerusalem, a building ninety feet long and forty-five feet high and thirty feet wide, to which was attached a porch thirty feet wide, ninety feet long and one hundred and eighty feet high. Probably the architect was inspired.

Is there a sensible man in the world who believes that David collected seven thousand million dollars' worth of gold or silver? There is hardly five thousand million dollars of gold now used as money in the whole world. Think of the millions taken from the mines of California, Australia, and Africa during the present century, and yet the total scarcely exceeds the amount collected by King David more than a thousand years before the birth of Christ. Evidently the inspired historian made a mistake.

The Wise Men.

Matthew says: "Now when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea, in the days of Herod the king, behold there came wise men from the east to Jerusalem, saying, Where is he that is born king of the Jews? for we have seen his star in the east and are come to worship him."

Matthew does not tell us who these wise men were, from what country they came, to what race they belonged. He did not even know their names. We are also informed that when Herod heard these things he was troubled and all Jerusalem with him; that he gathered the chief priests and asked of them where Christ should be born and they told him that he was to be born in Bethlehem. Then Herod called the wise men and asked them when the star appeared, and told them to go to Bethlehem and report to him. When they left Herod, the star again appeared and went before them until it stood over the place where the child was. When they came to the child they worshiped him, gave him gifts, and being warned by God in a dream, they went back to their own country without calling on Herod.

Is this story true? Must we believe in the star and the wise men? Who were these wise men? From what country did they come? What interest had they in the birth of the king of the Jews? What became of them and their star? Of course I know that the holy Catholic church has in her keeping the three skulls that belonged to these wise men, but I do not know where the church obtained these relics, nor exactly now their genuineness has been established.

An Anachronism.

We are told in Matthew, chapter xxiii, verse 35, that Christ said: "That upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth from the blood of righteous Abel unto the blood of Zacharias, son of Barachias, whom ye slew between the temple and the altar."

It is certain that these words were not spoken by Christ. He could not by any possibility have known that the blood of Zacharias had been shed. As a matter of fact, Zacharias was killed by the Jews, during the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, and this siege took place seventy-one years after the birth of Christ, thirty-eight years after he was dead.

There is still another mistake.

Zacharias was not the son of Barachias—no such Zacharias was killed. The Zacharias that was slain was the son of Baruch.

But we must not expect the "inspired" to be accurate.

Polite Saints.

Matthew says that at the time of the crucifixion "the graves were opened and that many bodies of the saints which slept arose and came out of their graves after his resurrection, and went into the holy city and appeared unto many." According to this the graves were opened at the time of the crucifixion, but the dead did not arise and come out until after the resurrection of Christ.

They were polite enough to sit in their open graves and wait for Christ to rise first.

Judas.

Besides, it is hard to see why Christians hate, loathe, and despise Judas. According to their scheme of salvation, it was absolutely necessary that Christ should be killed—necessary that he should be betrayed, and had it not been for Judas, all the world, including Christ's mother, and the part of Christ that was human, would have gone to hell. Yet, according to the New Testament, Christ did not know that one of his disciples was to betray him. Jesus, when on his way to Jerusalem, for the last time, said, speaking to the twelve disciples, Judas being present, that they, the disciples, should thereafter sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel. Yet, more than a year before this journey, John says that Christ said, speaking to the twelve disciples: "Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil." And John adds: "He spake of Judas Iscariot, for it was he that should betray him." Why did Christ a year afterwards, tell Judas that he should sit on a throne and judge one of the tribes of Israel? There is still another trouble. Paul says that Jesus after his resurrection appeared to the twelve disciples. According to Paul, Jesus appeared to Judas with the rest. Certainly Paul had not heard the story of the betrayal.

Why did Christ select Judas as one of his disciples, knowing that he would betray him? Did he desire to be betrayed? Was it his intention to be put to death? Why did he fail to defend himself before Pilate?

According to the accounts, Pilate wanted to save him. Did Christ wish to be convicted?

The Christians are compelled to say that Christ intended to be sacrificed—that he selected Judas with that end in view, and that he refused to defend himself because he desired to be crucified. All this is in accordance with the horrible idea that without the shedding of blood there is no remission of sin.

The Incarnation.

The New Testament informs us that Christ was the son of Joseph and the son of God, and that Mary was his mother. How is it established that Christ was the son of God? It is said that Joseph was told so in a dream by an angel. But Joseph wrote nothing on that subject—said nothing so far as we know. Mary wrote nothing, said nothing. The angel that appeared to Joseph or that informed Joseph said nothing to anybody else. Neither has the Holy Ghost, the supposed father, ever said or written one word. We have received no information from the parties who could have known anything on the subject. We get all our facts from those who could not have known. How is it possible to prove that the Holy Ghost was the father of Christ? Who knows that such a being as the Holy Ghost ever existed? How was it possible for Mary to know anything about the Holy Ghost? How could Joseph know that he had been visited by an angel in a dream? Could he know that the visitor was an angel? It all occurred in a dream when poor Joseph was asleep. What is the testimony of one who was asleep worth? All the evidence we have is that somebody who wrote part of the New Testament says that the Holy Ghost was the father of Christ, and that somebody who wrote another part of the New Testament says that Joseph was the father of Christ. Matthew and Luke give the genealogy and both show that Christ was the son of Joseph. The "Incarnation" has to be believed without evidence. There is no way in which it can be established. It defies observation and is independent of experience.

The Trinity.

Christ, according to the faith, is the second person in the Trinity, the Father being the first and the Holy Ghost the third. Each of these three persons is God. Christ is his own father and his own son. The Holy Ghost is neither father nor son, but both. The son was begotten by the father, but existed before he was begotten—just the same before as after. Christ is just as old as his father, and the father is just as young as his son. The Holy Ghost proceeded from the Father and Son, but was equal to the Father and Son before he proceeded, that is to say, before he existed, but he is of the same age as the other two. So, it is declared that the Father is God, and the Son God, and the Holy Ghost God, and that these three Gods make one God. According to the celestial multiplication table, once one is three, and three times one is one, and according to heavenly subtraction if we take two from three, three are left. The addition is equally peculiar; if we add two to one we have but one. Each one is equal to himself and the other two. Nothing ever was, nothing ever can be more perfectly idiotic and absurd than the dogma of the Trinity.

Is it possible for a human being, who has been born but once, to comprehend or to imagine the existence of three beings, each of whom is equal to the three? Think of one of these beings as the father of one, and think of that one as half human and all God, and think of the third as having proceeded from the other two, and then think of all three as one. Think that after the father begot the son, the father was still alone, and after the Holy Ghost proceeded from the father and the son, the father was still alone—because there never was and never will be but one God. At this point, absurdity having reached its limit, nothing more can be said except: "Let us pray."

Sacrifice.

A man steals, and then sacrifices a dove, or gives a lamb to a priest. His crime remains the same. He need not kill something. Let him give back the thing stolen, and in future live an honest life.

A man slanders his neighbor and then kills an ox. What has that to do with the slander? Let him take back his slander, make all the reparation that he can, and let the ox alone.

There is no sense in sacrifice, never was and never will be.

Make restitution, reparation, undo the wrong, and you need shed no blood.

The Infinite Wild Beast.

If Christianity were only stupid and unscientific, if its God were ignorant and kind, if it promised eternal joy to believers, and if the believers practiced the forgiveness they teach, for one I should let the faith alone.

But there is another side to Christianity. It is not only stupid, but malicious. It is not only unscientific, but it is heartless. Its God is not only ignorant, but infinitely cruel. It not only promises the faithful an eternal reward, but declares that nearly all of the children of men, imprisoned in the dungeons of God, will suffer eternal pain. This is the savagery of Christianity. This is why I hate its unthinkable God, its impossible Christ, its inspired lies, and its selfish, heartless heaven.

That word [hell] drove pity from the hearts of men, stained countless swords with blood, lighted fagots, forged chains, built dungeons, erected scaffolds, and filled the world with poverty and pain. That word is a coiled serpent in the mother's breast, that lifts its fanged head and hisses in her ear: "Your child will be the fuel of eternal fire."

That word blots from the firmament the star of hope and leaves the heavens black. That word makes the Christian's God an eternal torturer, an everlasting inquisitor—an infinite wild beast.

The Peroration.

But, says the prejudiced priest, the malicious minister, "You take away a future life." I am not trying to destroy another world, but I am endeavoring to prevent the theologians from destroying this. If we are immortal it is a fact in nature, and that fact does not depend on Bibles, or Christs, on priests or creeds. The hope of another life was in the heart long before the "sacred books" were written, and will remain there long after all the "sacred books" are known to be the work of savage and superstitious men. Hope is the consolation of the world.

The wanderers hope for home.—Hope builds the house and plants the flowers and fills the air with song.

The sick and suffering hope for health.—Hope gives them health and paints the roses in their cheeks.

The lonely, the forsaken, hope for love.—Hope brings the lover to their arms. They feel the kisses on their eager lips, though they may die alone.

The poor in tenements and huts, in spite of rags and hunger, hope for wealth.—Hope fills their thin and trembling hands with gold.

The dying hopes that death is but another birth, and love leans above the pallid face and whispers, "We shall meet again."

Hope is the consolation of the world. Let us hope that if there be a God, he is wise and good. Let us hope that if there be another life, it will bring peace and joy to all the children of men. And let us hope that this poor earth on which we live may be a perfect world—a world without a crime—without a tear.

The Old Story in Plain English, with Notes and Comments.

"Peace on earth and good will to men" is the Christian motto. In theory and practical results, it is war to the knife and knife to the hilt, and prescription and persecution to all who differ from him. The God myth is the great drive-wheel of Christian intolerance. When the Christian's motive is understood, it will be found that he is not working for the benefit of man but for the glory of God. And every man becomes his enemy whenever he does anything which the Christian imagines will be displeasing to his fetish.

As long as the Christian believes in this great imaginary Mogul of the skies he will cling to his Bible. As long as he clings to his Bible he will be trying to shape the thought and actions of men to the civilization of three thousand years ago, and there is the end of progress.

As long as the God idea remains we must expect to be hated and scorned, boycotted and persecuted, by every device which Christian ingenuity, backed up by fiendish malice, can invent.

Suppose that all belief in this heavenly nondescript should be blotted out. Would not the sun and stars continue to shine and the planets to revolve? Would men turn to monsters, and worry and butcher each other, and moral chaos reign? There are thousands who take no stock in the sky-perched Mikako, and as far as I know they are inoffensive people, while thousands are found in the jails and penitentiaries who have worn out the knees of their pants bowing down before this imaginary judge who is supposed should hold court above the clouds. A man who has reasoned himself out of the God-myth has reasoned far enough to know that a blameless life can only conduce to happiness. For every Atheist reported, name and address to be given, guilty of a crime, I will agree to give the names and addresses of fifty criminals who believe in a God, and one-fifth of them will be priests and ministers.

If there is a god of truth who has revealed himself to man, how does it come about that there is such a wide discrepancy between the revelations of science and the so-called divine revelations. It strikes me that there are very few intelligent Christians who would discredit every branch of science which does not agree with the Bible.

Every scientist knows that there are no general mistakes in regard to the facts of astronomy, chemistry, geology, philosophy, or geography. And every scientist knows that the facts of science and the statements in the Bible never can be harmonized. Hence the war between science and the church will continue to be waged.

The mind of a scientist is trained to investigate, compare, and analyze. Every truth has its weight. Every new discovery is critically examined, and reason is ever on the throne.

With the Christian it is different. From early childhood he has been taught that every statement in the Bible was written by the unerring finger of God. To deny any part of the Bible is to throw a lie into the face of the Almighty. To deny any statement of the Bible would be equivalent to losing his claim on the home at the head of the golden ladder, and consign him to the place where things are kept hot. Such a man dares not reason, the risk is too great.

If told that it is impossible for snakes and asses to talk, he replies, "The fact is written down in God's word, and God cannot be mistaken." If told that man's strength lies in his muscle and not in his hair, he refers you to the case of Samson, and triumphantly asks, "Who is right, you or God?" If told that a man never lived three days and three nights in the belly of a big fish, he replies, "With God all things are possible," and scores another triumph. If told that there are certain laws of nature which never change, he calls you a heretic, and tells you that God has changed even the law of gravitation, and cites you to Christ, who went up in such a hurry that he did not give directions as to where he could be addressed, and to Elijah, who went up half-cocked, and gave such a grand display of pyrotechnics. When told by geologists that there is indubitable evidence that the world was not made in six days, he shudders as he thinks that geology will be the means of sending thousands to the headquarters of Old Nick, where brimstone is the only fuel, for doubting the statement in Genesis.

Let it be intimated that it was not an act of justice to send bears to tear forty-two children to pieces; that the punishment bore no just relation to the offense, the Christian replies it must have been just, because it was inflicted by God himself.

When told that the wars of extermination which were waged, in which men, women, and children were brutally butchered, and women were ripped up alive, were inhuman and cruel, the answer is that God commanded those wars, and none but hell-deserving heretics will accuse God of injustice and cruelty.

When a powerful savage tribe, instigated by no motive but plunder, made a descent upon a weaker tribe and took by force their oxen, camels, sheep, and goats, and all they possessed, and led the people into captivity, the Christian defends the plundering horde by saying that they were instruments in the hands of God to punish his enemies who worshipped other gods.

Thus it will be seen that there is no war so unjust, no crime so dark, no outrage so great that the Christian will not indorse it when he believes it is sanctioned by the great, cruel war-god above the clouds.

Thus all sense of justice is lost; all the milk of human kindness dried up, and the greatest outrages justified when men believe that the Bible is the word of God, when they find indorsed all the crimes enumerated here, and many more, fouler, deeper, and darker.

In the light of these facts let anyone look over the history of the Christian religion and he will have the key to all the ignorance, crime, injustice, and inhumanity which has characterized the Christian religion in every century since its first promulgation. And there is no way to reach or reform a Christian so long as his faith is grounded in a cruel, vindictive God and his great book of fables, foibles, nonsense, and impossibilities. The Christian is compelled by his belief to act just as he does act and always has acted, and he always has been and is now a dangerous man without knowing it. An insane man is always dangerous and ignorant of the danger.

The question is, how shall we break the spell which holds them midway between folly and insanity, and makes them reject the most important truths and accept the most monstrous errors.

We must put reason against blind faith, break down their confidence in gods and god-written books, show them that hell and heaven exist only in a distempered imagination. As long as they fear hell and hope for heaven and believe in a God who will everlastingly punish them if they do not accept every statement in a book which contains a hundred contradictions and indorses as many abominations, they will grovel in ignorance and be a curse rather than a blessing to their kind.

JOHN PECK.

Mrs. Stanton's Birthday.

The eightieth birthday of Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, woman suffragist and reformer, was celebrated at the Metropolitan Opera House, this city, on the evening of Tuesday, November 12th. There were three thousand women present, and a number of men, the latter being in the main those who are identified with Freethought and radical movements—among them T. B. Wakeman, Henry M. Taber, Dr. Foote, and J. K. Ingalls. On the platform with Mrs. Stanton were gathered nearly a score of the pioneer woman suffragists, Susan B. Anthony, Isabella Beecher Hooker, Matilda Joslyn Gage, Mrs. Louisa Southworth, Elizabeth Sheldon, and others. There was also present John W. Hutchinson, of the musical Hutchinson family, who, as Miss Anthony said, in the old days sang abolition into the hearts of the people when the orators could not talk it into their brains.

Mrs. Mary Lowe Dickinson, president of the National Council of Women, presided, and in her introductory remarks stated that the organizations having members present represented more than a million women in the United States. Telegrams and messages were too numerous to be read, and only the names of the senders could be given. In the addresses there was a general tone hostile to the church. The Rev. Anna Shaw, who spoke first, declared: "The worst chain that has ever bound woman has been the chain of religious superstition."

Miss Anthony read a list of "pioneers either present or sending greetings," and also of those whom death has taken from the ranks. Of the living she mentioned, paying a tribute to each, Parker Pillsbury, Amy Post, Lucy N. Colman, Matilda Joslyn Gage, Mrs. Olive H. Fraser Ingalls (wife of J. K. Ingalls), who was at the first woman suffrage meeting held in this state, and O. B. Waite, who fifty years ago published the Liberty Banner at Rock Island, Ill. It appeared that the pioneer abolitionists were also pioneer woman-suffragists. A souvenir distributed to the audience contained the names of persons in sympathy with reform, Anthony Comstock's with the rest, though what claim that disreputable individual has to be numbered among the supposed benefactors of mankind those who know him best will find it hardest to determine.

There were many speakers on the program, including Mayor Strong, who was represented by his secretary, Mr. Job Hedges; M. Carey Thomas, president of Bryn Mawr College; Clara Barton, president of the Red Cross Society; Mary T. Burt, president of the Women's Christian Temperance Union; Mrs. W. R. Brooks, of the society for work among the Indians; Rev. Ida Hultin, Unitarian; Harriet Hosmer, artist; Emma Blackwell, M.D.; Mrs. E. B. Cheney, missionary; Mrs. Fannie Barrier Williams, colored; Isabella C. Davis, Harriette A. Keyser, C. Chapman Catt, Ella Dietz Clymer, Lillie Devereaux Blake, and Mrs. Mary Wright Sewall. Not all of these, however, had opportunity to speak. Musical exercises formed part of the celebration, not the least notable of which was singing by a large choir of colored children. In the course of the evening a "Tribute" in the form of a large silver cup was presented to Mrs. Stanton by the New York City Woman's Suffrage League.

When an address by Mrs. Stanton was announced the audience arose, waving handkerchiefs and cheering. Mrs. Stanton, supported by a cane, advanced to the front of the stage and spoke briefly. Though her limbs were feeble, her voice was strong and penetrated every part of the immense auditorium. "I thank you all very much," she said, "for the tributes of love, respect, and gratitude which have been sent to me in telegrams and letters, and expressed in the presence of this great audience. As I am not able to stand very long, nor to talk loud enough, I have invited Miss Helen Potter to read what I have to say to you. Before I sit down I want to say one word to the men who are present. From all they have had to listen to and to read in the papers for the last forty years they may have come to the conclusion that the new woman is going to crowd them entirely off the planet. I want to assure you all that, as long as you have mothers, wives, and sweethearts, they will look out for you. I take pleasure in introducing Miss Potter, and you will think I have said quite enough before she gets through."

Miss Helen Potter, who is an elocutionist and reader of distinction, then read from Mrs. Stanton's manuscript the following address, which provoked both applause and laughter:

It is a long time, nearly half a century, since a few persons met in a little Methodist church in Seneca Falls to discuss the status of woman under the laws of New York. That was the first Woman's Rights Convention ever held, and there the first demand for suffrage was made. But the vast majority of women ridiculed the idea of political rights for themselves; the press caricatured the convention; the pulpit denounced it, and many who took part withdrew their names and have been seen no more on our platform.

Within two years conventions were held in half a dozen different states; letters of sympathy came from women all over this country, and from Italy, France, and Germany, from those who were taking an active part in the revolutions of '48.

And at that very time, strange to say, the earthquakes began in California, showing that old Mother Earth sympathized in the general upheaval, in the rebellion of her daughters against the creeds, codes, and customs of old civilizations. At that time, too, the invisibles began to knock and move tables; a new interest was awakened in psychological manifestations.

In the first place I propose to-night to settle the question of woman's sphere, so that we may never hear it mentioned again. That region has been traveled over so often that there is not a tree or flower or blade of grass to be found on it anywhere, yet excursions of men are, from time to time, surveying that old worn-out land to find woman's sphere. Ever since Eve left paradise the trend of human endeavor has been in this direction.

Those who could pen poetry or prose have written about it; those who could orate in any language under the sun have talked about it; statesmen have declared its limits in laws and constitutions; bishops in scriptures and sermons; editors in journals; actors in tragedy; artists in pictures, and scientists in osseous formations, muscles, nerves, and the size and quantity of feminine brains.

While Franklin, Kane, Lockwood, Greeley, and Peary have been sailing amid polar ices to find the North Pole, I have been traveling in the realm of the possibilities to find the voting poll and woman's sphere. I crossed, spyglass in hand, the imaginary lines of diameter and circumference supposed to bound it, took reckonings at every degree of latitude and longitude, all through the temperate, the torrid, and the frigid zones, and, halting one day, I found an old document purporting to have been written at the dawn of creation when the gods were in consultation in regard to the creation of man.

They said, "Let us make man in our own image, male and female, and give them dominion over the earth, and all that dwells thereon." Here is the first title deed to this green earth, given equally to man and woman. Here we have the first hint of "God's intentions."

Here Mrs. Stanton interposed a eulogy of man, and described his accomplishments in the material and spiritual worlds. She then continued:

I imagine that at this point some carping women are saying to their neighbors: "Where do we come in? If man is such a wonderful being, fills all space, and is in every department of industries, where is our sphere?" It is plain to every rational mind that if man is everywhere, doing everything, and woman of necessity must remain her allotted time on this planet, their sphere must be the same. They are, ever must be, indissolubly bound together as mother and father, husband and wife, sister and brother, in childhood, in marriage, in all life's struggles, ever sharing each other's joys and sorrows. With tears of affection and immortal wreaths they perform the last offices of love and friendship for each other, and in the bosom of Mother Earth, side by side, they rest at last together.

The other thought I would emphasize to-night is the next step to be taken in our march to freedom. We must now make the same demand of the church that we have made of the state during the last fifty years, for the same rights, privileges, and immunities that man enjoys.

First: We must see that the canon laws, the Mosaic code, scriptures, prayer books, and liturgies be purged of all invidious distinctions of sex, of all false teaching as to woman's origin, character, and destiny.

Second: We must demand an equal place in the offices of the church as pastors, elders, deacons; an equal voice in the creeds, discipline, in all business matters, and in the synods, conferences, and general assemblies.

Third: We must insist that all unworthy reflections on the sacred character of the mother of the race, such as the allegory of her creation and fall, and Paul's assumptions as to her social status, be expunged from our church literature. Such sentiments cannot inspire the rising generation with respect for their mothers.

Fourth: We must demand that the pulpit be no longer desecrated with men who read these invidious passages of scripture and preach from texts that teach the subordination of one-half the human race to the other.

On the following day Mrs. Stanton and many of the other pioneers held a reception at the Hotel Savoy, and all the audience were invited to attend. It was not so formal an occasion as the celebration, but there was equal enthusiasm. Among the features of the reception was a poem read by William Lloyd Garrison, Jr. The Massachusetts men who lately voted against woman suffrage were dealt with very caustically by Mrs. Anna Shaw.

A plaster cast of the clasped hands of Mrs. Stanton and Miss Anthony has been taken and will be reproduced in marble by Miss Meg Culbertson. There are a sufficient number of the pioneer woman suffragists that their eightieth birthdays may be celebrated about twice in a decade. Miss Anthony's will come in 1900.

Mrs. Stanton Tells a Funny Story.

When Elizabeth Cady Stanton was a young woman she helped to educate a young man for the ministry, a circumstance which she now recalls with considerable amusement and is fond of citing as an example of the peculiar proneness of woman to "make a ladder of herself for man to climb on," and of the equally noticeable tendency of the latter to regard the said ladder with contempt, and to forget that he has used it.

It was the custom then in the Presbyterian church, to which Mrs. Stanton belonged, for particular congregations to undertake the education for the church of some particular young man, and in this case the responsibility was assumed by a group of enthusiastic young ladies. The fortunate youth chosen was an exceptionally bright, handsome fellow, and most of them were in love with him; Mrs. Stanton supposes she was, too. Besides that, they thought they were engaged in God's service, and so they worked and begged untiringly, getting up bazars and festivals and resorting to all the other devices whereby the feminine "church-worker" is accustomed to extort money from a selfish public.

By these means they were enabled to send their protege to college and then to a seminary, from both of which institutions he graduated with high honors, receiving a call at once, on leaving the latter, to a very important church. The young ladies then presented him with a nice little library, and just before his ordination they gave him, as a last act of devotion, the finest suit of clothes that they could buy, complete in every detail from the shiny silk hat to the polished boots.

Last of all they asked him to come and preach for them. He did so, and, with the modesty and good taste of which only a budding theologian would have been capable, he took for his text the 34th verse of the 14th chapter of 1 Corinthians, beginning: "Let your women keep silence in the churches."

"And it was a very good thing, too," says Mrs. Stanton, "for it had the effect of so thoroughly disgusting us all that we never educated another minister."

Observations.

A member of the German Reichstag has been sent to jail for four months, for criticising the emperor. His offense is technically termed "leze-majesty," which is next in turpitude to sacrilege. We have no such offense under American law, though the word "scurrility" in the post-office act means substantially the same thing. Any adverse criticism of a monarch, or any disrespectful act toward him, is leze-majesty. For example, at one time any person was guilty of this offense who changed his clothes in the presence of a statue of the emperor, or imitated the garments worn by his majesty. A while ago the emperor of Germany wrote a song—said by musicians to be very "bum"—and some critics at Hamburg who made sport of it were arrested and prosecuted. Their offense was leze-majesty. Our institutions have not been threatened by any such sacrilege since General Coxey walked on the grass in Washington.

It is necessary sometimes that a newspaper reporter should be intelligent. Another may do justice to a sermon, but he has no business to attempt the reporting of anything else. To exemplify: the young man sent by the New York Sun to write up the Sunday afternoon session of the late Freethought Congress should have been at church. He heard President Bird of the Newark Liberal League, who is a florist, say something about the multiplication of flowers and sex in plants, and immediately experienced a violent amatory impulse; and when Mr. Bird in further developing this fascinating branch of evolution—to which Darwin devoted a great deal of study—observed that there was sexual attraction among flowers as among human beings, and that with the latter this force influenced even religious gatherings, reflex action got in its work on the representative of the press. While in the consequent state of collapse he wrote his report of the proceedings. After indulging in the expression of an opinion totally opposed to that of his editor-in-chief about the exclusion of THE TRUTH SEEKER from the Canadian mails, he turned his attention to Mr. Bird, who, he said, "elaborated his ideas in a manner hardly suitable for publication—unless it were in THE TRUTH SEEKER," to which withering sarcasm he added a few hebetudinous lies about the conduct of the audience, and so dried up his imbecil drivell. A half-witted donkey introduced in the hall stern foremost, while asleep, would have obtained just as clear an impression of the significance of the meeting as that which the reporter conveyed to the readers of the Sun.

"In Canada, by the way, THE TRUTH SEEKER has been put under the ban as a scurrilous and obscene publication." So says Liberty, and I request my Uncle Benjamin to revise his statement and tell it just as it is. The charge is not obscenity, but blasphemy. In this country the religious spook has been largely divested of its former immunity from adverse criticism, though the moral spook retains what the other has lost; but in Canada it is still unsafe to disparage the theological Giascutis. That is to say: here, the citizen may say what he chooses about the Theos if he will observe silence as to the Phallos; while in the Dominion both are held in awe, and neither may be mentioned except in a reverential tone of voice. It is an offense against accuracy, Mr. Tucker, to say tweedledum when the facts require that you should say tweedledee.

The council of the Choctaw nation has decreed that discussion of land allotment is treason and punishable with death.—News of the Week.

Land allotment will be understood as private instead of community ownership of the soil. But the foregoing item is not quoted for the purpose of discussing the land question. It is to direct attention to the beautiful system the wise men of the Choctaw nation have discovered for settling it without discussion. Apart from the restrictions always put upon debate by religious medicin men, I have heard of nothing approaching it except the course adopted by certain Socialistic persons who attended the meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club, Nov. 8th, when "Individual Freedom" was the topic for discussion. These political economists listened with marked attention and approval to Mr. Matchett, who expressed the views they had been instructed to applaud, and then endeavored incontinently to howl down all whose trend of thought was in some other direction. So odious was their conduct in this respect that the professed enemies of Socialism would need to exercise great ingenuity to devise a more successful scheme for demonstrating the undesirable results of that economic system. Herr Oppenheimer, who has talked Socialism at the club for the last ten years, blushed for them, apologized for them, and finally repudiated them. Mr. Wakeman, who is more Socialistic in his theories than Karl Marx himself, administered reproof that would, doubtless, have put the Choctaw Indians to confusion and shame, knowing it to be deserved. And still they hooted. Inquiry among other attendants with collectivist sympathies led to the identification of the disturbers as the disciples of Brother De Leon, editor of the People, from whom an explanation is due. He ought to tell us whether members of the capitalistic class would have behaved better or worse.

Mr. Orine's suggestion that the binding force of religious superstition might be profitably employed to restrain persons in certain stages of development may have something in it. Pending domestication, some zoological specimens are safest in a cage.

Following the example of Mr. George Gould, who last year purchased social eminence and a measly French count with his father's money and his sister's trousseau, our citizeness, Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt, has traded her daughter and $5,000,000 for an insignificant English duke. The dicker was announced as a marriage, and a number of months were devoted to the preliminaries—including financial settlements and a rehearsal of the wedding, at which the duke was not present, presumably for the reason that he might have forgotten that it was only a rehearsal and overacted his part. But the actual marriage occupied probably less than five minutes, so it is plain enough that the union of the minor contracting parties as husband and wife was simply an incident. The duke needed money, and had his title to raise it on; the Vanderbilt family wanted blue blood, and had money to buy it with, and the girl was a handy vehicle of exchange. The duke of Marlborough is an undersized strippling, who in Chicago would be called a runt; the girl is a slim brunet, who has never been noticed for graces of mind or person even by the newspapers; hence the prospect that the next duke of Marlborough will be gifted by nature is not hopeful.

If this young couple had gone before a justice of the peace, or behind a door, and exchanged the vows which neither is expected to keep, anyone who should offer remarks about the matter would deserve to be snubbed; but the splurge they have made is scandalous and must be so characterized. When young ladies permit it to be advertised so extensively and so persistently that they are about to undisguise themselves in the presence of the antagonistic sex, they force upon public attention proceedings which in their nature are anatomical and private. If several high-salaried clergymen had not given the exhibition their sanction, the indecency of the thing would seem almost as flagrant as that of the persons who for smaller considerations and less ostentatiously make other contracts, and are therefore pulled by the police.

A dirty, infamous sheet yelped: THE TRUTH SEEKER has once or twice fallen in our mail. Its sole object seems to be to promote irreligion, immorality, and anarchy. The postal department of Canada has ruled against it as immoral literature, and we think our self-respecting postal people will soon do themselves and common decency the same credit. No one but one in league with the powers of darkness could produce such infamous literature.—Baptist Record, Meridian, Miss.

I have turned the dictionary over to discover what "yelped" means in the first line of the foregoing selection from the religious press, but get no light. Without doubt it is a fighting word. The Record tells its subscribers who can read that this journal is ruled against as immoral. I know that when a man is a natural-born liar, or has become one for Christ's sake, it is unkind to restrain him in the use of his gift, but really the editor of the Record must be solicited to come down. Call it blasphemy, brother, and do not mar the beauties of your style with inaccuracies of statement. Put a gun in your belt and camp on the trail of the Infidel. Shoot right and left, and then up in the air. Give us more hostile language. It is time for unbelievers to be apprised that God never sent his only begotten son on earth for his health.

In the penitentiary at Kingston, Canada, there are four hundred and ninety-four (494) convicts, of whom one (1) is a Jew and one (1) an Infidel. The 492 others are Christians, and are provided with two chaplains at an annual cost of $2,400, or about $5 a head. Nothing appears to be done for the Infidel and the Jew, although they are entitled, in equity, to $10 worth of Judaism and Infidelity per annum. Or will it be said that the chaplains are hired for the benefit of these two? That would be logical, I think, for there is no sense in preaching to a convict that same faith under the influence of which he committed his offense. When a man's religion lands him in jail, he should be permitted to jar loose from it. But the theory that religious instruction in the Kingston penitentiary is for the minority is shown to be untenable by the fact that there are two chaplains—a Catholic priest with 147 parishioners, and a Church of England minister with 131 communicants—when one would answer the purpose of a Jew or an Infidel just as well as more. The fact is, the unbelievers are not provided for at all, which is wholly inconsistent. If the reformation of a Christian can be effected by giving him more Christianity, the same method ought to work with the others. The isolated Infidel, therefore, would be justified in demanding an annual subscription to Secular Thought.

In their overtures for union with the Roman Catholic church, the Episcopalians are not getting exactly what you could call the glad hand. A distinguished Catholic theologian of New York, being asked what he thought about the proposition, replied that in his opinion it was "too late in the day to baptize the bastard of Henry the Eighth." Not every hour does a rift in the clouds of human irascibility give us an opportunity to behold the true figure of Christian Charity, but when we do get a glimpse of her we have to acknowledge that she is a bird.

Thanksgiving, 1895.

Banks are bustin' everywhere,
And Grover says, "Praise God;"
Making the tramp and millionaire,
And Grover says, "Praise God."
Did Grover work and earn his gold,
And not "come in" on deals so bold—
Were he in winter pinched with cold,
Would Grover still "praise God"?

The hiring press deceives the land,
And Grover says, "Praise God;"
With cries of "Plenty on every hand,"
And Grover says, "Praise God;"
But when the despot leaves his throne,
From which he's made the poor to groan
Through bonds and gold—when Grover is gone,
The toilers will "Praise God."

The Postal Censorship.

From the London Freethinker.

There is a good deal of sham liberty in "free and independent" America. A wretched fellow called Comstock, secretary of the Vice Society (as old Cobbett used to call the original body in England), pretty well decides on his own hand what literature shall pass through the United States mail. It now appears that the postmaster-general of Canada has prohibited the transmission of our gallant contemporary, the New York Truth Seeker. By a stroke of his pen he stops the circulation of this paper in the whole Dominion, and there is absolutely no appeal against his decision. It is really astonishing that "free" people should hire a man to carry their letters, and let the fellow dictate what they shall read. Yet so it is, and they submit to it like a lot of sheep—all but the Freethinkers.

The Christian Reformer calls for the suppression of The Truth Seeker. This is to "induce" its readers to "seek something more wholesome." The Truth Seeker remarks that "the prescription is a very simple one, but it is not new." Of course not. It is as old as the first rogue who joined the first fool to hunt down the first honest man.

For many months this speech has been out of print and unobtainable. By permission of the Colonel and his publisher we have now put it into a neat pamphlet, with fancy colored cover, and a portrait of the speaker. We have included also the "Vision of War," which many have desired to have in compact and cheap form to hand to friends. The price of the pamphlet is ten cents. The "Declaration of Independence" is the centennial oration delivered July 4, 1876, at Peoria, Ill., and the "Vision of War" is an extract from a speech delivered at the soldiers' reunion at Indianapolis, in September of the same year, beginning, "The past rises before me like a dream."

It isn't a great way from now to the sun festival known as Christmas—an adaptation of pagan rites to Christian necessities—and those who intend to follow the pretty custom of making presents to their friends on that occasion will find on another page of this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER a list of books suitable for that purpose. If our friends desire we can hold the books till a few days before the festival and mail or express them so that they will reach the destination at the right time. A present that we would recommend is to send to your Liberal friend who does not now take it, a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER a year for $3, which carries with it a copy of the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" in boards. For $3.50 we will send cloth bound book, with gilt side stamp—a handsome present indeed, with the added attraction of a weekly remembrance from yourself to your friend in the shape of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Such a present will do you good, your friend good, and us good—a combination of goodness which seems hard to resist.

PARK RIVER, N. D., Oct. 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $19. Send TRUTH SEEKER and "Pictorial Text-Book" to new subscribers whose addresses are given elsewhere. Credit $5 from Sander Soll of this place for Liberal purposes; $2 for myself for the same; the balance for one year and five months' subscription for myself to THE TRUTH SEEKER and the books named. I would have sent this money sooner, but money was too scarce.

The theocrats and so-called Christians closed my place of business and put an injunctive order thereon immediately after after S. P. Putnam's lecture at this place last fall. It would seem that it makes them feel good and happy to see Liberals in trouble or misery, and still they preach "love."

They would rather have a murderer, a burglar, a scandalmonger, or a swindler join the Methodist Episcopal church than see an honest man sell a glass of malt, because the former are better people in their estimation. It is a good thing that tastes are not to be disputed. Some of the worst Sabbath-breakers we have around here are noted for their hypocrisy and the high standing in the M. E. church. But their little schemes and infractions of the Sunday law are overlooked, simply because they are Methodists. On the other hand, if a man does not take any stock in that Methodist humbug, they have him arrested simply for loading a water tank on his wagon on Sunday during harvest time, and this outrage was perpetrated on one of our best citizens in this town only a few weeks ago.

Our local M. E. preacher, or, as Mr. Putnam calls him, "The Reverend Smeller of Park River," recently went to Jerusalem to smell around. If they don't crucify him there, he will probably be back soon with a piece of old gunnysack and tell his deluded congregation that "it is a piece of Christ's coat-tail," which would be a new discovery in Christian science. I believe in equal rights and privileges, on all questions, for every man, woman, and child, regardless of creed or nationality.

I hate to see a whip used for bringing people to church. If the church is God's institution, why don't he take care of it? Why should he have to call upon the government to help frame laws to keep his chosen people straight? Every good thing takes care of itself if left alone.

The church people do not even pay taxes on millions of church property, and then they want to be protected, while we taxpayers are not protected.

I, for one, and many other Liberals and non-sectarians, hope and trust that that uncalled-for, unwarranted, and cowardly attempt of the jesuitical A. P. Caron, postmaster-general of Canada, to suppress the freedom of the press, and especially your excellent Freethought organ, THE TRUTH SEEKER, will prove abortive and a farce. If a bigot of the stripe of A. P. Caron at Ottawa, a priest-ridden Romanist, is allowed to use his official position to crush the truths published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, what will not the theocrats do next? If your paper is to be prohibited circulation through the mails, why not prohibit the Bible also, because it is clearly apparent and manifest to the mind of every intelligent and impartial reader of the Bible that certain parts of that so-called divine book, chiefly the Old Testament, are more trashy, more scurrilous, more shocking to human decency, and more blasphemous than any article or editorial ever published in THE TRUTH SEEKER or any other newspaper, the Police Gazette not excepted? O consistency, thou art a jewel!

Yours for truth, right, humanity, and liberty, JOHN MUNDIGAL.

For Munitions of War.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., Nov. 6, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I forward you another year's subscription to keep the old paper on the warpath. If it can't go to Canada, keep it going where it can, as the ignorant are not all dead yet; so keep it before them. Truth will prevail sometime.

Yours truly, J. P. WHIPPLE.

Yes, They Are Hearing About Us.

BOULDER CREEK, CAL., Oct. 28, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: For the first time since the beginning of all things I see the great dailies of San Francisco have had telegraphic reports from and have actually published a synopsis of the proceedings of the American Freethought Federation. The world moves. Yours truly, C. C. RODGERS.

"Converted Reprobates."

LONDON, ONT., Nov. 7, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5 to pay my subscription for the torch of reason. I have been a little negligent—not for the want of money exactly, but for the want of time. I want you to send me some pamphlets, radical ones, of course—"Bible Morals," "Self Contradictions of the Bible," Ingersoll's lecture on the Bible, and "Hard Knocks at Christianity."

I receive the paper pretty regularly; sometimes they keep it over Sunday, but I have not time to read much lately, though I like the pictures all the same.

These pamphlets are good when you get into the company of a lot of those converted reprobates who are not prohibited in Canada.

JOSEPH ALLASTER.

Help Us, and We Will Educate Canada Yet.

BURLINGTON JUNCT., Mo., Oct. 29, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: You will please find 50 cents, for which send me your paper three months, beginning with the date of 19th inst., containing the first article of John Peck. There is much Freethought existing here and I will take great pleasure in placing my papers where they will do the most good. If the Truth Seeker Company could afford it, it should flood benighted Canada with its publications per express charges prepaid.

I have been much interested in the sample copies you sent me, especially in the graphic and entertaining letters of Mr. Putnam, lately in England. Your fight for the personal liberty of mankind is noble and heroic and must win in the end.

Yours truly, G. W. MAX.

There Is Peace in the Woods.

McMURRAY, WASH., Oct. 26, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The fanatics have begun already here on the Pacific Coast in the bigger cities and towns, but, thanks to the goodness of nature, there is peace in the woods yet.

I was in Seattle a few days ago and heard one of those Jesus worshipers tell people that Sir Walter Scott died with the knowledge that there was a God and a hell and that Thomas Paine died drunk, and all this within twenty-five feet of a TRUTH SEEKER that was hanging as a sign for a newsdealer, and it seemed to me that Heston's cartoon was smiling at that man's lies. When will the Christians learn to tell the truth? Perhaps never, for if they did they would be Christians no more, for Christianity in itself is a falsehood, and as the tree is so will the fruit be. That is the natural consequence of the law of cause and effect.

J. S. ODEGAARD.

A Woman's Arraignment of Religion.

LEXINGTON, KY., Nov. 5, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Canada was once a peaceful land under the rule of the French, but not as at present, holy, consecrated, and pure. It has the same religion that dyed the hand of Cain when he slew his brother Abel.

Religion has filled temples, like that of Pegu, with beautiful women, whose honor was sacrificed to pay the expenses of the place; such houses, now, secularized, pay a tax to the church. "Please draw it mild," is their request. Women were murdered in ancient times to pacify the gods, but this was considered a holy act.

Plantus speaks of tables in holy houses, loaded with luxuries, rows of gaudily-dressed courtesans being present. Moses was not able to suppress these things (according to history) in the temple, amid show and fretted gold, rich embroidery, coarse luxury. At such times truth is bound hand and foot by men of the most hardened character—holy tools. Without them how could the church be sustained?

The holiness of Canada is bent only on preserving intact the slavery of heart and brain, the groveling darkness, the loathsome chicanery of religion. In the Holy Land men abhor the atmosphere of Freethought, their strongest citadel of safety being founded on dreams and fallacies presented with a cool and fiendish audacity which belongs only to religion.

What will the greedy saints of this Holy Land do in the battle between noble principles and religious falsehood, which is just ready to convulse society? Remember, religionist, your habit of deceit, your teaching of myths to the masses, how you have crippled the human intellect to pay your board. In the midst of hollow grandeur does not the earth tremble beneath your feet? Deeper and deeper will you sink in the quagmire of religious vice till your very name will be lost in oblivion.

Respectfully, ALHAZA.

Liberals, Not Christians, Must Support Our Cause.

FALUN, KAN., Nov. 5, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3, which apply on my subscription. I am late, but can't help it. Owing to the maneuvers of the Demo-Republican party, there is very little money in circulation with us.

I had almost concluded to let THE TRUTH SEEKER go on account of the scarceness of coin, though I like the paper in every way and am one of your old standbys, but you know the whole need no physician (my case), but my conscience revolted. This question arose: Who shall support the Liberal papers and the men at the front of our army? The answer was, Only the redeemed, the Liberals; so in order to attain peace I must remit, and your exclusion from Canada should make every Liberal act doubly quick. I have in my travels met men who claimed to be Liberals and had at one time been Christians and liberally supported the church and its shepherds, but now remain fossils and do not give a nickel to the Liberal cause; and thousands of others who have got plumb disgusted with the Christian religion and do not know nor care to know that there is such a thing as Liberal literature published on this terra firma.

I have been waiting to see Ingersoll, with his talent, force, and ability, take a hand in the people's fight on money, transportation, the initiative and referendum and help to once more restore this republic to the people and make it the land of the free and the home of the brave. I hope you can stay at the helm till the Demo-Republican fog has cleared off and the people get their innings. I know you will then be secure. Yours for righting all wrongs, GUS. ECKVALL.

Emotion Dependent on Physical Changes.

NEW YORK, N. Y., Nov. 2, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Speed Mosby argues neatly in this week's issue that we have no experience of physical pain except in connection with disturbance of the sensory nerves, and that at death these nerves, in common with the rest of the body, are dissipated into their constituent atoms that go to form other bodies, etc. Even if we admit a hell, there is therefore a high improbability that our "souls" could feel physical pain there. With mental pain Mr. Mosby deals otherwise. It appears to me he need have made no such distinction, and thereby had a stronger case. Back in 1855, Herbert Spencer, in his "Principles of Psychology," pointed out the obvious fact that every mental emotion is accompanied by numerous bodily changes, such as heart-beating, quickened breathing, perspiration, derangement of the digestive, sexual, and excretory organs, etc. He suggested that in a pleasant emotion these changes were beneficial to the body; in a painful one, harmful. Modern psychology goes further and says that, in these bodily changes, and in them alone, emotion has its origin. An emotion only follows the receipt by the brain of nerve messages announcing such bodily changes. Without nerves, no emotion, painful or pleasurable. No body, no pain, physical nor mental.

SCUTUM.

A Vicarious Trip to Europe.

CHICAGO, ILL., Nov. 9, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: On Monday I had the exquisite pleasure of visiting the newly-elected treasurer of the Secular Union and Federation at Rochelle, Ill., Otto Wettstein. I found this Freethought sage amid a dazzling array of diamonds and other gems that burst upon my view like the startling vision of Aladdin. He is preparing for the holiday season, and has ordered a large quantity of precious stones and the latest novelties in gold and silver jewelry. It was my intention to leave that night, but I was prevailed on to remain, and am very much pleased that I came to that conclusion. The Freethought pilgrim always receives a royal welcome at the home of the Wettsteins. Mrs. Wettstein possesses that charm of making one feel thoroughly at home, and was full of delightful reminiscences of a year's sojourn in the beautiful city of Heidelberg. Master William Cullen Bryant was in a sort of chrysalis state. While there he had an effort to cast off his English. Now the trouble was to forget his German.

After supper a great collection of views of the celebrated university city were brought out, and for some time we were practically transported to the classic precincts of the Neckar and the Rhine. The town of Heidelberg is situated at the foot of Castle Hill, a spur of the Königstuhl, on the south bank of the Neckar, and about five miles from its junction with the Rhine, and is a city of romantic beauty.

The chief attraction for strangers is the famous castle, which overhangs the west part of the town. It towers on Castle Hill, or more properly the Jettenbühl, 330 feet above the Neckar. The older portion is only a ruin, yet its extent, its magnificence, its beautiful situation, and more than all its interesting history, render it by far the most noteworthy, as it is certainly the largest and grandest, of the old castles of Germany. It was founded about the middle of the thirteenth century and passed through various vicissitudes, suffering severely during the Thirty Years' War; it was three times dismantled by the French and at last struck by lightning and completely destroyed.

Within the castle grounds a modern building or palace has been erected, which contains an interesting antiquarian museum and the celebrated Great Tun, or wine cask, which will hold 49,000 gallons. It makes one thirsty to think of it.

Some of those buildings in the castle inclosure contain the finest examples of Renaissance architecture in Germany.

Next to the castle, the University is the great attraction at Heidelberg, the library of which contains some 300,000 volumes. This noted seat of learning is largely patronized by English and Americans.

It would be almost impossible to find a better example of the medieval and modern ideas and architecture than are to be found in this vicinity. To me its greatest claim to distinction is that in 1848 was held at Heidelberg the convention that led to the revolution in that year.

Besides the German views, there were others of Belgium and England, more especially London and Southampton. The Wettstein party visited the Tower in London, and though an expert in diamonds Mr. Wettstein failed to carry off the "Crown Jewels." They took snap shots at the "Queen's Guards," House of Parliament, and the Strand from the upper story of an omnibus. I certainly feel as though I had had a trip to Europe. I must close, for a party of us are to start for Atlanta to-night.

E. A. STEVENS.

Pulpit Voices.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., Nov. 4, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: A new feature of the Associated Press reports is condensed extracts from sermons all over the country; and the pith of the parson's Sunday discourse is thus sent broadcast. The ideas thus disseminated are naturally varied; and the variations run from utter nonsense and sentimentalism to pious platitudes, and limited evidence of common sense found only in remarks that wander from strict connection with theology. One parson says: "Our great preachers to-day are preaching for big salaries, fine mansions, and sumptuous living, and they are getting them;" and the man who made this truthful assertion might have added that he was not included in that number of the worldly minded, for the simple reason that he lacked the necessary greatness to obtain such results. Only that and nothing more, for the parson who would refuse an increased salary has not yet been located. Another one turns loose some information about prayers not generally known, for he asserts that "the man who prays wields one of the greatest and mightiest forces in the whole universe; in fact, he sets in motion all the forces of the universe." So startling a statement needs verification; but preachers never present evidence, and without it I must continue to believe what Brick Pomeroy once said on the subject, that while prayer may ease a man's soul a tin horn blown up a chimney will accomplish just as much. As all known facts in connection with prayers sustain the experimental conclusions of Mr. Pomeroy, those who desire facts in regulating belief will hardly believe the preacher's positivist but proofless declaration.

Another parson says: "No man has a right to think as he pleases unless he pleases to think right." This is a brilliant remark, and from his standpoint no man has a right to be anything but a Christian, for to think otherwise than Christians do would destroy his right to think at all. That this idea is generally held by Christians is sustained by some of their editorials lately reproduced in your columns, wherein the government is requested to act in suppressing Freethought ideas. It would be just as sensible to regulate a man's breathing by force as his thinking, for both are involuntary movements of the human machine, and no process, including fire, wheel, and rack, has ever made all men think alike. What is right in the estimation of some is wrong in that of others, but if thinking is to be regulated by the clergy as they desire, then the right to think is summed up in: Accept Christianity or get off the earth.

That old gag, "love," is the theme of another parson, who says if the whole Bible was reduced to a sentence that sentence would be love, for that is all that is sought in the many books of the Bible.

Such remarks are liable to give him a reputation as a humorist, for the old book, which has never been rejected as divine authority, is still published with its demand of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth; and the curses there invoked on enemies savor of most anything but love; while the hell-fire doctrine of Jesus seems to rest on a very peculiar kind, to say the least.

Another one declares that the gospel has captivated and liberated human thought, but he forgot to clinch this "liberated" statement by referring to Canada, where prohibition meets the human thoughts embodied in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and believers in the gospel refuse them entrance to the Dominion. Such has ever been the attitude of gospel believers; and instead of liberating thought, suppression has been the dominant idea wherever the gospel had the power found in majorities. Thought has had one continual fight for liberty wherever the gospel has been known with power and influence, and there are no signs on the horizon to indicate that anything different can be expected. These parsons are given special privileges by the press just now, and their inane and inaccurate statements are considered the proper thing for the people to read, but when a San Francisco daily lately published an extract of a recent lecture by Ingersoll it met with adverse comment by another for so doing.

The public press is in the conspiracy of silence toward Freethought, but the other side will be kept prominently before the people by the weekly publication of "pulpit voices," which are as profound and instructive as the prattle of a child.

C. SEVERANCE.

Mistakes of the Creator.

CLEVELAND, O., Nov. 5, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: According to the teachings of Christianity, man is a weakling, a helpless infant, one might say, dependent upon God the Father for the very breath of life. According to the Bible, from which the Christian takes his cue, the contrary is apparent.

God, the infinite, the all-powerful, is made to appear the victim of circumstances rather than the ruler of the universe. He starts in by creating the earth and the animals which inhabit it, and finally creates man. Then, as though the idea just struck him, he discovers that he has created no companion for man. On looking about he discovers that in his shortsightedness he used up all his material and is reduced to the extremity of using one of the man's ribs, out of which he made woman.

Things then bowl smoothly along for a time. Then the woman, in search of novelty, tackles a tree whereon grew certain fruit which was labeled "Hands Off."

Woman then, as now, did just as she had been told not to do. Adam, like the average Christian, was not at the "stealing" of the apple, but came in for his share of the spoils all right. Adam was a guileless creature.

No one could blame a child now-a-days for playing with any bright object it might find in its path, even if it was something which we had cautioned the child not to touch. Adam and Eve are represented as being childlike. The mistake God made was in planting the tree where he did. He wished that fruit for himself only. Why plant it in some one else's garden?

If a human being has a cinch on anything, he does not arrange matters so that others may have easy access to that which he is particular about concealing. It seems to me that if I had had control of something and did not want to lose that control, thereby putting others on an equal footing with me, I could have arranged better than was done in this case.

The Roman church tried the same plan, with the same result, although they made even greater efforts to keep all knowledge from the people. Prayers and tithes were all they needed to know. In the case of the Roman church it was man against man, so there was some excuse for the failure.

Another mistake that God made was when he made the devil. The devil is a wily chap and has caused God much sorrow and trouble since. It is impossible to enumerate all the devil's doings. If God had made every human mind as we find it in doctors of divinity, all would have been well. The tree would have remained untouched, for such minds are like buckets. They may be filled with anything, and will hold the contents without leakage. It is odd, too, that when man had devoured and digested the fruit of that tree he soon got beyond the control of God. Then God's wrath was aroused and he resolved to get even. This was a very human-like resolution.

Now, Christianity teaches the ignorance and folly of becoming angry, and we now-a-days look upon a spirit of revenge with scornful eyes. Christ taught that if any one "smite thee on one cheek turn unto him the other also." These may not be the exact words. Any how, no one, not even the most zealous Christian, to-day practices it. More satisfaction is found in "smiting" back.

But let us continue. God decided to clean up the earth and try it over again. He decided to drown the inhabitants. This was ungodlike, considering he is the God of mercy. It was a good way to get the evidence of his errors out of the way, however. But he made an error in saving anything from the former worthless creation. If a man were to remove the rotten shingles from a roof, he would not use those same shingles or any part of them in reshingling, would he?

About the only act in the first creation which was successful was the ark and deluge act. God had begun to learn from experience, it seems, and in this case entrusted the title rôle to Noah. Perhaps he reasoned that this man would Noah 'nuff to stay in while it rained. This was necessary for the success of the plan.

There is one thing not accounted for in the cargo of the ark. No mention is made of the strange beasts whose skeletons have been unearthed by geologists. This is a sad error.

God finally saw his mistake in saving alive anything from the first creation, and he seems to have got sulky and begun to threaten fire as the next purifying agent to be tried.

Men were too greatly occupied to listen to this; but a few heard, and these were commissioned to commit any crime for Jehovah's entertainment. This plan failed. God saw that he must get down on earth, and look after things himself. He couldn't trust man any more. We know how he got down on earth, according to scripture.

Well, arrived on earth, he seemed to develop trampish propensities and relied on his gift of speech to get along. There didn't seem to be any money in what he talked about, and but few people listened to him, or took any stock in his kingdom. He paid only in promises, and from a meddlesome disposition soon got into trouble. He was crucified like any other offender against the law. It seems that he made his death an excuse for staying dead, and the world grows better day by day. It is assumed in this article that the story told by the scriptures is true.

GEO. H. LONG.

At the Manhattan Liberal Club.

NEW YORK, Nov. 9, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: At the Manhattan Liberal Club last evening, Mr. George W. Hopping, a business man of New York city, and Mr. Charles H. Matchett, a Socialist labor agitator of Brooklyn, were announced to debate the subject, "Individual Freedom the True Basis of all Human Association." Mr. Hopping being sick and unable to be present, Mr. T. B. Wakeman secured and read as much of his paper as he had prepared.

This meeting to me conveyed an important lesson, not so much from the instruction imparted by the speakers as from the disorder caused by certain persons in the audience. Very rarely is there any manifestation of disorder at the club, but on this occasion, a portion of the time, a certain few, twenty or thirty in number, caused the audience to appear more like a seething, hissing, howling mob than like an assemblage of civil people, and these few, undoubtedly not intentionally meaning to be disorderly, were strangers to the club room and it would appear were drawn there because of their familiarity with the name and ideas of Mr. Matchett, which ideas only they wished to hear expressed.

Socialism may be right in theory, but if in practice its adherents are going to become a clamorous mob and give manifestation of what Thomas Paine had to contend with in connection with setting up the French Republic, i. e., the ensuing Reign of Terror, it is better for even those sensibly in sympathy with the Socialistic movement to desist from rendering assistance, until we become sufficiently civilized as a people to be assured that the possibility of mob violence has passed. Mr. Wakeman says the reason the movement does not progress more in numbers is because an American citizen refuses to lay aside his dignity as such and unite with an element that might throw society, if it had the power, into confusion. It is fair to assume by the action of several young men at this meeting, who were probably representatives of those who constitute the Socialist party in this country, that if prompted by their leaders, they would throng up Fifth Avenue with sticks and stones determined to commit violence upon the property rights of those who there dwell. Such would never do, and every good citizen, no matter of what nationality or political or religious belief, would oppose them, and of the result there could be no doubt, as the orderly element as yet, and probably always will, predominate here in America. The dwellers on Fifth Avenue have equal rights and are entitled to equal governmental protection with those who are loyal to Socialistic ideas. There are undoubtedly wrongs imbedded in Fifth Avenue, but such wrongs must be redressed by winning the peaceful support of the great body or majority of the people. A threatening attitude by those who oppose, or who call themselves Socialists, will not accomplish their desired results. The brain and rational arguments must control in all things, and not wild clamor and confusion. This exhibition on the part of several present shows how dangerous it is for a speaker to say in the presence of some people, who have not been properly educated, what those people have not heard said before, or what they may happen to consider contrary to their ideas, and it emphasizes the necessity and importance of the intellectual broadening and the spirit of toleration instilled into those who regularly attend the Manhattan Liberal Club. Such free platforms are needed everywhere to make us good citizens. Those whose faces are familiar at the club conducted themselves like civil men and women, and doubtless our stranger friends will do the same finally, if they accept Mr. Wakeman's invitation to be present every time they have a chance, and come to understand the purposes of the club, and that free discussion means that other people are to be protected in the right to say what a listener may not believe to be true. We must sharpen our wits and correct by rational argument the errors of those who say what we do not believe to be in accordance with truth. Let brains and orderly words clash, but hisses and unbecoming conduct, never.

I will point out to Liberals, if they do not already know it, that Mr. Matchett says he is an Atheist, against which our young friends made no demonstration. If they have philosophically thought themselves into the same position, all right, but if they agree to Atheism in imagination only and are still narrow and illiberal minded, it shows that superstition alone does not make people intolerant. When people are intolerant because grossly ignorant, or savage in their natures, I have always maintained that if religious theories or anything else incomprehensible that excites their curiosity and attention be taught them, such teachings are good as a first step from savagery, as they tend to bring about harmony and order, and then the next step to be taken is to the rational discovery and teaching of fact.

There was nothing in Mr. Matchett's action or speech to suggest that he would call about him a disorderly following, and in fact the fair spirit in which he dealt with his side of the debate won the approbation of the club. If his friends attend the Liberal Club often, always in the spirit of learners, and hear their favorite topic and others philosophically discussed, in time they will be surprised to see how little they knew upon their initiation at the club.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Cause for Complaint.

"I don't like grandma at all," said Fred,
"I don't like grandma at all,"
And he drew his face in a queer grimace—
The tears were ready to fall;
And he gave his kitten a loving hug,
And disturbed her nap on the soft, warm rug.
"Why, what has your grandma done?" I asked,
"To trouble the little boy?"
Oh, what has she done, the cruel one,
To scatter the smiles of joy?"
Through quivering lips the answer came,
"She—called—my—kitty—a—horrid—name."

"She did? are you sure?" and I kissed the tears
Away from the eyelids wet.
"I can scarce believe that grandma would grieve
The feelings of either pet.
What did she say?" "Boo-hoo!" cried Fred,
"She—called—my—kitty—a—quadruped!"

Down in the Grass.

What did you get for the stooping
Down in the grass so low;
I heard the rushing of many winds
Through a green world come and go,
And the dream of a song in a faint white flower
Before it began to blow.
And this got I for the stooping
Down in the grass so low.

This much I got for the stooping
Down where the soft winds blew,
The feel of the moist young green things
That feed on the sun and dew.
And the song that I learned from the small, white flower,
It singeth the whole day through.
This much I gathered, a little young song
That bloomed in the grass and grew.

"H. G." Holds the Fort.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I see in your issue of October 26th that Comrade Joel M. Berry takes issue with me and writes vigorously in defense of the generally accepted notion that prairie dogs, screech owls, and rattlesnakes live peacefully in one hole, emphasizing the matter with the statement that he was a "plainsman" (and probably a trooper under Harney and Kearney.—H. G.) of as early a date as 1846. That is interesting, and I have no doubt that he had many noteworthy experiences. Undoubtedly he could tell more, having seen more of buffalo, elk, bear, mountain lion, Rocky Mountain sheep, and Indians than the undersigned. I also acknowledge that his knowledge is older, but I doubt if it is truer, better, or more extensive about matters concerning my communications of October 5th and 12th. I have no corrections to make and reaffirm all I wrote then. If facts justified the assumption that prairie dogs, screech owls, and rattlesnakes all lived harmoniously together, I would say so; in fact, if true, I would gladly say that the owls milked the she-dogs and fed the milk to the rattlers, but it is not true, and so I leave that to the millions who adhere to Mr. Berry's delusion. There is no other logical conclusion for them, unless they believe that rattlesnakes on the plains live on "wind pie" and "air pudding," and the "health-giving azone of 'the Great West.'" The mistake of Comrade Berry is easily explained. Mark Twain casually affirms the harmoniousness (Is that a good word, G. E. M.? I think the God of Israel is with me now, or that word would not have appeared, and Comrade Berry is a "goner," sure pop!) as advocated by our good Comrade. The trouble with Comrade Berry, as well as the thousands of subsequent seers, was that they were looking for phenomena and expecting to see conditions to sustain a preconceived "notion," instead of looking for facts to explain the actual existing state of things.

It were, perhaps, well to drop the matter now, but as the good Comrade was rather caustic, I may be pardoned for calling attention to his assertions in a general way. To begin, he is rather dogmatic and his descriptions of incidents are so general that they prove nothing, or almost anything, unless he wishes us to take the sincerity—saying nothing about vehemence—of his belief for proof. Such statements as the Comrade has made have been made time and time again. Assertions alter not the truth. He exultantly points to my lack of faith in books and the opinions of the multitude. Books are of human origin, Comrade—I neither believe nor disbelieve them without reservation. Some books are more entertaining than truthful, and others more truthful than entertaining, just as with men. I am too fond of books, as a matter of fact.

The Comrade, in military parlance, makes a literary sortie, but gives plain notice that he depends for his strength on his mighty reserves of books, magazines, and the multitude's inclination to believe the astounding and improbable rather than the simple and reasonable.

How regularly his harmonious inhabitants hunt their holes! How like a mixed brigade on a march! First, dogs (cavalry); next, owl (infantry); then rattler (artillery). But he did not examine the "barracks." Here I have him "flanked," as I have examined them on six different occasions particularly, and I don't know how often casually. In no case did I see a rattler in a "live hole;" in none of them did I see the sign of a dog track where rattlers were. In only one case did I see a dog run into a hole containing an owl. The owl was not disturbed; he doubtless made as polite a bow to the dog as to me. (They can make a French dancing-master die with envy when making bows.) The owl occupies only vacant holes (of which there are always many) to get out of the sunshine. And at night, I hope it will be taken for granted, that a screech owl occupies itself as the owl family generally does. But this, as Geo. E. Macdonald remarked about another matter, "has too much common sense to entitle it to popular approval."

I do not remember to have seen an owl ever "hunt his hole" to escape when on top of the ground, but I have often seen them fly to some other part when pressed to closely. Although some may have gone under ground, I do not doubt the statement of Comrade Berry that he saw snakes run into holes preceded by prairie dogs, they (the snakes) had nothing to fear unless they ventured too far, as stated on October 5th in this journal, and were buried. Otherwise, I have no criticism concerning his descriptions of prairie dog towns, and stand corrected as to what might be the size of prairie dogs generally. In some localities they are as large, and larger, than Comrade Berry says; in others, hardly the sizes that were indicated in my former communications.

I don't know anything about the "woods rattler," but the incident he refers to as proof of its mesmerizing powers, by his own description does not convince me. So far as I can see my "little incident in Texas," to which he so scornfully alludes, would prove mesmerism almost as readily as the incident he relates.

The snake going up and taking a bird from the limb of a tree looks like a very commonplace physical affair. Ten thousand different common explanations could account for it: the bird might have been watching Mr. Berry and not "tending to biz." It might have been previously bitten and poisoned, etc. Had Mr. Berry seen it coming from afar and fly into the snake's mouth, after alighting on the limb, we might say "perhaps." H. G.

*Means inhabited by dogs, so-called by professional dog poisoners.

†"Prairie dogs" are very large ground squirrels, and live mostly on grasses close to their holes.

To F. G. BALL.—You ask if we would want Delia Gifford to make laws for us. No; and we do not suppose she would ever have the chance. Granting that she did, however, would that fact be any worse than the present situation? Who makes the laws for you and for us at the present time, Brother Ball? Is it not some Delia Gifford in male attire? How many real Freethinkers can you find in the Senate and House of Representatives in your state? Not many.

Suffragists base their premises not upon expediency alone, but upon the principles of right and justice. When a young man comes of age, voting age, nobody objects to his employing the franchise because he is a member of the Young Men's Christian Association, Christian Endeavor Society, the Epworth League, or a part of the Sabbath-school. Does he know any more of politics than his sister of equal age? If this is a government of the people, for the people, and by the people, the whole people, then it is but just that the people should participate in it.

If it is a government of one-half the people, by one-half the people, then the disfranchised half should inquire the reason why. If this disfranchised half of humanity has rights and is held accountable to the law, is taxed by law, as is the fact, it should have the power of representation.

So far as experience has gone in suffrage lines for women, the voting has been by intelligent women who have thrown the weight of their influence in other than religious lines.—Ed. C. C.

PIANOS, PIANOS!

$225; - $250; - $275.

After years of earnest study and experiments, Mr. Adam Schaaf, of Chicago, one of the oldest and most experienced piano manufacturers of this country, has produced what is believed to be the most perfect Upright Piano ever constructed. The instrument is thus described:

"The volume of tone is fully equal to any of the best Square Grand Pianos, while the quality is of the most exquisite musical character—pure, sympathetic, and in the highest degree pliable. Its durability and its capacity for standing in tune, is unparalleled in the history of piano-making. In a word, this piano is made to stand, not merely as an ornamental piece of furniture (it is finished in the most artistic and handsome style), but as a musical instrument—not for a day, but for a lifetime."

These pianos received the highest honors at the World's Fair; Mr. GEORGE STECK, Judge of Awards, the best living authority on pianos, reporting as follows:

"This exhibit deserves an award for excellent tone quality, sustaining power, well planned scale, and excellent action, with easy, prompt touch. Material and workmanship are superior."

The distinguished Pianist and Composer, SIGNOR FABIANI, of the Paris Conservatory, says:

"I have used the Adam Schaaf Pianos, and have critically studied their merits, compared them with those of the best American and European makers, and I find them unsurpassed for quality and variety of tone, responsiveness of touch, elegance of appearance, and reliability in every way."

Having made special arrangements with the manufacturer, who is our personal friend, to introduce these superb pianos, we are prepared to offer them to TRUTH SEEKER readers at the above marvelously low prices—from $50 to $150 less than dealers ask for inferior instruments. Every piano is warranted for five years, and the purchaser is not required to pay for it until delivered. We will pay the freight to any station within 1,000 miles of Chicago. Full description of instruments sent on application.

If you or any of your friends contemplate buying a piano it will be to your interest to correspond with us.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

The pulse in the infant beats from 120 to 140 times a minute during the first week of its life, 110 in the second year, about 100 up to the fifth year, and 90 on to eight years. The pulse is higher in children than in adults and slower in boys than in girls. Sometimes it is irregular both in force and frequency, which it is well to know in order not to commit errors in making diagnosis.

Respiratory Movements.—The number of respiratory (breathing) movements in the newly-born is 44 per minute; later, it is 35 to 40 to about the third year, and 90 up to the fifth year. This rapid breathing in the young age is necessary to the greater quantity of heat the child ought to produce, its body, owing to its small size, being more exposed, and thus cooling more easily than that of the adult. During the first period of life, the respiration is almost entirely diaphragmatic (that is, produced by movement of the diaphragm, or midriff, the muscles between the chest and the abdomen), because the true respiratory muscles are not yet developed.

The Attitude.—The infant retains after its birth a flexion, or bending, of its limbs forward, a position of the head and body resembling the attitude of the growing little one beneath the maternal bosom. All its movements appear at first purely automatic (without intelligence), but little by little its motions become voluntary. The hands soon get the habit of closing upon objects presented to them, and are quickly placed upon the bosom of the nurse. The babe instinctively places its hand upon its mother's breast and gently strokes it. This mild irritation is not without a purpose, for as the nursing lies peacefully feeding its apparently playful stroking of the maternal fount causes an increased lacteal (milky) flow, thus satisfying more amply its immediate want.

It is not until toward the second month that the child begins to support its own head, which, too heavy for the slender neck, up to this time turns this way and that. There is also a want of muscular development and muscular co-ordination—that is, of strength and the experience in using it. At the fourth or fifth month the child holds up its head while sitting; at seventh and eighth months the child moves in every direction with facility, but only toward the eighth or ninth month only does it try to sustain itself upon its limbs. Very many do not walk before a year.

Color of the Skin.—At birth the face of the baby is dark-red or a little purple; from the third to the fifth day the general redness is replaced by a yellowish tint more or less intense in proportion as the primitive red was darker or lighter. At the end of a few days a general rosy tint, deeper upon the cheeks than elsewhere, makes its appearance, but not until the end of two or three months does the color proper to each constitution manifest itself, and then one is able to distinguish brunet children from blond. These shades are singularly influenced by race, by isolation, by climate, by temperature, and by habitation. Thus, children of the city, conditions being equal, are more pale than nurslings of the country, and the children of the South are darker than those of the North.

The coloration of the skin varies in different diseases; as, for example, in jaundice the skin is a more lively yellow than the normal, and at the same time the conjunctiva (the membranes which cover the ball of the eye and which line the eyelids) and the urin are colored by the biliary pigment (from the liver). In grave diseases of the newly born, such as pneumonia, thrush, etc., the normal rose coloration or dark red is replaced by a noticeable pallor.

The Fall of the Umbilical Cord.—That part of the cord which remains adhering to the infant, after having been severed, begins to dry immediately and falls off from the third to the fifth day, sometimes later. The falling off of the cord and the work of elimination which usually accompanies it exposes the child to several accidents—some of which might prove very serious—such as hemorrhage of the umbilicus, erysipelas, and gangrene, inflammation of the cord, or tetanus. These accidents ought to be avoided by proper dressing of the cord and compresses to protect it from irritation, dragging, etc. A simple plan is to draw the cord through a burnt hole in a piece of fine linen, wrap it up and place it on the left side of the child, and put a compress over it, the latter to be held in place by means of the bandage, which is usually passed twice round the body and fastened with safety pins. Let the cord drop off naturally and not try to detach it prematurely.

The Large Fontanels. By fontanels is meant those soft membranous places on top of the head, front and back, which have not yet been converted into bone. The anterior (front) fontanel is quadrilateral (four-cornered), and measures in length about 1½ to 2 inches and about 1½ to 1¾ from side to side. The posterior (backward) fontanel is smaller and triangular in shape. These membranous portions of the skull gradually become smaller by ossification (turning into bone). In healthy children the fontanels diminish, become firmer and entirely close at the end of the year. The closing is seldom delayed to the second year, except in case of rickets or hydrocephalus (dropsy of the brain), when they remain open much longer. Pressure of any kind should be avoided.

The Physiognomy. When the newly-born is in good health and nothing agitates it, its face is without any expression; no movement whatever, no wrinkle or fold, is noticeable; it is full, round; the mouth is firmly closed and the child breathes freely through the nostrils. Very seldom do we see a child smile before it is three weeks old; indeed, it does not truly begin to laugh before it is a month old. The eyes move, during the first few days, in every direction, without any determined aim; they become very sensitive to daylight at the end of two weeks, and the attention becomes more fixed, apparently, so that the child recognizes surrounding objects at the age of about six weeks or two months.

Sickness and suffering alter the traits and disposition of the newly-born. Under the influence of a passing colic, we see the face wrinkle or contract, and the child cries. Pneumonia causes a continual alteration of the features, such as the dilation of the wings of nose, pallor of the face, and redness of the upper part of the cheek.

In Choleraic Enteritis (inflammation of the intestines) the alteration of face is profound and rapid; in a few hours the face pales, the nostrils contract, the eyes become hollow, and surrounded by a blue circle, the cheeks projecting, the mouth sunken and shriveled. In infantile atrophy, whatever the cause (chronic enteritis, thrush, inanition), the face of the newly-born takes on an aspect of semi-decrepitude (old age); the features are contracted, the skin is loose, wrinkled, and of an earthy tint, with all the bones projecting. At the same time the eyes are brilliant and the face is grimacing. In eclampsy (convulsions) it is the face generally that reveals the first convulsive movement, but presently the globes of the eye and the twitching lips become the seat of spasmodic movement.

Healthy sleep, etc., will be considered in our next. J. HARTMANN, M. D.

THE law of morality is just as human as the law of nature. — Berthold Auerbach.

ALL history proves the utility of emblem adulation in promoting the purposes of tyranny. — E. Stillman Doubleday.

IN fact, the popular novel that the public call healthy is always a thoroughly unhealthy production, and what the public call an unhealthy novel is always a beautiful and healthy work of art. — Anon.

EVERY step of civilization in the direction of individual rights has been a gain for the common people. To reverse the operation would be to turn back the hands on the dial of progress. — Pittsburg Dispatch.

SAVAGENESS begets savageness, and gentleness begets gentleness. Children who are unsympathetically treated become unsympathetic, whereas treating them with due fellow-feeling is a means of cultivating their fellow feeling. — Herbert Spencer.

THE questions of labor are not to be settled by supreme court and legislative fiat. They must appeal to the private soul and rise to solution in the loftiest intelligence. Riot may be error, but it is not the error for which we reach the probe. The appeal from force on the one side to force on the other is a mere measuring of physical swords which leaves the spiritual status untouched. — Horace L. Traubel.

I RECEIVED a letter from a lad, asking me to find him an easy berth. To this I replied: "You cannot be an editor; do not try the law; do not think of the ministry; let alone all ships, shops, and merchandise; abhor politics, don't practice medicine; be not a farmer nor a mechanic; neither be a soldier nor a sailor. Don't work. Don't study. Don't think. None of these are easy. O my son! You have come into a hard world. I know of only one easy place in it, and that is the grave." — Henry Ward Beecher.

WE may believe what goes beyond our experience, only when it is inferred from that experience by the assumption that what we do not know is like what we know. We may believe the statement of another person, when there is reasonable ground for supposing that he knows the matter of which he speaks, and that he is speaking the truth so far as he knows it. It is wrong in all cases to believe on insufficient evidence, and where it is presumption to doubt and to investigate, there it is worse than presumption to believe. — Professor Clifford.

WE find that the lives of all visible animals are liable to be, and in countless cases are, destroyed by a far lower life; that man himself is destroyed by the microbes, the bacilli, the infinitesimal. We find that for the sake of preserving the yellow fever germ millions and millions have died, and that whole nations have been decimated for the sake of the little beast that gives us the cholera. We have also found that there are animals, call them what you please, that live on the substance of the human heart, others that prefer the lungs, others again so delicate is their palate that they insist on devouring the optic nerve, and when they have destroyed the sight of one eye have sense enough to bore through the cartilage of the nose to attack the other. Thus we find the other side of this proposition. At first sight the lower seemed to be sacrificed for the sake of the higher, but on closer inspection the highest are sacrificed for the sake of the lowest. — Ingersoll.

WE desire to know about a man, his weight and his measure, the shape of his head, the color of his skin, and the curl of his hair; we would pry into all his secrets and his habits, discover his deficiencies and debilities, learn his language, and inquire about his politics and his religion, yes, probe those recesses of his body and his soul which he conceals from wife and brother. This we would do with every man and every woman, and not content with the doing it, we would register all these facts in tables and columns, so that they may become perpetual records, to which we give the name "vital statistics." The generations of the past escape such personal investigation, but not our pursuit. We rifle their graves, measure their skulls, and analyze their bones; we carry to our museums the utensils and weapons, the gods and jewels, which sad and loving hands laid beside them; we dig up the foundations of their houses and cart off the monuments which their proud kings set up. Nothing is sacred to us; and yet nothing to us is vile or worthless. The broken potsherd, the half-gnawed bone, cast on the refuse heap, conveys a message to us more pregnant with meaning, more indicative of what the people were, than the boastful inscription which their king caused to be engraved on royal marble. — Prof. D. G. Brinton.

THE Bavarian peasants, who hav a horror of fire, address the following prayer to their favorite saint: "O holy St. Florian! Protect this house; burn the others."

"Do you think woman will ever successfully fill the pulpit?" "I see no reason why she should not. It ought to be easy, with the sleeves she wears."—Indianapolis Journal.

BLARNEY.—His reverence: "I can't take your cab, Pat. I see your horse has been on his knees." Pat: "Arrah, yer riverence; be aisy about that. The last place he had was with a praste, and faith he had to keep up a simblance of religion."—Sydney Bulletin.

WHEN a boy I attended a colored baptizing in Bath county, Kentucky. A large number of negroes had joined the church under the eloquent ministrations of old Uncle Gawge Murray. The aged and very black preacher had one huge negro man out in the stream, which was very swift, and had immersed him, but lost his hold on him, and the convert went rising and sinking like a porpoise down the current. But he caught a projecting timber on the opposit bank, and after ejecting from his mouth and nostrils enough water to irrigate a small garden, delivered himself of these remarks in a highly indignant manner: "Look er heah! Ef dis foolishhnis doan stop pretty soon soon white gemman in dis country gwine ter loose a mighty valubel niggah."—Chicago Times-Herald.

ADMIRAL PORTER was a very strict disciplinarian on shipboard, though cordial and kindly in his social relations. Once when a new chaplain, whom the old "sea dog" had never met, had been sent to the admiral's ship, there was a slight misunderstanding the following forenoon, Sunday. The new chaplain had waited a long time before beginning divine service for the admiral to come on deck. Finally the chaplain concluded to proceed without the admiral's presence, and had just begun with the words from the Episcopal service: "The Lord is in his holy temple; let all the earth keep silence before him." At this juncture the admiral came up and took his seat, remaining until the service was concluded. The new chaplain was then presented to the admiral, who received him quite cordially, but after the presentations were made the admiral remarked: "I desire to hav you understand, Mr. Howard, that hereafter, while you are on board this ship, the Lord is not in his holy temple until I am on deck."—Chicago Times-Herald.

ADVICE TO PARSONS.

Shut your eyes when a popular sin sloshes round,
And step to one side if you're caught on its ground,
Let the plain-featured sister take care of herself,
Or soon you will find yourself laid on the shelf.
But cultivate early a taste for the fair ones—
Your choicest of smiles must be beamed on the rare ones.
If old Madam Rumor should hint at a wrong
And slight indiscretions around you should throng,
You must call on your friends to accord you a hearing
And show them the compass by which you've been steering;
'Tis the latest that's out, and give you the option
Of choosing 'most any route for your adoption
That has for its purpose to build up a church,
Tho' religion and decency's left in the lurch;
And if they stand by you and whitewash you well,
For them and their friends you will preach no more hell.
Of course you may lose a few members who hold
The faith apostolic is left out in the cold.
Such old foggy notions of course you'll ignore,
And tell them the second birth's now a great bore.
The dilemma presented, of course, has two horns—
Take whichever you please, but keep off my corns.
This ode that I owed to the parson thus ends,
Tho' mixed, it with worldly theology blends.
But I'll say to the parson, you cannot give place
To mammon unrighteous and hold the Lord's grace.
The moral, you'll see, is as clear as a bubble;
If preachers fight sin, they will get into trouble.
—Anson Rudd.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. News of the Week.

GOLD is again on the way to Europe.

THE Democrats of Boston have nominated Josiah Quincy for mayor.

THE first severe nor'easter of the season raged along the Atlantic coast Nov. 14th.

EBEN D. JORDAN, the head of the Boston firm of Jordan, Marsh & Co., died in that city on Nov. 15th.

By the foundering of the steam launch of the British cruiser Edgar 48 men were drowned off the coast of Japan.

JUST now the reports from Turkish Armenia indicate that the victims are Mohammedans rather than Christians.

THE British steamer Leo foundered off the coast of Denmark and fifteen of the twenty-two persons aboard were lost.

IN spite of the very heavy sentences recently imposed upon convicted firebugs in this city, incendiarism is again raging.

A BRIGHT comet was discovered in constellation Virgo on the morning of Nov. 17th by Mr. B. D. Perrine at Lick Observatory.

SENATOR DAVID B. HILL is going on the lecture platform. He will open in the Auditorium, Chicago, on Dec. 6th, his subject, "Liberty."

DURING the last year the United States Life Saving Service helped 483 wrecked vessels, saving of the 5,402 persons on board all but 20.

THE United States grand jury for Wyoming failed to indict any of the whites who massacred the Indians near Jackson's Hole last summer.

VIKTOR E. LENNSTRAND, the Swedish Freethought leader, died at Gefle on Nov. 1st. A mortuary notice will appear in THE TRUTH SEEKER soon.

EX-PRESIDENT HARRISON presided at the Presbyterian Mission meeting in New York, on Nov. 15th. Ex-Secretary of State Foster was the principal speaker.

A PRIVATE detective agency in Chicago, consisting of thieves and ex-policemen, murdered an innocent man on Nov. 14th in mistake for his brother, a pal of the ex-burglars in the detective force. All have been arrested.

As to the present condition of affairs in Cuba, it is useless to hazard any statements. Both sides claim many victories; the special correspondents are widely apart in their assertions, and each "great" newspaper denies the truth of the cable dispatches of the others.

WILLIAM LIEBKNECHT, Socialistic leader and editor, has been sentenced to prison at Breslau for four months, having been convicted on a charge of treason. In 1872 he was imprisoned on a charge of high treason, but was pardoned at the end of two years. In both instances the "treason" consisted in utterances that the imperial authorities did not like.

THE United States battleship Texas is reported damaged in the dry-dock at Brooklyn where she was being cleaned. It appears that parts of the vessel were too light to stand the strain of her great weight. There has been trouble with other of the new war vessels.

THE Chicago Times-Herald, Inter-Ocean, and Evening Journal followed the example of the Tribune in reducing their price from two cents to one cent, and now the St. Louis Republic and Globe-Democrat have reduced from five cents to one cent in the city and two in the country.

IN Kansas, at the late election, Judge David Martin was elected Chief Justice of the state. The Populists did not put up a candidate against him, but C. K. Holliday ran as an independent candidate and received an unexpectedly large vote, especially in Wichita and other anti-prohibition places.

IN a speech to the Georgia legislature on Nov. 13th Ex-Speaker Crisp announced himself in favor of the free, unlimited, and independent coinage of silver at the rate of 16 to 1. This is supposed to be indicative of the platform upon which he will offer himself as a candidate for the United States Senate.

ON Nov. 16th an electric car went through the open draw of the viaduct that spans the Cuyahoga river in Cleveland, and twenty persons went with it into the river 100 feet below. Only one of them was rescued. There have been many bad accidents of various kinds at the viaduct before.

NOW cruising near the Levant, watching Turkey, are thirteen of England's first-class battleships, and fifteen cruisers; eight French battleships and eleven cruisers; thirteen Russian vessels of all classes, and the entire commissioned force of Italy, which will be practically a part of the British fleet.

THERE is something in a name, occasionally. Three times within the last seven years Rev. Father F. A. Manifold has resigned important positions in the Protestant Episcopal church and entered the Roman Catholic fold. As he is a comparatively young man, he is likely to change his fold many more times before he dies.

IN the circuit court at Brooklyn before Judge Gaynor and a jury Emil Schaefer was on Nov. 15th awarded a verdict for $1,500 against Dr. Schelling of the city Health Board for damages sustained at the hands of the latter in vaccinating Schaefer in defiance of his protests. It is a triumph for the anti-compulsory vaccinationists.

DR. LUEGER, Anti Semite leader in the Austrian Reichsrath, was on Oct. 29th elected Burgomaster of Vienna. The emperor refused to sanction the election, and Lueger was re-elected by the Municipal Council on Nov. 13th by a majority of 92. Thereupon Dr. Friebis, president of the Imperial Commission appointed last May to administer the affairs of the city during the temporary abolition of the Municipal Council, announced in behalf of the lieutenant-governor the dissolution of the council. Then followed an Anti-Semite public demonstration.

A LATE item of insurance news is to the effect that women are no longer regarded as "extra-hazardous" risks, and the difference of about $5 per $1,000 against them in the annual premium has disappeared. "There is still a difference in favor of the men in the cash value of tontine policies, but even this discrimination is likely to be abolished soon by the large companies."

JUDGE GIBBONS, of Chicago, declared the State law closing barber shops on Sunday unconstitutional because it was class legislation. An appeal was at once taken by the Barbers' Sunday Closing Association. The Chicago barbers are greatly at variance on the subject of Sunday closing, a majority of the owners of shops being against the law, while the men who do the actual work are equally divided.

A PETITION carrying 60,000 signatures—it is alleged—will soon be presented to the Board of Education of Chicago. It asks for the restoring of the reading of the Bible to the public schools. The petition was prepared and circulated by the Women's Educational League and has the indorsement of Mgr. Satolli, Archbishop Janssens, of New Orleans; Bishop Heslin, of Natchez, Miss.; the Right Rev. J. J. Keane, rector of the Catholic University at Washington; Bishop John H. Hennessy, of Wichita, Kan., for the Catholics, and of Dr. Paul Coens and Dr. Kohler for the Jewish congregations of New York. With the women, the Catholics, the Protestants, and the Jews united it looks squally for liberty. Mrs. Kimball, the spokeswoman of the League, said: "We have received a great many communications from the Catholic clergy, and in no instance have they opposed the move, so long as it is strictly non-sectarian in its nature." It is the plan of the Union to prepare "non-sectarian" passages of scripture for use in the public schools, the selections to be made by a committee composed of different religious denominations.

A HADEAN THANKSGIVING—WHAT THEOLOGY HATH PROVIDED.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, ; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

PIANOS, PIANOS!

$225; - $250; - $275.

After years of earnest study and experiments, Mr. Adam Schaaf, of Chicago, one of the oldest and most experienced piano manufacturers of this country, has produced what is believed to be the most perfect Upright Piano ever constructed. The instrument is thus described:

"The volume of tone is fully equal to any of the best Square Grand Pianos, while the quality is of the most exquisite musical character—pure, sympathetic, and in the highest degree pliable. Its durability and its capacity for standing in tune, is unparalleled in the history of piano-making. In a word, this piano is made to stand, not merely as an ornamental piece of furniture (it is finished in the most artistic and handsome style), but as a musical instrument—not for a day, but for a lifetime."

These pianos received the highest honors at the World's Fair; Mr. GEORGE STECK, Judge of Awards, the best living authority on pianos, reporting as follows:

"This exhibit deserves an award for excellent tone quality, sustaining power, well planned scale, and excellent action, with easy, prompt touch. Material and workmanship are superior."

The distinguished Pianist and Composer, SIGNOR FABIANI, of the Paris Conservatory, says:

"I have used the Adam Schaaf Pianos, and have critically studied their merits, compared them with those of the best American and European makers, and I find them unsurpassed for quality and variety of tone, responsiveness of touch, elegance of appearance, and reliability in every way."

Having made special arrangements with the manufacturer, who is our personal friend, to introduce these superb pianos, we are prepared to offer them to TRUTH SEEKER readers at the above marvelously low prices—from $50 to $150 less than dealers ask for inferior instruments. Every piano is warranted for five years, and the purchaser is not required to pay for it until delivered. We will pay the freight to any station within 1,000 miles of Chicago. Full description of instruments sent on application.

If you or any of your friends contemplate buying a piano it will be to your interest to correspond with us.

A Very Queer Proceeding.

It is becoming more and more evident that the people of this city are owned by various religious and semi-religious orders and societies. The World of the 3d inst. tells a very interesting and significant little story. Three years ago Annie Sigalove was employed in a Coney Island resort. She became ill and was taken to Bellevue Hospital. While there, she was offered a home by a Sister of Charity. Accordingly, she went before Police Judge Grady and, with the consent of her mother, was committed to the House of Mercy. It will be observed that there was no difficulty in getting her committed to the home; as to getting her out of it—well, that is another story, which we are trying to tell. Recently Annie wrote to her father, asking to be released, and he began legal proceedings. Judge Gildersleeve of the Superior Court decided that he had no jurisdiction in the matter. Mr. Sigalove's counsel, Robert Greenthal, told the court that Annie was twenty-two years old, that a young man was anxious to marry her, and that he would marry her before her release, in the House of Mercy, or in the open court. We are utterly at a loss to understand why it was necessary to mention any of these facts in order to make a showing to secure the girl's release. She was not committed for any crime, and she went to the House freely, with her mother's consent. Why she could not leave just as freely, especially with her father's consent, is too much of a puzzle for the plain citizen to understand. Mr. Greenthal also stated that when Annie was committed, her mother consented to the arrangement only on condition that her daughter be released within six months. Now comes on the scene another of our paternalistic organizations, "The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children." Its counsel tells Judge Gildersleeve that Annie is but eighteen and that her habits and conduct are such that she should not be released. In the absence of positive evidence to the contrary, the girl's father is to be presumed to know more about her age than any meddling junta of so-called "philanthropists." But beyond this presumption is the fact that Annie was not committed because of her "habits and conduct," but because she wished to accept the offer of a home made by the Sister of Charity, and the further fact that the law of this state permits a girl to marry at eighteen. The Gerry Society admits that she is eighteen and her parents consent to her marriage. What is lacking? By what authority is she held a prisoner through the collusion of the managers of the House of Mercy and the Gerry Society? This concludes the story:

"I have talked with Mrs. Schaffner, the Tombs Angel about the case," said Lawyer Greenthal, "and she says she thinks the girl should be released." Mrs. Schaffner nodded assent. The judge replied that if Mrs. Schaffner was on the girl's side there ought to be no trouble in obtaining her release on application to the proper authorities."

Now the question arises as to the extent of the authority of Mrs. Schaffner, who without injury to our argument may be conceded to be a most worthy person. Is the retention in Catholic prisons by the connivance of the Protestants of the Gerry Society the fate of those whom Mrs. Schaffner thinks should not be released? In a word, are persons guilty of no invasive act to be imprisoned at the will of this or that society or of this or that individual? Do the people of this city and state have any rights that houses of mercy, Gerry societies, and "angels" are bound to respect, or does everything depend upon the whims and caprices of said societies and "angels"?

The Freethought Congress and the "Irish World."

Patrick Ford is the editor and proprietor of the Irish World. The Irish World was once a great paper, made great by the masterly writings of Infidels, such as Henry Appleton and Sidney H. Morse. It might be a great paper to day had not Patrick Ford abjectly surrendered his brains and his manhood to the Catholic church. But when it spoke he dared not disobey, he abjured his principles, his Infidel editorial writers were frozen out, and the Irish World ceased to be a paper for thinkers, for thinkers must starve when fed on the meager and adulterated rations doled out by the church. So in Archbishop Corrigan's paper of November 2d we find the editorial from which excerpts are given below:

"That is right, friend," said the Quaker to a sailor who cursed and blasphemed at a great rate; 'that is right; out with that vile stuff, and thou shalt be the better for it.' The Freethinkers of this country, who this week have met in convention here in New York, have acted on the Quaker's advice. For two days they vomited torrents of blasphemy and abusive ribaldry against religion, the Christian name, and the Catholic church in particular. Their indecency is so gross as to make it unprintable."

Patrick Ford, do you know anything about what you are pretending to describe? Were you at any session of the Congress? Did you have a reliable representative there? Or are you depending upon the imagination of a reporter of the Sun, who laid all stress on the one trivial speech of the convention, and even grossly misrepresented that, saying that it was indecent and unprintable (as you now insinuate all the proceedings were), when it was nothing of the kind? Like the Christian Statesman, the Christian Reformer, and the Canadian papers, that do not dare let their readers see our answers to the arguments of those who sustain THE TRUTH SEEKER's exclusion from the Canadian mails, the Irish World resorts to the old Christian trick of asserting that the Freethinkers' utterances are "indecent" and hence "unprintable." It is so much easier to make such assertions, regarding the truth or falsity of which the Christian paper's readers can have no means of judging, than it is to attempt a refutation of the Infidels' arguments. Of course, protests against church tyranny and scientific expositions of the origin of religious creeds are "blasphemy"; equally of course the satirizing of childish and savage superstitions is "abusive ribaldry."

dry." Ever since his surrender Patrick Ford meekly takes off his hat in the presence of a gray-headed absurdity.

"Some people are disposed to regard persons who believe in no religion as inclined to be broad, liberal, and brimful of toleration. It is not so. There are cases where unbelief in the individual ends in indifference, as to what all the rest of the world says or thinks; but such cases are the exception, not the rule. The Roman emperors had no religious faith of any sort, yet they subjected the Christians to tortures horrible to relate. The leaders of the French Revolution were Freethinkers, but they deluged France with Christian blood, closed all the churches, and plundered and murdered the religious simply because they were religious."

In the first place, the persecutions of Christians by the Roman emperors have been greatly magnified by church writers, and in the second place the Roman emperors were not Freethinkers. They all had a religious faith of some sort. The real up-lifters of France at the time of and more especially preceding the Revolution were Freethinkers, but Robespierre and many others who were responsible for the Reign of Terror were not Infidels. Thomas Paine, the Freethinker, risked his life in voting as a member of the Convention against the death of the king. For centuries the church had helped rob and imbrute the people, and hence it is not strange that when the latter awoke from the sleep of ages they broke from the control of the enlightened and humane naturalists and retorted in the true Christian spirit and because of their Christian training upon the monarchy, the nobility, and the priesthood who were responsible for their sufferings and their degradation. France was drunk with wrong and hate. The triple powers of superstition, robbery, and tyranny had created the very conditions that led to their own temporary downfall. They had all been cruel, they had all tortured the poor, the unfortunate, the heretical, and they reaped in a slight measure as they had sown. That they did not reap more, and more destructively, whirlwinds was because their teachings and their object lessons had in some degree been neutralized by the light-spreading and mercy-inculcating principles and acts of the Freethinkers. If the property of the churches was taken—well, the people had created it.

After some unbiased remarks concerning the alleged relation of the Freethought organization to the Protestant semi-religious societies, the Irish World concludes:

"These are the people who are trying to secularize the Christian Sabbath and secularize education. Their special aim, however, is to get control of the schools, which they would make godless, believing that if they capture the schools, the rising generation and the future will be theirs. Their every word, aspiration, and movement betray a satanic perversity; and, like Satan, they know what they are working for—a compliment that cannot so readily be paid to the perceptive faculties of some who are pleased to be known as liberal Christians, and who are doing their stupid best to aid in their evil designs the children of unbelief."

"Infidelity hates the Protestant sects in so far as they are Christians, but Protestantism, as the enemy of Rome, it looks upon as an ally. The papacy is the one great foe against which all the forces of hell are united. It is the rock against which the waves forever dash themselves in vain. The Freethinkers themselves, in their recent convention, took note of this fact. 'In the contest between Rome and reason,' said President Putnam, 'Protestantism will be shattered to pieces. It will either fall into the bosom of Rome, or sweep onward into Freethought.'"

It is not true that the Freethinkers are trying to get control of the schools, if by that is meant the desire and intention to teach therein the distinctive tenets of Infidelity, in so far as Infidelity has such tenets. But it is true that we desire to free the public schools from sectarian teaching of all kinds, for those schools belong to the whole people, and the church has no right to divert the money taken from the taxpayers of all religious beliefs and of no religious belief to the propagation of the creeds of any part of the people. How superficial is the knowledge of the Irish World regarding the matter is shown by its attempt to identify the organized Freethinkers with the Protestant religio-political societies. While the Protestant societies are clamoring for the retention of the Protestant Bible in the schools, the Freethinkers are as determinedly opposed to such retention as they are to the introduction of the ceremonies and catechism of the Catholic church.

That the Catholic church is sunken just as low in superstition as is the United Presbyterian, is shown by the fact that its representatives, like the representatives of the Covenanter church, talk seriously about the cunning and perversity of a mythical personal devil, and they all compliment the wisdom of their god with the supposition that he made this devil knowing when he made him that he would to the end of time play his little joker on God's right bower in at least ninety-nine out of every hundred games.

Sometimes we have occasion to accept Protestantism as our ally against the invasions of Rome, and sometimes we accept Rome as our ally against the invasions of Protestantism. We stand for the equal civil and religious liberty of all citizens, and therefore whoever comes on to our platform is welcome to work in the common cause; but we make no sacrifice of principle to secure such assistance. When either Rome or Geneva gives us aid in fighting one invader we are not thereby pledged to assist either, as the case may be, to invade the other or the Jew or the "heathen."

Rome is indeed the great rock in the way of the peaceful and safe navigation of the ocean of life. The various Protestant sects are only so many parts of it, now broken away by schism and scattered about it, some of them submerged and very dangerous, but all dangerous because they are of the same material as the Roman parent. To drop the metaphor, the Protestant sects are composed of those who are too credulous to be Freethinkers and not logical enough to be full-fledged Catholic Christians. They are united with Rome against Reason, but are themselves exposed to the fire of both Rome and Reason.

The Reactionary Movement in Chicago.

As briefly mentioned in our News column last week, there is a movement on foot to put the Bible back into the schools of Chicago. It was started in 1893, when visitors to the World's Fair were asked to sign a petition to that effect. Thus names were secured which represented Christian sentiment not only in Chicago, but all over the Union, and now it is announced that prominent churchmen, of the Jewish, Catholic, and Protestant divisions of religionists, residing and doing business in states other than Illinois, have indorsed the scheme now at the front. Thus this attempt to force the teachings of Judaism and Christianity into the public schools of Chicago is something more than a local fight; it has been made a general issue, in which all citizens of the republic may legitimately join, not only by the expression of opinion through the press but by letter and petition to the Board of Education of Chicago. If the views of Catholic priests, of Protestant ministers, and of Jewish rabbis, who live in the District of Columbia, in Louisiana, in New York, in Kansas, and in Mississippi may be used to influence the Board, why should not the views of producing and tax-paying citizens of those and other states also be used for the same purpose?

The Chicago Woman's Educational Union will present this petition, said to bear 60,000 signatures, to the Board at an early date. It is asserted that the present plan was offered by the late Professor Swing. In brief, it is that a committee, representing the chief divisions of the Christian church, and the Jews likewise, select from the Bible such parts as they think will not set the conspirators to fighting among themselves, and then unitedly force this compilation upon the people of the city, including the Freethinkers, the Adventists, and such other classes as are opposed to religious instruction in the common schools. In the Chicago Times-Herald of November 16th we find the names of this committee, together with some alleged arguments in favor of the conspiracy, which alleged arguments we shall notice further along. William J. Onahan, who not long since received a decoration from the Pope, represents the Catholics. Considering his ecclesiastical affiliation, it is not surprising to learn that Mr. Onahan is an active promoter of a society that has set itself the task of determining for the people, without their consent, what they may read and what they may admire in pictorial art and sculpture. Dr. J. H. Barrows represents the Protestant denominations; C. C. Bonney (who would not permit Freethought works to be sold at the World's Fair) stands for the New Church, and Mrs. Elizabeth B. Cook looks after the prejudices and interests of the Woman's Educational Union. Dr. Emil Hirsch was requested to represent the Hebrews, but he declined to do so, owing to his objections to the plan, and so that place on the committee is vacant at present.

The women who are engineering this scheme are a simple lot, if we may judge them by their spokeswoman, Mrs. Elizabeth B. Cook. She finds it impossible to be consistent in two consecutive sentences. Listen for a moment to this paragon of profundity:

"The reading of the Bible in our schools without note or comment does not imply that it is inspired or uninspired writing. It simply gives the pupil an introduction to that volume which the United States government recognizes as the book of sacred writings, which contains the moral standard of our government."

How does the Bible come to be a "sacred" writing if it is not inspired? How does it come to be "Holy Scriptures," which Mrs. Cook also calls it, if it is not inspired? It is not honest to play with the accepted meaning of words as Mrs. Cook does in this instance. By "sacred writings" the people understand inspired writings, and by "Holy Scriptures" they understand scriptures written by God or by the inspiration of God.

Again: When and where has the "United States government" recognized the Bible as a collection of sacred writings? The Constitution, the fundamental law to which the United States government owes obedience as much as does the humblest private citizen, recognizes no sacred scriptures whatever, and it forbids the government to make any law respecting the establishment of any religion founded on any sacred scriptures. See how simple a fact disproves Mrs. Cook's assertion! But she adds that this sacred volume "contains the moral standard of our government." Is that true? No. What Congress would dare reenact the Levitical Code? And coming to the New Testament, is the teaching of Jesus the "moral standard" of any government on earth? Jesus said—unless the record has been falsified—that when struck upon one cheek a man must turn the other cheek to his assailant. Our battleships and cruisers and torpedo boats, our regular army and militia and police, our armed and drilled regiments and brigades and corps of common and high school and Sunday-school boys, all tell us how Christian men interpret this command. The recent frantic shrieking for vengeance on the Chinese murderers of Christian missionaries is another forceful commentary on the same command. Jesus said—so we are told—that when the robber takes Mrs. Cook's gown she must voluntarily hand him her sealskin sack, but it's a hundred to one that she will call up the police station instead.

"The law delights in exactness, and designates the common version of the Bible as the basis of its religion and morality."

We are at a loss to know whether Mrs. Cook means that the law's love of exactness is shown in the definiteness with which it indicates its selection of the Bible for the purpose named, or in the exactness of the moral precepts of the book itself. If the latter, we would remind her that the moral teachings of the book are a mass of good, bad, and indifferent precepts, of absurdities and irreconcilable contradictions. If the former, we would call her attention to the fact that only when the Bible is used in the courts and the schools can it truly be said to have been selected as the basis of the government's religion and morality. But to argue that its use in the schools justifies its use in the courts is to assume the very thing that is in dispute and to reason in the vicious circle. Regarding its employment in courts, Mrs. Cook should know that only in a very few of the most belated states is the laying of the hand upon or kissing the Bible compulsory; in all others the witness or juror or voter is given the choice of swearing or affirming. If he is so superstitious that he believes that he cannot tell the truth unless sworn with his hand on a collection of old legends and scraps of history, he is permitted to take that form of adjuration, but if he is intelligent enough to know that the modern law requires him to tell the truth under the pains and penalty of perjury if he does not, and if he desires to do so, he is permitted to affirm, knowing that whether he affirms or swears he is liable to human punishment if he lies. Then it follows that if the compulsory use of the Bible in the courts proved that the law designated it as "the basis of its religion and morality," its disappearance from the courts proves that the law has ceased, or is rapidly ceasing, to regard it as "the basis of its religion and morality."

Chicago is to be the storm center of what may prove to be the decisive struggle over the invasion of the public schools by the fetish book of the church; so far the papers have carefully abstained from interviewing anyone who takes a common sense view of the matter, but we may be sure that the Secularists of Illinois are not asleep and that the bigots and the temporizers will all have to answer some, for them, very awkward questions. It should be clearly understood from the beginning that it is far more the principle involved in the teaching of any religion by the state, than the kind of religion that is taught, that is dangerous.

The Theocratic Winter Campaign.

On November 8th a Conference on Sabbath Reform was held in the Twelfth Street Reformed Presbyterian church, New York, at which addresses were made by a number of clergymen. On November 25th and 26th a Sabbath convention was held in Oil City, Pennsylvania. Among the signers of the call for this meeting were the pastors of Baptist, Methodist, United Presbyterian, and Presbyterian churches, and many prominent business men. At the late state convention in Oakland, the full organization of the California Sabbath Association was affected. National Reform meetings have recently been held in Mifflintown, McAllevey's Fort, and Huntingdon, Pennsylvania. Among the delegates elected in the last-named place to the forthcoming national convention of the God-in-the-Constitution party were two Baptist ministers, the president of the W. C. T. U., the president of the Women's Christian Temperance Alliance, and representatives of the Y. M. C. A., and the R. R. Y. M. C. A. Is there any room for doubt that the theocratic movement is growing?

A new drawing-in theocratic society with a "taking" name has been formed. It is called the "Loyalty League," illustrating anew the aphorism that "patriotism is the last resort of the scoundrel," the best definition of "scoundrel" being this: "A man who in the name of religion, morality, or patriotism seeks to trespass on the constitutional and equal rights of the citizen." When it is known that R. M. Downie and Rev. H. H. George are in this new conspiracy it will at once be understood that it means the worst kind of mischief. At a meeting held at Beaver Falls, Pennsylvania, "Dr. H. H. George gave from his experience as a Christian lobbyist in Washington conclusively reasons why Christian citizens should organize to protect the Christian institutions of the country." This is disingenuous to a degree. The only legitimate Christian institutions in the country are the churches and their subsidiary organizations. No one is menacing those institutions with assault through the law, or by illegal force. What Mr. George and the Loyalty League mean by the formation of societies to "protect the Christian institutions of the country" is the organization of the theocratic churchmen for the purpose of transforming the civil institutions of the country into Christian institutions. Only this and nothing more, nothing less. John A. Dodds said that "the Loyalty League is intended to sustain the same auxiliary relation to the state that the Christian Endeavor and all such young people's societies sustain to the church." Exactly. Those societies are intended to do the political work of the churches and the Loyalty League is intended to do the religious work of the state. Or vice versa, as may be necessary. The opinion is expressed that "ere many months the Loyalty League will be known in every state in the Union." "One of the practical aims of this League is to secure permanent headquarters in Washington, the capital of the nation."

A call is out for a national convention of the National Reform Association, to be holden in Baltimore, December 12th and 13th. It is declared that marriages following divorce are "adulterous"; that "laws for the protection of the Sabbath and for the suppression of blasphemy are shamelessly violated," and that "in many cities and in some whole states, the Word of God has been banished from the public schools." The chief object of this convention is to promote the proposed transformation of the United States Constitution into a Theistic and Christian creed. It is apparent that another raid is to be made upon Congress. The convention will be held in a Baptist church. "Christian churches, societies of Christian Endeavor, and other young people's unions, Women's Christian Temperance Unions, and all kindred organizations are invited to send delegates to this convention." Has all this no significance for "no danger" Liberals? We see that the name of the agent of the United States government's imitation of the Russian "Third Section," Anthony Comstock, is attached to the call for this convention. Comment would seem to be needless.

All the theocratic news here given we have gleaned from the columns of the official Christian Statesman. In addition, we learn from the Baltimore Sun that the Churchman's League, an Episcopal organization in Washington, is going to try to induce Congress to forbid Sunday work and recreation in the District of Columbia. Of course the Episcopalians will have the cordial assistance of all the other theocrats. Probably the Episcopal society is acting under the instruction of the central theocratic organization. It is time that the Freethinkers were settling down to work.

The Methodist and the Freethinker.

Below we reproduce two letters that have recently passed between Toronto and New York:

TORONTO, Nov. 15, 1895.

E. M. MACDONALD, Esq., 28 Lafayette place, New York—Dear Sir: You have not printed Onward's article, which you so strongly denounced, and I do not recognize your right to demand the reprint of your long tirade. If you do not regard the pictures and advertisements on your last page as indecent and scurrilous, then no words of mine can convince you. I sincerely wish that your abilities were better employed and in a manner to which upon your death-bed you will look back with greater satisfaction. I trust that you may yet be brought to a better mind and that you use your talents for the welfare of your fellowmen.

Per K. G.

Yours truly,

W. H. WITHROW.

NEW YORK, Nov. 23, 1895.

W. H. WITHROW, Editor of Onward, Toronto, Canada—Dear Sir: Your note of the 15th inst. contains some surprising statements. You say that THE TRUTH SEEKER did not print the Onward editorial which it denounced. Our reply to the article in question is spoken of as a "long tirade." That "long tirade" appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 2d; a copy of that issue was sent to you, and you have evidently seen the reply to your article. In the fifth line of our reply we say, referring to your attack, "see page 693." This was printed in leaded ten-point type on page 691, and all you had to do was to turn over one leaf and you would see your article in full under the head you had yourself put on it. What, then, do you mean by the assertion that we had not inserted your attack? Did you say that to excuse to your readers your failure to print our reply? That you had read our criticism is proven by your reference to our request to you to give it a place in the columns of Onward. As a self-assumed teacher of morality, you have placed yourself in a most equivocal and mortifying position.

We indulged in no "tirade"; on the contrary, we merely presented some facts and arguments which you have deemed it the part of prudence to avoid facing, and that by the resort to what in other than a religious editor would be called a discreditable subterfuge.

Regarding the length of our "tirade," you no doubt know that it contained, excluding your letter, less than three hundred more words than your attack to which it was a rejoinder.

We cannot afford to be less courteous than yourself. We sincerely wish that your abilities were better employed than in bearing false witness against your opponents, and we hope that you will hereafter use them in a less anti-social manner. We trust that you may yet be brought to a better mind, that you will cease using your talents in aid of the suppression of free speech, press, and mails, and that in future you will not only discourage persecution but will refrain from misrepresenting the utterances and actions of the victims of persecution. This letter, preceded by your last, will appear in the editorial columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Will you print them in Onward? Yours for truth and equal liberty,

E. M. MACDONALD,

Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

These communications are self-explanatory; now it remains to be seen what the man who furnishes mental and moral pabulum for the young Methodists of Canada will do to square his conscience with the truth.

There seems to be a lull in both religious and anti-religious activity in Germany. The membership and revenues of the Freethought Society have fallen off since the meeting last year, although a new society has been formed at Nuremberg since the meeting this year. On the other side, much indifference is manifested. At the church elections in Wiesbaden but 123 out of 10,000 voters appeared at the polls. The annoyances and persecutions to which Freethinkers in Germany are subjected should stimulate them into greater activity, it would seem—and the same is true in the United States.

"If Christianity will save a man, it will save a nation which accepts it."—Rev. H. H. George.

If it saves a man it saves him because its teachings influence him to a better life than he would otherwise lead. But he is an individual, and he can accept its teachings because they appeal to his reason and his impulses. The nation is not an organism, it has neither reason nor impulses. No teachings can appeal to the non-existent. Acceptance by any number of individuals of the teachings of any religion is an entirely different thing from the forcing on the minority by the majority of the doctrines of a church. Such forcing saves neither the individual nor the aggregation of individuals which Mr. George calls the nation.

An American Presbyterian minister quotes with great glee from an address delivered by the late Earl of Shaftesbury as follows:

"I do not believe in the history of diplomacy, or of any of the negotiations carried on between the nations of the earth, we can find anything equal to the wisdom, the soundness, and the pure evangelical truth of the body of men who constitute the American mission in Turkey. They are a marvelous combination of common sense and piety."

The foregoing was brought out to offset the opinion expressed by Admiral Kirkland concerning the same missionaries. There can be no doubt that the praise bestowed by the Earl of Shaftesbury is that of a partisan; what he says about the "wisdom" and the "soundness" of the American missionaries in Turkey is to be read in the light of his declaration regarding their "pure evangelical truth." The Earl of Shaftesbury is unmistakably a prejudiced and interested witness.

The way Christians love their enemies is very peculiar, as several little incidents that have happened in Europe during the last few months will show. In Sweden, O. Ljungdahl, a Freethought lecturer, was sentenced to three months' imprisonment for blasphemy; Dr. Bruno Wille, president and lecturer of the Free Religious Society of Berlin, was sentenced to pay a fine of 1,000 marks or suffer imprisonment for 100 days for teaching the children in the Society's Sunday-school; the Philosophical Society of Hanover has been closed by order of the police because the opinions expressed there are dangerous to the doctrine of the divine origin of government, and the Freethought Society of Munich has met the same fate. Inasmuch as the National Reform Association maintains that government is instituted by God and the Free-thought Federation denies that it is, there can be no doubt that the latter would be suppressed if the former could get Congress and the state legislatures to respectively submit and ratify the proposed Christian amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The Christians of Germany are mentally so unequal to the task of competing with the Jews that a new Anti-Semitic organization, composed of the remnant of the old Anti-Semitic League and of ultra-Protestants, has been formed for the purpose of excluding Jews by law from public positions and from taking any degree in the professions. The Pope has put on the ecclesiastical blacklist two works by Don Odon de Buen, and the Spanish government has removed him from his professor's chair in the University of Barcelona. We hear much about something that is called "Christian liberty." There was a fine exhibit of it in Mecklenburg, Germany, some time ago. The child of a workman had died and the mother asked a preacher to come to the grave and pray over the body of the little one. There was no money in prospect and the minister did not heed the request. Thereupon the mother knelt at the graveside and offered a prayer herself. Then she was imprisoned, presumably because she had no license to talk to God.

It isn't a great way from now to the sun festival known as Christmas—an adaptation of pagan rites to Christian necessities—and those who intend to follow the pretty custom of making presents to their friends on that occasion will find on another page of this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER a list of books suitable for that purpose. If our friends desire we can hold the books till a few days before the festival and mail or express them so that they will reach the destination at the right time. A present that we would recommend is to send to your Liberal friend who does not now take it, a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER a year for $3, which carries with it a copy of the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" in boards. For $3.50 we will send cloth bound book, with gilt side stamp—a handsome present indeed, with the added attraction of a weekly remembrance from yourself to your friend in the shape of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Such a present will do you good, your friend good, and us good—a combination of goodness which seems hard to resist.

Hiram Maxim, the inventor, has contributed some articles to the New York World on the missionary industry, and they have not been received very favorably by our Christian friends. His first article, in the issue of October 19th, was accompanied by a reply by the missionary boards. In the issue of October 26th he answers the reply. He points out that there is only one name under heaven whereby men can be saved from hell.

"Christ is universally regarded by Christians as their savior. If we believe in him we shall be saved. The greater number of Christians believe and teach that, if one is once offered Christianity and does not believe and accept it as truth, he will without doubt be eternally lost. They exhort us to have faith and teach that the greatest of all sins is a negative one—not to believe."

"Now, as all our missionary efforts and teachings in China are for the purpose of rescuing the souls of the Chinese from eternal torture, I hold that if our religion, or the manner of teaching it, is such that it fails altogether to save souls, and rather tends to increase the number of those sent below, it is a gloomy and ignominious failure and worse than useless, and I think I shall be able to show that, according to our own theory and teaching, the only result of our missionary labors in China has been to send countless millions of Chinamen to everlasting torment."

Starting from these premises, Mr. Maxim shows that the preaching of Christianity in China has during the last one hundred years sent the souls of hundreds of millions of Chinamen to hell. Not one Chinaman in ten thousand who hears the gospel is converted; therefore he is sure of eternal death, when he would otherwise have been saved, if he was a good man according to the light he had under his ancestral religion. Mr. Maxim thinks that this is a terrible responsibility for any set of men to impose upon themselves, but the costly business will not willingly be abandoned, we may be sure. There is too much fanaticism and money invested in the enterprise for that.

The Old Story in Plain English, with Notes and Comments.

CONCLUSION.

For a thousand years few doubted the reality of heaven and hell, or the existence of God, or the authenticity of the Bible. History marks that period as a reign of ignorance, wars, cruelty, and oppression. Oh, the black despair of that thousand years! The poor, deluded mortals would pray while they tortured, sing hymns of praise to God while others were suffering the most excruciating pains, and return thanks when, by the most cruel torture, they had put a doubting heretic out of the way. What must be thought by those acquainted with its history of the claim that Christianity has been a great civilizer?

Think of a slave ship in which human beings are packed away like herrings in a box, and every day the cargo overhauled and the dead bodies thrown into the sea. And then think of prayers on board that vessel every day because they thought that God would give them a more prosperous venture if his aid was invoked, even by man-stealers. A firm belief that the Bible is the word of God will transform men into persecuting savages, and forever hold them to a level with the ferocious instincts of those who wrote it. To follow the example of men, even though ignorantly, who determined the rights of others by brute force and robbed and enslaved the weak, and then claim that it all had the sanction of God, can only have a disastrous moral influence. Until the laws of our being are changed the same causes will produce the same effects.

In old Bible times a chieftain would gather around him a horde of marauders and make a descent upon some weak tribe and kill the most of them, and make slaves of the rest and take their cattle and plunder them of all their stores, and then he would retire on one side and hold a palaver with God and then return with a message sanctioning the act. And then he would perform some hocus-pocus tricks and pass them off on the unthinking multitude for miracles, and then they would think through their boots and talk through their hats and call him a man of God, and treat him as a sort of holy hybrid with the body of a man and the spirit and power of God. The Christians of to-day are taking these human tigers of old Bible times as patterns for imitation, and insanely believe that there can be no peace on earth, or good will to men, until all shall follow the example of these bloodthirsty desperadoes.

When the world's great account is made up it will be found that Christianity had its origin in lying, deception, and fraud, imposed upon the ignorant by Christian mountebanks.

The idea of a battalion of men jumping out of their graves and perambulating the country, is too ridiculous to be believed by any whose brain has not been soaked in superstition. Some may have been buried a half century, some more recently, all at different periods, as death poked them in the short ribs. What an uncanny sight they must have presented. Whether they marched in single file or in double columns, or ran promiscuously through the country, deponent sayeth not. Some must have been clothed in flesh, others must have shed a very unpleasant odor; some must have had their clothes on, and others sailed under bare poles.

Such a marvelous set no man ever met

Or heard of in story or in song;

Some musical hummers, young saints and old bummers,
Were seen to parade in the throng.

If a hundred men should swear to such an occurrence to-day, no scientist would credit the story. Neither would he believe that men, in violation of the law of gravity, ever went up from the earth bodily. According to the statement, they went up flesh, bones, breeches, and brogans.

What became of their clothes? Do they have a pawn-shop in heaven, where Ikleheimer and Jacobs deal in second-hand clothing?

Great guns, what a relic a patch from the bosom of Elijah's old breeches would make!

Did they have a button factory up there and work the bones of those who ascended into buttons, as Christians say the button makers did with the bones of "Old Tom Paine?"

It was only the soul or spirit which survived; the bodies must have perished. What must have been the consequences when decomposition set in? There must have been a great demand for salts of ammonia among the heavenly hosts.

Could not God manage to drop down a toe nail now and then when Christians run short of relics?

There would not be a cripple in all the land if one of Elijah's old shoes should be thrown down with God's trade mark upon it.

How degrading the idea of spending millions of dollars every year to send such stories to the heathen. No greater heathens can be found than those who can be imposed upon by such nonsensical drivel. No wonder that paupers and bums and fishermen were sent out to tell these stories; decent people could not be induced to engage in the business.

One paper says what we want of a navy is to protect our missionaries in foreign lands. Another paper says there is nothing that China needs so much as American lead. That's the doctrine; if the heathen don't receive the holy gospel-froth gladly, just shoot him down like a corn-pulling crow.

The heathen had better learn quite early in the morning that Uncle Sam is going to protect his straw God because smut bag Tony and Talmage and Miss Willard and a few Sunday-school teachers say he must. The Chinese must learn that Christ was not crucified for fun, and if they don't stop making up faces at our missionaries Uncle Sam will float over some of his big stomach pumps and pump 'em full of lead.

Draw the people's money out of the treasury and send off soldiers immediately to back up the missionaries. If the heathen don't know a good thing when they see it, it is no fault of ours.

How important it is that the heathen should know that a ghost can beget and a virgin bring forth a child; that snakes and asses can talk; that strength lies in hair and not in muscle; that rams' horns are more potent in leveling down solid walls of masonry than a park of artillery; that the jaw-bone of an ass is far more effective for making bits of human skulls fly up into the air than the Irish shillalah; that the shortest and quickest way to devastate an enemy's country is by foxes with illuminated tails; that the greater the number of wives and fancy women a man keeps around him the more he gains the favor of his heavenly joss. Now I think the heathens have been Christianized about enough, and I guess the heathens think so too. It don't seem to improve them any, and, besides, it is very expensive. It costs about twenty-five thousand dollars to convert a heathen, and then he is not as good as he was before. And then he never stays converted any longer than he has access to the missionary's flesh pots. It is about time for the heathens to tell the Christians that as far as commercial relations in religion are concerned they had better be broken off. "Our religion is quite satisfactory to us; if it does not suit you, you had better keep away. We prefer our own religion to your religion of hell and hate. At least reform yourselves before you try to reform us. When you come as friends and visitors, or on legitimate business, you will be welcomed. When you come as intruders and meddlers, interfering with our matters which do not concern you, you will receive the treatment due to intruders and meddlers. Our manners and customs and our religion are well suited to our people, but we shall not try to force them upon you, and if you insist on forcing yours upon us, we shall pointedly insist upon your minding your own business.

"When you come here and try to make us hate our fathers and mothers, our sisters and brothers, and interfere with our household affairs and break up our families, our objections may be backed up with demonstrations not altogether agreeable. If you cannot observe the rules of common decency and not obtrude yourselves where you are not wanted, and cannot show some signs of good breeding and of a good-mannered people, we shall object to your mingling with our people.

"Your religion affects only the poorest and lowest element of our people, and as soon as the inducement is taken away they fall back more depraved than ever. Christian chicanery does not improve them. There is no such thing as true conversion. They remain Christians only so long as they are feasted, favored, and fondled. We have tried the experiment and it has not proved a success. If you wish to convert our people you must take them to your own shores for better or worse, and then not throw them back upon our hands after you have perverted the little virtue there was in them.

"And now we say to all the Christians, when we want you as religious teachers we will send for you. Until such time please manifest as much courtesy as is recognized by savages—do not come unbidden. If you do we shall treat you as savages."

Would Christians take the hint? Not even after they are kicked. They are not built that way. They came of low parentage, and were sadly neglected in the bringing up. They are ill-mannered, and have no sense of justice, and were never taught to respect the rights of others. They are a brassy set, and as brainless as they are brassy. They intrude themselves where they are not wanted. They seek favors when not entitled to them, and try to take by force that which is justly denied them. In short, I know of no heathens who more than they need to be converted to decency, good manners, and probity.

Christians love Jesus and hate men; they revere an old book and ignore science. In their blind zeal to serve God they turn a deaf ear to the cries of humanity. To gain heaven they neglect many things essential to their happiness here. To escape hell when they die, they live a hell of a life here. To teach men to respect their religion, they have forfeited all respect for themselves. To keep men from speaking evil of their religion, they have pulled out their tongues. To give men a practical idea of the pains of hellfire, they burnt them at the stake. To show that God is love, they have persecuted thousands in his name. To make men tell the truth, they make a man kiss an old book full of lies and fables. To show their mercy and charity, they never forgive. To show their humanity, they have enslaved their kind. They proclaim peace on earth and good will to men by standing armies, great guns, and powerful war ships. Their practices have been in direct opposition to their professions from start to finish.

JOHN PROCK.

A Thanksgiving Prayer.

Our great and pious Grover has appointed us a day
When each and every citizen should crook his knees and pray,
And offer thanks to him who rules from somewhere up above
For blessings he has given us through his abounding love.
Like loyal subject, therefore, I will hasten to obey;
So bow your heads and listen, all, to what I have to say:
O Lord, we feel to thank thee that in this, the present year,
We exercise our gift of prayer without the slightest fear
Of thumbscrews, pincers, red-hot boots, or rack, or fag-ots' flame,
To torture us or murder us in thy most holy name.
Expand our hearts, O Lord, and let thy grateful children see
The blessings great and numerous they have received from thee.
And firstly we would tender thee our fervent thanks, O
Lord,
For our religious president, of whom thou'st doubtless heard,
Who sits so calmly by the stream and casts his hook and bait,
While seventy million people groan 'neath his enormous weight.
Still we would thank thee more to let a happy day draw near
When another Thomas Jefferson shall occupy his "cheer."
And we will never seek to know our ruler's creed or clan,
Just so he's not, as Grover is, a Presbyterian.
For thou, O Lord, dost know full well the tenets of that creed—
Not thou thyself, nor Christ thy son, nor both, could e'er succeed
In governing a people if you had your noddles crammed With thoughts of hell and brimstone, and of countless infants damned.
We trust, O Lord (thy pardon, but it is for joy we laugh),
That Grover's the last president to feed us on such chaff.
To-day let all the criminals within our jails give thanks
That up to date no infidel has justly joined their ranks.
And let the sewing girls rejoice, as they for thy son's sake,
At 40 cents per dozen, still have flannel shirts to make
For heathen children far away whom they will never see,
While their own aged parents live on public charity.
Let hordes of idle mining men who walk or lie or sit,
In hungry idleness, about the mouth of some old pit
In humble gratitude return their thanks with one accord
For the blessings of starvation which thy generous hand hath showered;
While sixty thousand tramps who roam this land we call so free
Send up their loud thanksgiving song to Grover and to thee.
For drouth and famine, floods and fires, and blasted fields of grain,
We bless thee, God of nations, and we sound thy praise again.
We feel to glorify thy works, that over all the globe, While honest toil is clothed in rags, thy servants wear the robe.
But the promise thou hast given us most joyously we seize—
Though, in the winter of this life, peradventure we may freeze,
The next will be quite different, where earth's battalion's swarm,
And thou with fire eternally wilt keep thy children warm.
Give ear, O Lord, unto our prayer, and let it quick ascend—
May justice come on earth to stay. Amen, O Lord—Amend!

It is the baldest hypocrisy that makes this ["the maintenance of the Sunday law"] a "labor question," as the Tribune pretends that it is. Every morning newspaper of repute, including the Tribune, is published seven times a week. Yet every editor, reporter, compositor, pressman, and office boy has his one day in seven off. This plea of maintaining the Sunday laws "in the interest of labor" is a fetch. The Sunday laws stand upon the statute books openly and avowedly as laws designed to enforce the observance of "holy time." That is the language of the law itself, as anybody may see by reading section 264 of the Penal Code.—New York World.

Reflections of a Physician.

Canst thou by searching find out God?—Job.

It is both amazing and amusing to hear the average Christian talk about God. They know him as well as you know your best friend. In sickness they appeal to him with the greatest confidence, but they don't forget to send for the doctor; and in nine cases out of ten, if the doctor is an educated man, he is an Infidel. If the sick recover, God has done the work; if he die, the doctor killed him.

Some years ago I attended a man through a very severe attack of typho-malarial fever. Meeting him soon after he got up, I expressed my pleasure at seeing him out again. He looked sober, shook his head, and remarked that if it had not been for the mercy of God he should have been in his grave. I turned quickly upon him and asked him if God was practicing physic. He stared at me in mute surprise. I told him I did not know the gentleman to whom he referred, but had often heard of him, and that if he really knew that God was engaged in the practice of physic I would quit, as I could not afford to "buck" against a doctor of infinit wisdom and power. But, I continued, there are some difficulties attending the practice of your God which seem to me to be contradictory and absurd. He is all-wise and all-powerful. He "creates good, and he creates evil" (Isa. xlv, 7). Why does he create evil? Would it not be infinitely better if there was no evil in the world? Can that which is perfectly good produce evil? Admitting that your God has a right to punish the bad, has he the right to make them bad, or to make them so that they become bad? Why does he lay the heavy hand upon his own children—the Christians? Why do one-third of our race die in infancy?

My little lecture was closed by informing my friend that the finite mind could not comprehend the infinit; that his God was a creature of his own diseased brain. There was considerable merriment exhibited by the by-standers, and an impression made on my friend which I believe he never forgot. The fact is, every nation and individual make their own god, and generally in their own image. Xenophanes said, six hundred years before the Christians' God was said to have been born, that the Ethiopians represented their deities as black with flat noses; while the Thracians make them blue-eyed, with ruddy complexions; and, similarly, the Medes and the Persians and Egyptians portray their gods like themselves. He adds:

So, if oxen or lions had hands and could work in man's fashion,
And trace out with chisel or brush their conception of godhead,
Then would horse depict gods like horses, and oxen like oxen,
Each kind the divine with its own form and nature endowing.

When we ascend the scale from the illiterate, superstitious Christian to the learned doctor of divinity, we are sometimes surprised at their teachings and admissions. Listen to Dr. Mansel: "We are absolutely incapable of conceiving or proving the existence of God as he is; and so far is human reason from being able to construct a theology independent of revelation that it cannot even read the alphabet out of which that theology must be formed" (Bampton Lec 1859 4th ed, p. 40). He goes on: "We are compelled, by the constitution of our minds, to believe in the existence of an Absolute and Infinit Being; but the instant we attempt to analyze, we are involved in inextricable confusion. . . . Our moral consciousness demands that we should conceive him as a Personality, but personality, as we conceive it, is essentially a limitation; to speak of an Absolute and Infinit Person is simply to use language to which no mode of human thought can possibly attach itself" (Bampton Lectures). A large volume would be required to set down extracts from Dr. Mansel, Mozley, Milman, Newman, and others upon this subject, the gist of which is, you cannot comprehend or conceive of the existence of a God by Reason, but that it can only be effected by Revelation and Faith. That is to say, you prove the existence of a God by revelation, and the revelation by God. Is this a petitio principii? If you spend an hour in reading the views of great men upon this great, incomprehensible, and inconceivable subject, you will be ready to sing the following good old doggerel:

It wriggles in and wriggles out,
And leaves a body still in doubt,
Whether the snake that made the track,
Was going South or coming back.

Genesis.

I.—THE CREATION, CHAPTERS I, II.

No other country, except perhaps Great Britain, goes through such a wretchedly gloomy Sunday as the United States. On the European continent Sunday is the merriest day in the week; theaters are open on that day, if on any; families pay each other visits, amusing themselves with a diversity of innocent games; afternoon concerts are very common in even the smallest towns; and in every village there is at least one fiddler leading the jolly young farmers to the dance on some barn floor; Sunday in Europe is the day of rest, recreation, and pleasure. Why is it that in this country we find a church at almost every second corner, often only a wooden barn with a hen-coop on the top of it, still oftener, if of stone, with the upper half of its head cut off, very seldom in complete condition, but still always claiming the name of church? Why is it that on this day of recreation people stalk around as if they were in pain, or making penance in a hair-cloth shirt?

Principally, I presume, because they take after their forefathers, who were a set of religious cranks, and, whilst in opposition to the tyranny of intolerance in the old country, yet hardly settled in the new, here made laws of a still more oppressively intolerant character, of which laws some are to this day on the statute books, and therefore, according to Mr. Parkhurst and consorts, must be obeyed, however crazy they may sound.

Our Sabbath is also kept so strictly, because it is insisted upon by some twenty per cent of our population, to be found mostly among the upper and middle classes of people, who think the present state of things so convenient for their own well-being that can't agree to a radical change; who are afraid that ignorance will change into vagrancy, if no fear of punishment hereafter keeps it in check; who consider that science should have respect for the convictions of ignorance; who themselves imagine that they believe in something so vague that they don't know what it is, and therefore call it "a God," sneering at Ingersoll because he is supposed to believe in "nothing," but otherwise giving full allowance to any kind of creed, however lunatic its appearance, from Salvation Army and the Christian Endeavorers upwards. These people don't believe in the Bible, though feigning to do so; but they go regularly to church, their business requiring their presence there; merchants of every description, high and low, go to church to capture customers; office candidates to solicit voters; doctors to impress the ladies with sickness; young larks to impress the ladies with love, and so on. This class of people is the curse of a nation; it possesses the ruling influence; it teaches its children; it induces its friends and relations; it compels its subordinates; in fact, it determines almost the whole population to accept its belief as it is feigned. How such mighty influence is possible seems strange, and we can account for it only from the fact that hardly any of these trusting believers in the Bible ever read this book themselves, except half asleep, always taking the preacher's words for those of "the book."

Read the Bible, and you will meet with some of the most idiotic nonsense, the vilest falsehoods, and the most rascally vies you can think of. Let us study together its two first chapters, containing a description of the creation of the world. In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth (i, 1); afterwards he created heaven a second time on the second day (v 8), and the earth a second time on the third day (v 9); or else he created on the first day light on the earth (v. 2) that did not yet exist! Here it is indeed true that extreme simplicity of language is as perplexing as extreme affectation; especially confounding are those exceedingly tedious, not to say ludicrously droll, repetitions of the same statement. As for contradictions, that's the only feature in these two chapters quite logically carried through. Now, if we feel inclined to compromise with this first contradiction and say that probably the condition of the earth, mentioned in verse 2, means the condition of substance before the creation, we would have every denomination in Christendom harnessed against us, for they all think that God made everything from nothing, though I can't see wherefrom they have got such a wonderful notion, the story of the creation not uttering a syllable in that direction. But however willing our mind, we cannot explain this conundrum: God creates light, day and night, on the first day (v. 3-5), but the sun not sooner than on the fourth day (v. 14-19); on the first day he divides the light from the darkness, and on the fourth day he makes great lights to divide the light from the darkness! Can any creation-story be more utterly nonsensical? It is strange that our great philosophical geniuses in theology as yet live in a kind of doubt regarding the nature of God, of heaven, and of the sheep in the next world. I think verse 8 ought to give them a good clue: The substance altogether consisting of waters, is divided into two by a big horizontal plate called heaven, under which are piled dry land in one heap and waters in another, and on the lower side of which are pasted up sun, moon, and stars, and above which are, according to our understanding, other waters. What conclusion comes nearer than that the heaven is a big ocean; that God is a big fish therein, let us say a whale, for a comparison of the verses 21 and 26 will prove that the whale is a fish, and that all sheep are to be fishes in eternity? Where hell is to be located, and of what to consist, we are not here at liberty to say, as God didn't create that place during his first six working-days.

It seems that as far as to create "every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth" (v. 26), God didn't aim above his might; he only needed to say, "Let it be; and it was so;" and after it was so, he always made it, to be quite sure of it. But when he was going to make Adam and Eve, he almost had to give up the job unfinished. It is true that chapter i, verse 27, in a summary way, states that he created male and female on the sixth day. But chapter 2 is more explicit; it goes even so far as to say, twice in immediate succession, that God had to sit down and take a day's rest "on the seventh day from all his work, which he had created and made" (c. ii, v. 2-3), and that, instead of having created male and female, as chapter i, verse 57, has it, he, some time in the next week, I suppose, saw that there was not a man to till the ground (v. 5), and therefore rolled together a heap of mud which he formed into a man (v. 7). Notice, that this time he didn't say, "Let it be," but that he had to blow into its nostrils to get it to live. He leaves man to philosophize over his sudden existence, and occupies himself with digging and planting a garden in the eastern part of Eden; this done, he carries his man over his back into the garden (v. 8); then he carries him out of the garden again, returns alone, makes those two memorable trees in the midst of the garden (v. 9); and now he is carrying in the man a second time (v. 10), from which we must deduce the fact that he carried him out again after the first time. We can easily imagine what a beautiful picture this carrying-business made: God himself, the old man, trudging along, Adam holding fast on his back, his arms around the old man's neck, and his legs encircling his hips. It is a wonder that M. Doré didn't reproduce it on canvass.

It seems that God bore a good will towards his Adam, because he promised him lots, just as our political candidates do, and kept his promises as well as they do. He even felt compassion for his solitude (v. 18); all the animals made a review before Adam, from which he might choose any one as his companion. Though Adam gave every animal its name (v. 19), there was not among them a single lass lovely enough to excite Adam's tender passions (v. 20). God was placed in a very awkward position; what should he do? At last he hit upon a luminous idea; just as our dentists do, he made use of some painless gas; and while Adam was asleep the old man performed a very dangerous operation; he took out one of his ribs, "closed up the flesh in its stead" (v. 21), whatever that means. And, lo, when Adam returned to his senses, there lies at his side a creature so charming that Adam immediately, although he could never have dreamed about it, and nobody had told him, yet understood that "this was now bone of his bones, and flesh of his flesh" (v. 23); and therefore he called it woman, because it was taken out of man, from which we have to believe that Adam originally was an Englishman. And for such belief there is just as big reason as for Rudbeckin's opinion that he was a Swede. The quaint little geographical sketch we find in v. 10-14 may give rise to and proof of any opinion in this line.

The good old man had intended to keep Adam in the garden for the purpose of dressing him and holding him in good care (v. 15), but the big parade of animals, his disappointment in finding Adam too fastidious, and lastly his delicate rib-operation must have completely deranged his faculties of memory; for as yet the man and the wife had to go about naked; but they didn't care, they were not at all ashamed (last verse). From which, compared with the sinful knowledge of nakedness in the next chapter, we may infer that not to be ashamed of one's nakedness is to be like Adam and Eve before their fall into sin. This inference should be considered quite correct; and the tendency of the masculine sex nowadays to admire tights on the stage, and the passion among our ladies to expose their forms, should be considered as a step forward to the blissful state of paradise upon earth, for which we have so long been yearning. Be that as it may, it has nothing to do with the nature of God as pronounced in the two first chapters of the Bible; neither does it concern the nature of God. Whether this nature is pronounced in a cultivated language, or in one so wretchedly crude that, leaving free scope for fancy to build upon, it is thought fit for the foundation of so many contrarious churches. We must not judge from the outer form, but from the general impression of its contents.

The general impression is this: That the earth is the center of the universe, as if it weren't only a sand upon the shore of the ocean, among these myriads of stars and solar systems which flitter around it! That the great lights were made only to serve the earth, as if the earth itself weren't bound to move around the sun, perhaps its mother, surely millions of times bigger than itself! That woman was made from a rib of man, as if man didn't have down to the present day an even number of ribs, and nowhere a piece of closed-up flesh in their stead! That man was made to have dominion over the earth, both the animal, vegetable and mineral kingdoms; as if not most people would quiver from fright before any master of the wilderness, a lion, a tiger, a bear, perhaps fainting away even before the monster touched them; as if not rats and mice, bugs and lice, in fact all parasitical animals, exercise a dominion over man far stronger than man ever will over them; as if not fruit, blossom, and perfume kill as often as they obey; as if earthquakes, falling rocks, treacherous glaciers, huge ice mountains upon the ocean, the ocean itself when in fury—shortly, this whole tremendous nature—didn't inflict upon humanity such terror as to make the benefit it takes therefrom a very small recompense indeed, for all its sufferings! The being that inspired man to write the first and second chapters of Genesis was more ignorant of the composition of the earth than we are now—call that being God, if you like.

OLD SOUTH CHURCH THEOLOGY—"FLOWERS OF FREETHOUGHT"—"BIRDS OF PRAY."

Rev. Mr. Savage, in his sermon last Sunday, Nov. 17th, gave a review, with some extracts, of the late book of Dr. Gordon, pastor of Old South Church, entitled "The Christ of To-day." It seems that the Rev. Dr. Gordon has floated far away from the ancient theological landmarks. In some things he is more radical than Theodore Parker himself; and yet his book is received with encomiums by the orthodox press. It shows the immense advance of the times, how far we all are from the horrible theology of the Puritans. Not one of the old famous points of Calvinism does Dr. Gordon retain. They are frankly abandoned or quietly ignored. The five points of Calvinism are as follows: Particular election, particular redemption, total depravity, irresistible grace, final perseverance. Dr. Gordon repudiates the doctrine of election and reprobation; of total depravity, of eternal hell. He believes in the final salvation of all men. The only orthodox doctrine that he retains is that of the deity of Jesus. He refuses the old doctrine of the trinity, and affirms only the threefold nature of God, whatever that may be. If Dr. Gordon had written this book twenty-five years ago he would have been driven from the pulpits of Boston; now he is the most popular of its orthodox representatives. He is in the swim.

He overthrows the doctrine of the infallibility of the Bible. He admits that it is not scientifically or historically correct; that the apostles themselves were limited, even in their inspiration, and did not have an adequate idea of Jesus, and did not therefore give a perfect delineation of either his character or purposes. He even seems to hint that Jesus himself was not perfect in wisdom, and was to a certain extent the child of his times. He affirms that the substance of the Bible is true which unfolds the divinity of Christ. What that substance of truth is will not be found in the verbal utterances of the apostles, but in the advanced criticism of to-day, illuminated by the science of the nineteenth century. The Bible, according to Dr. Gordon, is not to be the master of human reason, but is to be interpreted and accepted by that reason itself, which must judge the scriptures as to whether they are true or false. According to Dr. Gordon, we are not to believe a thing because it is in the Bible, but because it is reasonable and is supported by evidence. He utters this radical idea, that we are not to judge Jesus Christ by the character of God, but that we are to judge the character of God by that of Jesus Christ. This means, if it means anything, that the humanity of Jesus is the measure or standard of the divinity of God. This makes humanity the supreme thing; and is equivalent to saying that God as an object of faith is the creation of human reason.

Dr. Gordon has overthrown orthodoxy and all the historic creeds of the church. He puts St. Augustine and Calvin into limbo. He discards with frank disgust the horrors of their theology. He declares the great value of the Unitarian movement and that it has saved to the Christian religion the real worth of Jesus. However, he avoids becoming a Unitarian by still adhering to the special divinity of Jesus.

This book shows how utterly the old orthodox religion, the religion of our fathers, has been repudiated by the cultured minds of the church itself. If one should read the sermons of Jonathan Edwards, and then this book, they would be amazed at the chasm presented. They would wonder how it is that the theological successors of Edwards have evolved to such a tremendous distance. Yet the Old South church reverberates with the new theology, and the congregations receive it with delighted applause. Heresy is triumphant and dwells in the habitations of orthodoxy. Only one string is left that binds to the old—the deity of Jesus. When that is snapped asunder, what will become of the churches? It looks as if there would be a landslide of enormous proportions.

We now come to some radical English books that do not sail under false colors; books that mean what they say and say what they mean. These books are of great value to the student of modern philosophy. "Flowers of Freethought" are two volumes of editorials on living topics written by Geo. W. Foote, editor of the London Freethinker. I do not know of anyone in England who has gathered together a larger store of information than Mr. Foote, or who uses it with more happy effect. Taking all these editorials together, they exhibit an abundant knowledge of history, of literature, and of philosophy. Mr. Foote is a dweller in libraries, as well as a man of the world. He browses among books; he gets the best they contain, and he gives it to his readers in a most available and interesting manner. These editorials are short, always to the point, fresh with illustrations, clear cut from beginning to end. Mr. Foote's language is like an arrow; it moves straight to the mark. There is no flourish, no involution of sentences, no fireworks. When you read Mr. Foote you know exactly what he is driving at; there is no obscurity.

"Flowers of Freethought" are good books to take along on a journey. They are like a friend with whom you can talk for awhile, and then keep a golden silence. You can pluck a "Flower of Freethought" here and there, and read according to your own sweet will. You are not obliged to read continuously. You do not have to tackle a whole volume. You have a hundred articles to pick from, on a wide variety of subjects, and in every article you will find the philosophy of Freethought keenly and lucidly expressed. In America these books ought to have a large sale, for they are admirably adapted to our hurrying life. It is very seldom that an American will undertake to read a whole volume. He hasn't the time. He's on the rush; has but a few minutes to spare. The "Flowers of Freethought" are just the thing. He cannot put in his few minutes to better advantage than by a perusal of one of these terse and freighted editorials. In a small compass he will find a great many stimulating ideas. These are just the books to put into one's traveling bag. They are better than a summer novel, for, while equally entertaining, they are also profoundly and variously instructive.

A different kind of book is "Birds of Pray." Saladin is a free lance in shining armor. He dashes along in the paraphernalia of glittering war. He is in for a fight; and he likes to hit hard. This is one of his best books. His wit, his knowledge, his sarcasm, his poetry, his picturesque descriptions, his pathos, his invective, his splendid rhetoric, constitute an extraordinary volume. Saladin has much of the "Old Scotch" in him, the "usquebaugh" of Burns's genius; and we are sometimes dazzled by his brilliancy, and don't know exactly whither we are tending, the lights flash so furiously. But Saladin is sure to bring us to some elevated spot, where wide landscapes open on the vision. Saladin is not merely a rhetorician or word painter. He has wonderful information; has all sorts of odd bits of knowledge which illuminate his pages; and in the midst of his apparent wildness he is driving on with a determined purpose. He has an end in view and he reaches it. Saladin takes his own way; and though it may appear circumlocutional, he gets there. The lightning strikes, although the path is zig-zag. Saladin is popular in America. These electric batteries of thought are suited to our style.

—The Swedish Freethinkers held a congress in September.

Freethought Abroad

—During October there were founded two new Freethought societies in France, three in Belgium, four in Spain, and one each in Sweden and Italy.

—Dr. August Specht, editor of Menschenhum, and Freien Glocken, who some months ago celebrated his twenty-fifth jubilee as a Freethought lecturer, passed his fiftieth birthday July 2d. Dr. Specht is, next to Professor Büchner, the best-known German Freethinker.

—The Dutch Freethought work, "Dominee, Pastor of Rabbi," by J. G. ten Bokkel, has been translated into German and French, and is not alone distributed in all Dutch colonies, but copies have reached Grand Rapids, Mich., to the number of two hundred. The book ought to be translated into English.

—The Danish House of Representatives has, with one dissenting vote, passed a bill providing that anyone, whether preacher or not, shall be allowed to give religious lectures in the state churches. The result of this measure, if it becomes a law, will be of greater importance to the intellectual development of the Danish people than even the Reformation.

—Mogelhaes Lima, the prominent Portuguese republican, Freethinker, journalist, and author, has published a work of 300 pages entitled "O Livro da Paz" (O Liberty of Peace). It is a very interesting book for Freethinkers and all lovers of peace to read, and its free circulation would do considerable to hasten the approach of that time when "swords shall be beaten into plowshares." It is published by Casa Bertrand, Lisbon, Portugal. Price 55 cents.

—At the funeral of the French Freethinker, Victor Poulain, who recently died at Roubaix, the funeral cortege numbered over 5,000 persons, while the secular services at the grave were attended by about 15,000. . . . Genuin Catholicism is getting scarce in France. The village of Bourront (Department Seine-et-Marne) which, in 1789, had 600 inhabitants, with 300 Easter communicants, has now 1,200 inhabitants, with but 94 communicants. Paris, with its 2,000,000 inhabitants, has scarcely 100,000 communicants, and of these four fifths are women; while in the country, where orthodoxy is the strongest, 25 per cent are female and 8 per cent male devotees. But on a pinch no doubt the church could rally many more.

—A new Freethought paper of Socialistic tendencies, La Revolution, has appeared at Barcelona, Spain. . . . The Freethinkers of the Spanish province Cataluna, Spain, have organized for defensive as well as offensive purposes. Prof. Odon de Buen is the leading spirit. . . . The great Spanish Freethinker, Ramón Chies, died a year ago and on the anniversary of his death memorial services were held in all Spanish Freethought societies and Masonic lodges. The money collected for a monument in his honor has reached the sum of about 8,000 pesetas ($1,600). . . . The Spanish government stirred up a wasp's nest when it discharged Prof. Odon de Buen from the University of Barcelona. Telegrams, editorials, and public meetings denouncing the church-inspired action are pouring in from all over Spain and its colonies, and even from foreign countries.

—The Flemish Freethinkers held a very successful congress at Gent on September 15, 1895. Societies from five cities were represented. The courage of our Belgian brethren is severely tried by the recently enacted school-law. Yet what would have discouraged other nationalities seems to have the opposite result in Belgium. Five new societies have organized during the last two months, several local Freethought congresses have been held, besides numerous socials, excursions, etc. It has been decided to protest against the enactment of the law, the protests to consist of: One petition from each Freethought society, signed by its president and secretary; one monster petition signed by as many grown persons as possible; public demonstrations. Of the latter several have been held, notably at Gaud, Charleroi, and Ixelles, besides the national one at Brussels. The first, held July 13th, had over 12,000 participants; the latter, July 28th, 100,000.

A Covenant Paradise.

Section 176 of the Russian criminal code rewards with twelve to fifteen years' hard labor in Siberian mines and lifelong exile everyone who speaks against the Trinity, the holy mother Mary, the cross of Jesus Christ, the spiritual inhabitants of heaven, or the saints and their pictures. Section 177 banishes for life to the uttermost corner of Siberia those who have been found guilty of the above mentioned crimes in the privacy of home. Section 178 gives six to eight years' hard labor and lifelong exile to all critics of the Christian religion.

Observations.

The publisher of a popular American magazine has offered the Hon. W. E. Gladstone some tempting inducements to contribute to his periodical a series of articles on sacred subjects, but although theology is the field wherein the aged warhorse is most often pleased to cavort, he declines to be led into it again on this side of the Atlantic. There is nothing in this, however, to occasion surprise. When Mr. Gladstone was there last the publishers sprung a surprise on him by inviting Colonel Ingersoll into the same inclosure, and he is no doubt apprehensive that they may do it again. He has made no protest that the course was crowded, that there were too many spectators, or that his opponent carried too much ballast, but I suspect that his sympathy with Lord Dunraven is deep and sincere.

A St. Louis girl, Miss Louise Marie Ivory, became engaged to marry Dr. Melvin Reeve Moore of that city. So says the Chronicle of the 19th inst.; and as the wedding was to occur on the Monday following that date, I suppose that they are husband and wife now and that ere this the worst has happened. The remarkable thing about the marriage, and what leads me to mention it, is the language of the bride's mother. Louise is a Catholic, while Melvin is a Freethinker, and Mrs. Ivory says: "I would rather take my daughter to her grave this afternoon than have her marry Dr. Moore." Nothing else is alleged against Dr. Moore except his unbelief; and a St. Louis correspondent thinks that the case is worthy of being recorded by my pen, with comment. I think so too, hence the above; and my comment would be that it is lucky for us all that our religious friends cannot always choose our destination for us. Mrs. Moore is especially to be congratulated that her mother, though godly, was not privileged to escort her to the cemetery in preference to the hymeneal altar.

The sneaking assassin Hannigan has been acquitted by a jury of his peers. The story of his crime I have related before. He had a sister who associated with a man named Mann, and offered her unborn child as a sacrifice to the moral Jehovah. Before she could recover her health, Hannigan attempted to shoot Mann at her bedside, frightening her so that she died. A few weeks later he assassinated Mann in the street. Throughout his trial for murder he conducted himself as a craven. He allowed the plea of insanity to be entered in his behalf, and the jury acquitted him on that ground, the verdict at once restoring him to "reason." While he was on trial his old father died—the murderer's third victim. At the funeral, which Hannigan was permitted to attend, he was greeted with cheers, which shows either that the persons cheering did not believe him to be insane, or that they had no more sense than to applaud the bloody acts of a lunatic. Whichever is the case, no comment is necessary on that point.

In Oneida county, this state, four young men are in jail for wrecking a passenger train and causing the loss of two human lives. Their act is said to have been inspired by the career of Jesse James, the train robber. Hannigan's acts were inspired by Christian morality. The difference between the two inspirations, so far as results are concerned, is not in any degree prejudicial to the ethical system of Mr. James.

The New York Morning Journal prints a symposium on the "Woman's Bible," which except for the appreciative contribution of Mrs. Anna H. Shaw would be a total condemnation of that work. Mrs. Shaw is the clergywoman who at the late celebration of Mrs. Stanton's birthday said that the worst chain that had ever bound womankind was the chain of religious superstition. The other symposiasts are T. De Witt Talmage, Dr. Joseph H. Rylance, and Mrs. Elizabeth Grannis, editor of a religious paper. Talmage says you might as well publish a shoemaker's Bible as a woman's Bible, and offers other remarks derogatory to the enterprise; Dr. Rylance characterizes the work as ridiculous, while Mrs. Grannis declares that it is "utterly preposterous that a committee of women should presume to give us a Woman's Bible." Mrs. Grannis also says that "the best women everywhere are evangelical Christians, and these will be led to believe that the leaders of woman suffrage are what is termed Freethinkers." The calm insolence of the lady in claiming that evangelical Christian women are better than other women is equal to her humility in deprecating female commentary on the scriptures. In what way she herself is better than Mrs. Stanton, Mrs. Gage, Mrs. Gardener, or any other Freethinking woman, or even those Christian women not evangelical, she does not take the space to explain. The mother of Jesus Christ was not an evangelic Christian, and yet the existence and destiny of all evangelical Christians rest upon the question of her anatomical chastity.

Anybody who is led to believe, either from the "Woman's Bible," or from other evidence, "that the leaders of woman's suffrage," so many of them as are women, "are what is called Freethinkers" will not be far out of the way. There are two divisions of the movement. One demands the suffrage in the name of right and justice, regardless of consequences. This division is led by Freethinking women like Mrs. Stanton. The other division demands the suffrage in the name of Christ in order that God may be voted into the Constitution, the Bible into the schools, and Christian doctrine generally into civil law. This division is led by the churches, Anthony Comstock, and Dr. Funk, and the women like Mrs. Grannis, Mrs. Livermore, and Miss Willard, who imagine themselves leaders, are only followers. Their voice is heard from the pillion, but a minister occupies the saddle and pushes on the reins.

The author of "The Woman Who Did," Mr. Grant Allen, the English novelist, has made another assault on sanctity in his new story, "British Barbarians." Mr. Allen calls Britishers barbarians because they have so many customs like those of barbarous tribes, and under the word "taboo" he comprehends the numerous religious, social, and political fads upheld by the English public. There are taboos of time, such as Sunday, with its special sanctimonious deportment; morning and evening, demanding certain changes of apparel, and so forth. There are taboos of place, such as private grounds and preserves, and the interior of churches. Then there are social taboos, as, for example, the accident of birth or of wealth; and under this head comes also the marriage taboo, so that a wife is taboo to all men except her husband, and unaccompanied young girls are taboo to young men. I am not very clear on the real meaning of taboo, since the word belongs to a language I do not understand, but it is taken to mean something not to be fooled with. This explains the title of the book. The story is about a young man of engaging exterior and of superior mental parts who wins the love of a young woman equally gifted. The fact that she is a wife and mother gives her pause for a time, but her scruples are finally overcome by his arguments and her own inclinations, and she goes to live with him. The husband follows and shoots the man; the woman shoots herself. It is a very good story. If I were to criticize it, I should say that the lady would have done the graceful thing if before leaving her husband she had notified him of the proposed change in her arrangements. Not that in this instance she left him without putting the house in order and setting the victuals where he could get hold of them without too much trouble, for the family was forehanded and kept a maid, but in many cases it is different, and a man would be somewhat put out if he came home and found his wife gone for good. In a work heralding a new era, such details should be provided for. At least a fortnight's notice ought to be given by the wife, and I would not compromise with Mr. Grant Allen on less than ten days. Of course, I concede the right of the woman to take the step here discussed, or at least I admit that I have no business to mix up in the affair, which is a better way to state the matter of rights, I think: if you are going to interfere in any case, first prove your right and then go ahead; the rights of the other parties will then take care of themselves.

Mr. Allen calls "British Barbarians" a "Hill-top Novel," and further explains: "I propose in future to add the words, 'A Hill-top Novel,' to each one of my stories which I write on my own account, simply and solely for the sake of embodying the force of my own opinion. Whenever, therefore, the words, 'A Hill-top Novel,' appear on the title-page of a book by me, the reader who cares for truth and righteousness may take it for granted that the book represents my own original thinking, good or bad." Herein, I am afraid, Mr. Allen takes himself too seriously. In the first place, his "own opinion," however honest, will carry no weight except with those who have learned to lean upon him, and these may not be many. What the rational person relies upon is the strength of argument and the reasonableness of precept, which are independent of their author. In the second place, there is no "original thinking" in "The Woman Who Did" or in "British Barbarians." Only the form is original with Mr. Allen; the thoughts have been familiar to reformers for twenty years, to my own knowledge, and the testimony of others leads me to say double that length of time. There is a man in the United States penitentiary at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., for printing these thoughts. A few years ago a young man and woman went to jail in the same state for embodying them in conduct. Mr. Allen, therefore, claims too much when he takes as his own anything more than the stories he writes. As for his object in putting his ideas in novel form, namely, to bring them before the novel-reading youth and girl, I hope he will accomplish it, though I have doubts. The novel-reading youth and girl will skip the edifying parts of his story and will not distinguish between the exalted morality of his characters and the turpitude of those made familiar to them in the ordinary sensational novel. Few except such as have anticipated Mr. Allen in thought will see what he is driving at, and they will read him for recreation as other novel-reading persons read other novels.

Our Missionary Work.

Several of our good friends have written us that in their opinion the work, "Self-Contradictions of the Bible," should go along with Paine's "Age of Reason" as a missionary pamphlet. Mr. J. R. Perry puts it thus: "As a missionary document the 144 Self-Contradictions will go hand in hand with the 'Age of Reason.' I think any person getting the one will get the other. It is the grubbing process, clearing out the roots and stones, necessary to preparing the soil for good seeds of common sense." And as it is our delight to furnish the implements for this sort of agricultural operations, we are willing to do our part and will send the "Self-Contradictions of the Bible" to those who will distribute it among their Christian friends, FOR A DOLLAR A DOZEN. Or we will send twelve copies to as many different addresses for one dollar.

Now let the friends of Freethought turn to and circulate "Self-Contradictions" as well as the "Age of Reason." Send both books out by the thousand and watch the result. Flood the country with them, and let the Christians know what their holy paper fetish, the Bible, is like and why it is worthless as a guide to any good.

THE TRUTH SEEKER's offer to send eight copies of Paine's "Age of Reason" to eight different addresses for $1, to be used for missionary purposes, is still open. The best results are reported from this method of reaching intelligent believers and giving a new direction to their thoughts.

Letters of Friends.

A Change of Address.

SALISBURY POINT, MASS., Nov. 16, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I send you to-day $2, which you will please place to my credit.

I would regard it as a favor if you would say in THE TRUTH SEEKER that I shall probably remain at Salisbury Point during the winter, and that if there are any Liberals here or about I would like to have them call on me or communicate with me that we may join hands and praise God in spirit and in truth. JOHN PECK.

Why Still Further Reduce Receipts?

OXFORD, N. S., Nov. 9, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed herewith please find $3.35 to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER and for pamphlets. I notice that attempts are being made by Postmaster-General Caron to exclude the paper from the Dominion, but trust that such rulings will be overridden. I see by your quotations from Christian papers that some of them say that the postal business of this country does not pay. I would like to know the reason why, if such is the case, the mails should be allowed to carry only such matter as the Christian majority of the country shall say is good, in defiance of the minority, whose judgment is probably as good, or better than theirs. Furthermore, I do not think that the character of the postmaster-general of Canada will stand strict investigation in recent government scandals. Wishing you success,

I am, yours truly, E. H. SCHURMAN.

Wants His Favorit Pabulum.

DALLARDVILLE, TEX., Nov. 4, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I am a little late in sending in my subscription, but I hope you will pardon me when you hear that I have held back a few days with the hope and expectation of sending you $4 for books with which to do missionary work in my vicinity among my honest but ignorant and superstitious neighbors. But having failed up to this date, and fearing you might cut off my supply of pabulum, which is so congenial to my taste, I decided I had better send on what I had and trust to luck and hard work for the remainder. So inclosed you will find $3 for subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and $1 for books—"Age of Reason," "Bible Contradictions," "Crimes of Preachers," "Church Property," and "All About the Holy Bible." I will send you the address of a few of my neighbors who are Liberally inclined.

Your friend and well-wisher,
L. H. LOPPE.

They Would if They Could.

PORTLAND, ME., Nov. 17, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I must have your book on "Design Fallacies," "Was Jesus Insane?" "Was Christ Crucified?" "Personal Existence After Death Improbable," and "The Father, Son, and Holy Ghost."

I am sorry that they stopped THE TRUTH SEEKER from going through the mails in Canada. I lived two years in Montreal and know that the Catholics and Protestants are right at the point of war on religion. That is where I first read "Maria Monk," and I found out that the nunnery where that happened was torn down and a new one built up near Mount Royal. Montreal is called one of the cities of churches, Notre Dame Catholic church being the largest in America. In Montreal, while I was studying the Bible, I became an Infidel or Freethinker. I hope the Christians here have not the power to stop THE TRUTH SEEKER from going through the mails. I think it is the best paper I have ever read in regard to freedom of thought. The Constitution seems to intend that everybody shall have equal rights. HARRY SHAW.

The Pastor Did Not Answer.

NEW YORK, Nov. 11, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: In Colonel Ingersoll's lecture on "The Foundations of Faith" at the Star Theater last evening, he refers chemically to the theory of bodily resurrection, and says, in substance: A person dies and is buried. The material of his body serves to fertilize the soil and makes the grass grow. An ox eats the grass and takes the human atoms into his body, which are converted into beef. Some man eats the beef and the other man's chemical atoms are worked over into the second man's body, who dies and is buried. Now, Ingersoll asks the pointed question, At the time of the resurrection which of the two will be entitled to the atoms that belong equally to both? It will be noticed this question ignores any possible claim of the ox to the atoms.

This reminds me of when I was a Sunday-school learner in Oswego, N. Y., where I was attending a state normal school, and at that time believed it was my duty to go to Sunday-school. The various churches of the city sought to maintain Sunday-school classes composed of the normal students. Being trained to the Methodist persuasion in my youth—though never baptized nor united with the church, which was due to my heretical instinct and because there were certain theological conundrums which the clergymen, Sunday-school teachers, nor my personal friends were able to elucidate to my youthful satisfaction—I naturally inclined my steps to a Methodist Sunday-school, although among the normal students in Oswego it was generally understood to be in accordance with the best policy, bearing in mind the advantages of graduating, to attend one Presbyterian church, its Sunday-school and prayer meetings, because the principal of the school, Dr. E. A. Sheldon, and other members of the faculty, attended that Presbyterian church.

The pastor of the Methodist church where I attended Sunday-school—though I must now admit it was a sort of bore to attend—was the Rev. Mr. Darling, D.D. One Sunday in class he was expounding and elucidating the lesson and diagnosing the fine points of spiritual ills and difficulties, with the skill, knowledge, and inspiration which only doctors of divinity can command. In some connection the doctor touched upon the subject of the resurrection. Of course, in Sunday-schools, the young chicks, being learners, are granted the privilege of asking questions, trusting to the sound discretion of the chick to ask only such questions as conform to theological propriety. However, I had studied chemistry a little and knew something about atoms, compounds, and chemical disintegration. Consciously becoming a trifle bold for a heavenward-bound pilgrim, and in the spirit of experimenting analytically with the mental proportions of a doctor of divinity, I asked so all the class heard if he really thought that at the resurrection the exact chemical atoms would assemble again and reunite into the same body in the same manner and form, long after the body had been decomposed and the chemical elements had been disseminated through and upon the earth by the action of water trickling through the soil. The doctor struck a posture and looked stunned at my youthful impudence. It was clear he thought I was in a bad way to become a good Methodist. I actually pitied him, as, not wishing to put him into a corner, I saw that I had ruthlessly propounded a question about a dogma upon which, together with others of like import, the doctor depended for his livelihood. The members of the class gasped speechlessly to think I would dare chill the atmosphere of that house of God by intimating a well-founded doubt regarding a fundamental Christian tenet.

My analytical experiment with the learned doctor's mental equilibrium demonstrated to me in the twinkling of an eye that if I wished to be regarded as a desirable Sunday-school pupil, I must not make another such break and even this break alone might prove fatal to my cordial retention in the class. However, being possessed of a stronger instinct for truth, free speech, and investigation, than for dogma and guesses, I was conscious that if popular Sunday-school sentiment in this generation would not uphold me in such a bold advance, the instinctive honesty in man, a few hundred generations from then, or sooner, would sustain the propriety of the question raised.

The reverend doctor did not answer the pilgrim learner. He merely grunted, and had the class remained continuously in session to this day, I do believe he would have ventured an intelligible reply.

Thoughts on Thanksgiving—Dedicated to President Cleveland.

MR. EDITOR: Is it to be expected that the poor—those who have had to struggle with misfortune, want, and disease; who know and have known nothing but toil and poverty all their lives—can such as these feel like joining in Thanksgiving, in view of the ills that have afflicted them all through life, and of the adverse circumstances over which they have no control, and have struggled in vain to overcome, that have beset them? And those of the middle class and walks in life, who have by hard labor accumulated just a little to make them comfortable—to whom are they indebted? Was it not their own exertions that have produced and given them that which they possess?

Now, the third class of human beings, the rich and very rich, who invent schemes to plunder their fellow-man; who have laws enacted to favor their purposes of fraud and speculation, getting acts of incorporation under which they shield their actions; your corn and flour exchanges that put down the price of grain at harvest time and put up the price of bread to the poor; the acts of incorporation granted to railroads, trusts, insurance companies, banks, savings institutions, bogus mining companies, and the rest—this class of people have a complete monopoly over their fellows, through legalized swindles and permitted robberies; and whom will they thank but themselves?

They contribute to the churches and to the Young Men's Christian Associations a few thousand dollars, while at the same time defrauding their fellow human beings of millions. These people who get their money by defrauding under the cover of law go to the Christian churches on Thanksgiving days to give thanks. Is it not all a sham, when their founder's and pattern's instructions to such as these—the rich—were to sell all they had and distribute it to the poor? But the query arises, Does the human race owe any service or thanks to gods, devils, or any other powers, seeing that we are brought forth naked in the world, with air only to breathe (and that frequently very malarious), without any will of our own, subject to all the adverse climatic changes, which we have to overcome the best we can? In fact, the reasoning mind sees clearly and distinctly that all we have, and all we enjoy, is the result and product of our own exertions—whether for good or evil. Yet we are always in conflict with the laws of universal nature, and we must be on the alert to avoid storms and tempests, cyclones and other terrible forces in nature; we are subject to drought and excessive rains, and to disease and death in every form, all of which can be obviated only in a degree by constant care and watchfulness. In view of all this, does the human race owe any particular thanks or oblations to any being or to any power that has placed them here in this world under all the adverse conditions and circumstances under which they exist? Rather is it not the duty, and should not the obligation rest on that being or power, that placed them here, to take charge of them?

Seeing, therefore, that our entire dependence must be upon ourselves, let us be wise and institute only such government as will conduce to our own happiness and comfort and that of the race. The offerings of Thanksgiving are vain oblations only equalled in the dark and superstitious ages by the offering of "she-goats and the fat of rams." Besides, our government is a secular government (not a theocracy), a government "by the people, for the people."

When will the human race cast off this superstition of rendering thanks that are disregarded alike by high heaven and human reason, and become wise and learn and teach how best to promote its own happiness in this world? And is it possible for the hundreds of thousands in any condition of life, who have had their property destroyed by floods, cyclones, tidal waves, earthquakes, fire, or any other of the destructive forces in nature, and the lives of fathers, mothers, husbands, brothers, wives, and children taken by these fearful calamities, to join in rendering thanks to any power? It is unnatural to thank the hand or the power that smites us, and no good being would require it.

And those who have been fortunate, and profess to be Christians, let them comply with the conditions that the Christians' law imposes, as given by its founder and pattern, "Give to them that ask, and lend, hoping for nothing in return." "Let them sell all they have and give to the poor;" in other words, give to their less fortunate neighbors and follow him in poverty. "The foxes have holes, the birds of the air have nests, but the son of man hath not where to lay his head." We ask, then, who are Christians? We have none, only in name, and thanksgivings avail nothing. Giving thanks changes no law of nature. It offers no consolation or help to the afflicted. The innumerable ills that afflict the race remain, and will remain until man gives more attention to the wants of his fellowmen and less to the gods—and on this the hopes of the race must rest.

E. LIVEZEY.

About "Life-Entity" and the Rest.

AKRON, OHIO, Nov. 10, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Severance so misquotes what I write on the subject of Spiritualism that it is hardly worth my time to answer him, for it is the best ascertained fact that the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER want, and a quibble of words to keep up an argument is unnecessary.

I well know that immortality at this time cannot be proven by science, for Mr. Severance says science does not deal with "metaphysical" things, and as an immortal spirit cannot be handled with pincers made of iron, of course science is but a "dead-head" in such investigation. However, there are those who have more than the usual five senses, so that man, in a spiritual form, is visible to them, even though Mr. Severance and myself are blind in that direction. A microscopic lens often discovers things that the human optic, unaided, could not see. It is plainly visible, without a glass, that what Mr. Severance knows he learns from books edited by others, and seeks not the new fields of discovery for himself. If this was not the case he would not so misstate, to mislead others, the language I use.

A simple belief or an opinion proves nothing. And while both Mr. Severance and myself may accept the theories of evolution, it does not prove evolution to be a fact, or that it has been accepted by science, for science teaches no such thing; neither does it teach that our universe was created six thousand years ago by Jehovah, the Jewish God, for Babylonia was a populous country anterior to that time. Evolution has nothing whatever to do with the proof or evidence of immortality. Yet if man has evolved, by progression, from some lower order of life, it certainly goes to show a progressive nature, and it would be nothing strange that progression should continue throughout all eternity. If man was first created as Genesis teaches, we must believe, as the story continues to teach, that he is immortal, even though all other life may end at the death of the physical body. Spiritualism teaches nothing of man's pre-natal life, but only of a life beyond the grave, and that from demonstrated facts as gleaned from nature, through her occult forces and laws that we now so little understand. Science fails to teach us of many things we wish to know; and should I read all the works on physiology, psychology, anatomy, etc., and study well my encyclopedia from beginning to end, I should not learn that the brain, any more than the heart or great toe, could create itself or man; neither can it create or originate one single thought, unaided by entity-life, electrical energy, mind, soul, or eternal, vital, or what you please to call it, that makes organic life superior to inorganic or dead matter which produces nothing. The brain is no more the seat of life than the heart; each has its functions to perform, and a less injury to the heart will produce death than to the brain. The brain, while being the sensitive organ of animal life, in which is centered the nerves of the whole system, the home of the mind or soul, is no more a vital organ than the heart, and has less functions to perform. While we sleep, the heart and lungs are at work, automatically, and do their part as much as the brain.

We know nothing more of the origin of man than we do of his destiny; we first locate him in, possibly, a cell or in a protoplasmic state; and, in a way, we trace him to birth; to old age and death; thence he fades from the view of mortal senses into ethereal or sublimated matter, that our five senses cannot recognize. I ask in the name of reason, is it any more mysterious to think that life has a continuity after the death of the physical body than a pre-natal life in the meshes of natural forces before conceived in the womb of her who bore him? Our ignorance alone makes it a mystery, like nearly all that nature does.

Science is but the storehouse wherein we deposit our rich and well-earned investments after long years of toiling in the broad fields of discovery, which at first looks dark and dismal to our view, but often prove but the opening of some new field to bring to us joy and glad tidings.

Science has shown Jehovah to be a myth, and, like the legends of William Tell and Santa Claus, his fable has had its day and rule, and must give way to truth as gleaned from the pages of nature's great book. I will repeat what I have heretofore written, for the benefit of those whom Mr. Severance would mislead.

In my letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER of Oct. 12th I said that "we have 'proof positive' of the continuity of man in an immortal state after passing from earth, unless it can be shown that the many phases of phenomena attributed to spirit power really come by the agency of some other occult power."

In answer to this Mr. Severance undertakes to tell what science has already learned about spirit phenomena, telling us that "all philosophy and science end when they get to disembodied spirits." In the name of good sense, what other occult agency does he refer to that gives us the phenomena of Spiritualism? He carries the idea that hypnotism, thought transference (neither of which was recognized by science a few years ago), illusion of the senses, etc., causes the phenomena, but none of these is an occult (unknown) force. The first two are now partially known and understood and no longer classed as occult.

Science is continually adding to her knowledge the discovery of new forces, new properties in the elements, new phenomena of observation, and new channels of communication with the great chemical laws of nature's resources; her laboratory of mystery is being opened up to the understanding of man; and, with all this, we have the best of reasons for believing, if not for positively knowing that man lives beyond the grave.

I have expended both time and money to disprove spirit-return, and from a confirmed Materialist I am now a believer in the immortality of all life entity as much as in the immortality of matter, both of which change forms and features by natural law.

I believe (which proves nothing) that man is being created, or produced, from the vital elements of life, like all other animate creatures, by the unity of sex functions that produces an individual life, built up from the warp and woof of physical elements or matter creating organic life from inorganic matter by the aid of life-energy that we cannot understand.

Physical man, after death, has identically the same organs as before death, yet has, perhaps, instantaneously been converted from an animate being to an inanimate. Why the change? Simply because the man of individuality, he who represented the physical form, by which the physical optics of vision could see him, has vacated the house or shell that could no longer answer his purpose and must, by necessity, evolve, progress, or pass on to another stage of existence. I could not accept of such belief were it not for the many demonstrations of proof that have fully convinced me that the real man does not die.

A. D. SWAN.

The Political Polyptone.

Dubuque, Kan., Oct. 29, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I would like to call the attention of the public, through the medium of THE TRUTH SEEKER, to the need of a political barometer with which to measure the sentiment of the people on any given issue, at any election in any state or locality. I have reasons to believe that comparatively very few reading, intelligent vot-ters are in favor of every plank in any one party platform and object to all the planks in all the other party platforms.

To compel a man, if he votes, to subscribe to a lot of out-and-dried planks of one platform in a job-lot without the privilege of choosing what he wants from all the platforms is ridiculous, to say the least. In order to vindicate a principle, or to make his wishes known on a few issues, he must indorse many that he does not want, that are directly against his best interest and judgment, and he is counted against other platforms that contain planks which he likes.

In order to illustrate the injustice done the voter, the party, and the officer, and the misunderstanding liable to arise between them by the present method of representation, I will offer my own experience as an example.

Being raised in a Republican section by a Republican father were as good reasons, you will admit, for me being a Republican as a majority of the "vulgar masses" have for belonging to either of the parties.

As a matter of course I imbibed Republican principles, chief among which was the high tariff policy.

When I became of age I took Mr. Greeley's advice and came West to grow up with the country and located on a claim in central Kansas.

Being as poor as the renowned church mouse, I was obliged to live in a sod house or dugout for years, part of the time without a board in the roof or floor.

With lumber held at an exorbitant price, and not a tree in sight, or ever likely to be, from which could be manufactured a foot of lumber, the high tariff on that item began to lose its charm for me.

When the Kansas blizzards began to make me shiver so my teeth rattled, protected as I was only by cotton clothing, and not a sheep or a pound of wool for sale in the county, a high tariff on wool or its manufactured products did not seem to be consistent with my best interest or comfort.

In the course of time I married and began raising a family, as most all do who believe in "home production." When my children cried for sugar, cake, or candy, I explained to them that the price of sugar was so high I could not afford to buy it for them, and then went to the polls and voted for the party that believed in protecting my children from the pleasure of sweets so dear to every child. So it gradually dawned upon me that it was not to my financial interest that everything I bought or wanted should be high priced, while that which I had to sell should be cheap. The price on my principal product—wheat—was, and for generations to come will be, regulated by a free trade market in fair competition with the rest of the world. The tariff on it is a dead letter and only intended to placate the guileless farmer, and I recommend that it be placed on the wind, if it can be done successfully, to keep the Mexican and Canadian products out. I became a thorough free trader.

I could not even see clearly how high tariff could have benefited my father, living where he was, in northern Missouri. How was I to make known my "change of heart" to the party? For each voter to write to his state and national representatives explaining how he stands, and how he wishes them to vote on each question, is impractical. I did not wish to leave the party I was raised in. I liked most of its platform, but could not be reconciled to the high tariff plank.

My representatives continued voting and working for higher tariff, honestly believing they were representing me and carrying out my wishes as expressed by voting for a party whose chief battlecry was high tariff.

What was I to do? I could not be a Democrat, for my interest in their national policy of lower tariff was more than balanced by my objection to their state and local policy. I could not indorse one without indorsing the other. My interest in national affairs had to be sacrificed for my local interest.

Was I to forego my right of franchise by being unable to express my wish intelligently to either party in the field? I tried it once more. I cast my vote that counted one in the phenomenal majority of 82,000 Kansas rolled up for the G. O. P.

I believed it to be the duty of the party to take up new issues, inaugurate reforms, or modify their old policies to suit changed conditions, or the changed sentiment of the majority, if such was the case.

I believed my representatives, at least, could see clearly what was best for me and work for my interest no matter what planks were in the party platform.

It seemed clear to me that what was best for me was also best for a large majority of the citizens of this congressional district, and of the state for that matter, as they consume the same class of commodities that I do, and, being engaged in the same industry, have the same class of products to sell. What was the result? Why, the party, and even my representative, misinterpreted my vote. But how were they to know what planks I liked from those I disliked? They supposed I was "stuck" on all of them, and the high tariff in particular. The party organs roared themselves hoarse in eulogizing the intelligence of the farmer who could see so clearly that high tariff was to his best interest. Then I gave up in despair and decided to not go to the polls any more, as I could not vote either for or against anything.

To cap the climax, and add insult to injury, a stumper came around telling a campaign lie—no story—to the effect that he had had a vision in which he was transported to the lower regions, commonly called hell. A guide showed him around through the different apartments. Coming to one, over the entrance to which were the words "drying room," upon entering he saw a great number of men hanging on hooks. In answer to his inquiry what it all meant, the guide informed him that they were Kansas farmers who voted for high tariff, and that they were too green to burn and had to be dried out first.

A few enterprising politicians caught on to the racket and organized another party in which to corral the "soreheads" from the other parties. I fell in line. There were planks enough in their platform to enable almost anybody to be pleased with some one of them. I liked some of them, while others were directly contrary to my ideas of good policy, justice, and practicability. I was obliged to swallow the whole mess—no way of separating them—whole hog or none. I believed and hoped that the objectionable planks would not, or could not, be enacted into law.

I had the pleasure, then, of reading a different set of eulogies. It was "Anarchism!" "Communism!" "Paternalism!" And the devil only knows what issues were not charged to the poor innocent "hay-seeds" of Kansas. It was declared that we were incapable of self-government; that we did not know what we wanted; that we voted for high tariff one election, low tariff the next election, and for both, and most everything else, the next election.

Our creditors in the East wanted us placed in the hands of a receiver, but nobody would assume the responsibility of taking charge of us.

Now, the fact is, it is not so much the lack of intelligence on the part of the voter as it is the fault of the present method of expressing it at the polls. I do not enjoy having uncomplimentary epithets hurled at me by people who misconstrue my vote, whether done through ignorance or otherwise. I have about concluded to renounce my right of franchise, and boycott all the parties, and just let them go to the dogs if I am not to be provided with some method of expressing my desires at the polls in a manner more consistent with the intelligence of an American citizen. So there now.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Turkey's Soliloquy.

When dreary day was nearly spent,
And careless winds the saplings bent,
A gobbler, sitting on a fence,
Mused o'er his sad experience.
While tears rolled down his narrow cheek,
And lost themselves in tiny creek,
He dreamed awhile, then muttering low,
Compared the Now and Long Ago?

In ages gone it was unknown
To prophet-priest in Eastern home,
That westward far a continent,
To balance that of Orient,
Lay quite beyond the setting sun.
Where it is day when theirs is done:
A hemisphere of marvels rare,
By nature formed with equal care;
Its life and love as superfine
As any known in Palestine;
Its prairies broad and silvery glens
Gave food and nests for turkey-hens,
And right we had to rest or roam,
To go abroad or stay at home.

We mourn the past when we were free,
Fowls domestic we grieve to be;
My hens confined in narrow coop,
Ofttimes so low they have to stoop.
For hither came the strangest race
Of man with long and pallid face;
Immortal he, and mortal we,
He argues, but we disagree.
He knew us not when first he came,
Had ne'er before seen bird the same.
To taste our flesh he shot us down,
And roasted us till we were brown!
We oft could dodge the Indian arrow,
But Christian shot miss not the marrow,
He captures all our little ones,
And fattens them till autumn comes,
That they may die to fatten him
Who prates so much of Sunday sin.
Thanksgiving-time is worst of all;
Oh, how we dread his stealthy call!
He'll thank the sky for daily bread,
Then with an ax chop off our head.
O grief to see amid the stores,
Such woful sight—my loved one's bones!
And plumage which they proudly bore,
Used now to wipe his dirty floor!

I too shall bleed next Christmas eve,
And have short time to mourn and grieve.
Immortal prove the man to be!
Then hope I for mortality.
It may be that, in some age hence,
The man shall sit upon a fence,
And mourn his loss of liberty—
Lost through pious stupidity.

L. G. REED.

A Woman Speaks.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Apropos of the discussion in the Children's Corner of THE TRUTH SEEKER about snakes, prairie dogs, and owls, all living in the same holes, my husband, who has lived in this country since the close of the war, and who has crossed the plains several times, says they do live in the same holes, but not as a happy family by any means.

The dogs make the holes for their homes, as it is their nature to do. Then the snakes, being larger and stronger animals, enter the holes and make their homes with the prairie dogs on which they prey, as do the owls. The owls have to watch out for the snakes, and the dogs for both. The dogs would not stand much show but for the fact that snakes have no means of tearing their food and must swallow it whole, and a snake cannot swallow a full-grown prairie dog, but they get the little ones. Again, a snake cannot strike unless it can coil, which it cannot very well do in the limits of a dog burrow. In the dog towns the ground, underneath the surface, is honey-combed with miles of passages, and every hole has many outlets so the grown dogs can escape. Think what would happen if animals, which breed as fast as they do, had not many natural enemies to keep them down. They begin to breed at a year old, and have from four to six at a litter. I do not know whether they breed more than once a year or not. Here, in the mountains, their natural enemies are hawks, owls, eagles, coyotes, badgers, and ferrets, though the last are not common. Down on the plains the prairie dogs are much larger than here, and, in addition to the natural enemies here that I have enumerated, there is a species of small fox, called a "swift," which is very destructive. You might think, with all those enemies, they would soon become extinct, but not so. They breed so fast that unless the farmer takes active measures also, his chances of a crop are very small. Our method here is to soak wheat in water in which strychnine has been dissolved, and put a spoonful of the poisoned wheat at the mouth of the hole, or take bisulphide of carbonate, put a spoonful on some cotton, or something else, and put it down the hole and cover it up, when it suffocates all that may be in the hole.

A few years ago a law was passed in Wyoming giving a bounty of five cents on each prairie dog scalp delivered to the county clerks. The law ran two years and in that time the state paid out more than one hundred thousand dollars. The next legislature made haste to repeal the law, but the man who introduced the bill will go to his grave as "Gopher Johnnie."

I hope I have not been too prolix, and that it may be interesting to the readers of the Corner, and, in conclusion, will say to our friends, don't be acrimonious over such little things, and remember that animals have different habits in different localities.

FLORENCE B. JONES.

Thanksgiving in Revolutionary Days.

Many funny stories are told of the early Thanksgiving days. The town of Colchester, for instance, calmly ignored the day appointed by the governor and held its own Thanksgiving a week later, when the sloop from New York, bringing a hog-head of molasses for pies, had arrived. In Revolutionary times Thanksgiving was not forgotten. The Council of Massachusetts recommended that November 16, 1776, be set aside for "acknowledgments for mercies enjoyed." In the next year Samuel Adams recommended a form of Thanksgiving proclamation to the Continental Congress. During the War of Independence Congress appointed eight days of Thanksgiving. They fell in April, May, July, and December. The appointments were made in the form of recommendations to the heads of the various state governments. With one exception Congress suspended business on the days appointed.

He Has a Big Heart.

Isn't this a pretty story about a dear little fellow, whose name is Herbert, who lives down south in Dixie, and who is only four years old? His baby brother's death had made his mother very sad and very lonely. One day Herbert came upon her suddenly, seated in the window, where she was striving to hide. But Herbert's big black eyes saw. He ran to her and threw one plump arm about her, calling to his elder brother: "Arthur, you'd better come and put your arm around mamma on the other side. She's crying."—New York Times.

Correspondence.

ARMSTRONG CREEK, WIS., Oct. 14, 1895.
MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Dear Friend: Some say everything that is, is right, though I never could see it in that way. Now, Miss Wixon, I have another hobby, or idea. Though it may seem foolish to you, I can't help it until some one can show me where it is wrong. My idea is simply this, to amend the Constitution so as to abolish Congress and establish a home government, so that the toiling millions of men and women can vote in their own town directly for all laws that directly concern them. Elections twice a year, or as often as needed. Now, the fact is that the interests of the working class are not fairly represented under the present system, and that reforms in all governments are largely experimental, and more a question of honesty than of great statesmanship, and such a system would undoubtedly create among laborers an inducement to co-operate and try to study their conditions and wants. At the present time only one-half of the working people are allowed to vote, and I believe one-half that do vote have a very vague idea of what they are doing, whether it is for their interest, for the millionaire's, or for naught. Of course, if we could all live up to the rules in your book on "Right Living," we would hardly need a government, and, right here, I want to thank you from the bottom of my heart for having written that book. It is the grandest book I ever read, and I feel that I am paid a great many times over for reading it, and I want to say, I think you are doing the noblest work that woman ever did by being honest with children, and teaching them how to live without being cowards or hypocrites. For the past few years I have been trying to study human nature, and I have come to the conclusion that when we get a person's honest ideas of a God, we have a pretty good index to his general character. There are not many free people in this locality; they declare that God rules the world and all there is in it, and when I lend them THE TRUTH SEEKER, or "Right Living," "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," or any good book on Freethought, they will, perhaps, read a page or chapter and lay it aside for a novel, or any light literature, which they seem to enjoy with greater satisfaction. I have a book on natural history called the "Living World," by J. W. Buel, in which the author holds that the Genesis account of creation and approved science harmonize exactly; that evolution is true, also the special creation theory.* Now, to tell the truth, I have not much confidence in such people. Will you kindly recommend some other work on the same subject. I have taken up more of your time than was intended. Please excuse one seeking the truth. When I get in the Western country I will surely remember your request.

Respectfully and sincerely yours,
ED. HUDSON.

[We thank our brother for his very flattering commendation of "Right Living." It is true that if all could carry out its teachings and principles we might come very near to heaven upon earth. And that is certainly what we should aim for. We are trying to teach the children how to live, and we believe we are making some progress, with the aid of such friends as have found the best of life in the philosophy of Freethought. Send for Truth Seeker Catalog for books such as you desire.—Ed. C. C.]

*The "Order of Creation," a discussion between the late Professor Huxley, W. E. Gladstone, and others on the biblical and the natural order in which different forms of life appeared upon the surface of the earth, throws a good deal of light upon this question. It may be had of the Truth Seeker Company for 50 cents.

Health and Happiness.

Healthy Sleep.—During the first month a child in perfect health and abundantly supplied by a healthy nurse sleeps usually twenty out of the twenty-four hours; awaking to nurse every two or three hours during the day and twice or three times during the night. As the child grows older (the second or third month or so) it becomes more wakeful, though it will usually take a nap of several hours in the morning and a shorter one in the afternoon, while it sleeps from early evening until the following morning—probably waking once or twice to nurse.

The sleep of a healthy child is tranquil. The features are in repose, the expression of the countenance, its breathing, etc., indicate the most perfect ease. Nothing is more suggestive of comfort, composure, and well being, or more typical of perfect grace, than the posture of a naturally healthy child during its sleep.

It requires but a slight disturbance of the health of the child to break the ordinary calm and make it restless, fretful, peevish—its sleep interrupted by startings, cries, and dreams. Very little irritation in the digestive canal, imperfectly digested food, irritation of the gums at the time of teething, worms, or slight fever, is sufficient to disturb the slumbers of the infant and to show that something is wrong. In proportion to the seriousness of the disturbance the indications will vary—there will be uneasy sleep, the disturbed countenance (contraction of the brow, workings of the features), tossing, frequent changing of position, the difficulty in lulling the child to sleep, painful dreams or nightmares causing the little one to scream and struggle in its sleep, or to wake in a most terrible fright, occasionally refusing to sleep in the bed or crib, when the nurse or mother is obliged to walk with it or soothe it by movements of a rocking-chair or cradle. Whenever any of these disturbances occur it behooves the mother or nurse to become watchful and vigilant and to exercise that patience, care, and sweetness of temper which have won for good mothers the name of ministering angels. Seek to relieve the infant by removing the cause of disturbance.

Both the nursing and the sleep ought to be subject to certain rules. It is better to habituate the infant to nursing at regular hours, and for the same reason accustom the child to sleep in its cradle, which is by far the best. When the child sleeps do not take it up in your arms or place it on your lap, as is frequently done. Place it in its cradle and let it go to sleep. Once used to do this, it will sleep despite any noise or movements in the room. It is better for the babe not to sleep in the same bed with its parents. Accidents have occurred and infants have been suffocated from one cause or another. Besides, a sleep of this nature is not recuperative for either nurse or child. Do not load the child immoderately, while it sleeps, with heavy covering, nor surround it with curtains with the intention of keeping the air off, for the child gets overheated and breaks into perspiration, which only weakens it and makes it susceptible to cold. It is an excellent practice to accustom the child to retire at an early hour in the evening. When the little one is asleep do not wake it under any pretext; and whenever an opportunity is presented for the babe to sleep in the open air let it do so; it is strengthening.

The Cry.—The so-called cry proper of the newly born always takes place during expiration (out-breathing); sometimes a second cry is noticed, a repetition, but it is neither so strong nor so prolonged as the first. The first cry of the newly born, which is probably due to the disagreeable impression the air makes upon the exterior surface of the body, is always sustained and easy with infants born alive. (The lungs perform the respiratory function for the first time, producing the "cry" by inspiring oxygen and expiring carbonic acid.) During the first few months of its life the infant cries under the influence of divers causes; it is therefore important to be able to distinguish and recognize them. The cry of the infant may be due to too tight bandaging or its bed may not be well arranged; then all that is necessary is to relax the clothing or rearrange the bed. The cry of hunger is emitted but once in two hours when the time of feeding is regulated and the child has become habituated to sleep in its bed without having recourse to that evil habit of cradling, rocking, or carrying in the arms, but children who, notwithstanding they are in perfect health, cry on all occasions are almost always children badly raised.

The cry of pain is distinguished from the ordinary cry, as it does not cease when you try to amuse or pacify the child by changing its position or by nursing it. An excellent means has been suggested by which to distinguish between the two cries—that is, expose the infant to the light, and if the cry is only caprice, you will see the child open its eyes wide, become instantly calm, and allow itself to be fondled without manifesting either impatience or anger; but if the cry is provoked by colic, which is often the case, the light will no longer appease it, and the cry becomes sharper every time you press upon the abdomen. Another proceeding to which the nursing will frequently yield, if its cry is from anger, consists in gently stroking the top of the head from the back forward. Under this gentle and uniform friction, the face of the child assumes its ordinary repose.

Infants do not begin to secrete tears until the third or fourth month, and consequently these can furnish no sign of pain before that time. The cry must be distinguished by its peculiarity. It may be incomplete, painful, or suffocating. The incomplete cry is characterized by the feebleness of the first effort, or by the resumption, which may be due to congenital weakness of the infant; to imperfect expansion of the lungs at birth, or to engorgement of the lungs. The suffocating cry, in which the resumption can be heard, is almost a certain indication of inflammation of the lungs. The painful cry, which always terminates by a little sustained final, or is transformed into a simple plaintive groan, appears in almost all acute sicknesses of the first childhood, such as pneumonia, enteritis, or peritonitis. In the acute cry, it is important to know, the resumption becomes dominant and takes on a piercing sound; it can be heard when the tonsils or larynx are the seat of irritation. In spasms of the glottis, a small ory, resembling hicough, announces the end of the spasm.

ROB'T G. INGERSOLL

The Field-Ingersoll Discussion. Price, paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

In 1888 the Rev. Dr. Henry M. Field wrote an open letter to Colonel Ingersoll, with the intent to convert him. The letter was published in the North American Review, and was replied to by the person addressed. All our older readers know the value of this discussion. To those who do not remember it we can only say that they should lose no time in procuring a copy if they want a controversial treat.

The Ingersoll-Gladstone Controversy about Christianity. Price, paper, 25 cts; cloth, 50 cts.

When the Field-Ingersoll Controversy closed in the North American Review the Christians felt that their champion had been very badly worsted in argument, and the publishers of the Review engaged the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone to attempt to rehabilitate the Presbyterian creed. He wrote a long letter to Colonel Ingersoll, to which the latter replied at length and, it is generally agreed, completely demolished the greatest controversialist Christianity can produce. These letters are now for the first time available in pamphlet form.

Myth and Miracle. Price, 25c.

This is one of Colonel Ingersoll's best lectures, but never before put into print. Everyone who has heard it will most certainly want it, and those who have not heard it will have a rare treat in its perusal, as something new from the Colonel, which also is something that everybody is looking for.

Which Way? Price, 25 cents.

This lecture is a consideration of the difference between the natural and the supernatural, and some reasons why the former is the best way to go. Perhaps no one of Colonel Ingersoll's orations has won more general applause from enlightened audiences than this. It contains that most magnificent of perorations, his visions — "This was. This is. This shall be." The lecture was never before printed in pamphlet form. It is splendid. Send for it.

Gems of Thought.

FORGETTING one's self, or knowing one's self—around these everything turns.—Berthold Auerbach.

THE essence of knowledge is, having it, to apply it; not having it, to confess your ignorance.—Confucius.

THERE are people who claim the right to look after somebody else's business in their own way.—Galveston News.

THE mystery of the beginning of all things is insoluble by us, and I, for one, must be content to remain an Agnostic.—Darwin.

SOMETIMES when you think your neighbor is enjoying himself because he annoys you, he really annoys you because he is enjoying himself.—Puck.

It is little to know that honesty is right. It is everything to know what is honest, and to have that knowledge is to suppose application.—Horace L. Traubel.

To him the impulse of a kindly deed Was more than any article of creed; And whosoever chanced his face to scan, Forgot the preacher, but revered the man.—Clinton Scollard.

In centuries before ours the public nailed the ears of journalists to the pump. That was quite hideous. In this century journalists have nailed their own ears to the keyhole. That is much worse.—Anon.

EACH man in whom dissatisfaction is aroused by institutions which have survived from a less civilized past, or whose sympathies make certain evils repugnant to him, must regard his feelings thus excited as units in the aggregate of forces by which progress is to be brought about; and is called on to expend his feelings in appropriate deeds.—Herbert Spencer.

Few great men have existed of whose history we have so unsatisfactory a knowledge as we have of that of Jesus. How much more clear and distinct, beyond all comparison, is the figure of Socrates, which is 400 years older. It is true, indeed, that of the history of his [Socrates'] youth and education we likewise know but little, but we know accurately what he was in his mature years, what he attempted and what he effected. The figures of his disciples and friends stand out before us with historic clearness; with regard to the causes and course of his condemnation and the facts of his death we are perfectly informed.—Strauss.

VOLTAIRE was, for a long time, a believer in the optimism of Pope—"All partial evil universal good." This is a very fine philosophy for the fortunate. It suits the rich. It is flattering to kings and priests. It sounds well. It is a fine stone to throw at a beggar. It enables you to bear with great fortitude the misfortunes of others. It is not the philosophy for those who suffer—for industry clothed in rags, for patriotism in prison, for honesty in want, or for virtuous outcasts. It is a philosophy of a class, of a few, and of the few who are fortunate; and, when misfortune overtakes them, this philosophy fades and withers.—Ingersoll.

To get you well indoctrinated with a horror of brimstone it was necessary for the bird of pray to get hold of you while you were, as yet, very young. Had he allowed you to reach twenty before he commenced this training, ten to one if brimstone would have frightened you. Consequently, when you were only a few days old, and practically little more than a piece of dough, upon which he could leave the horrible impression of his craft, even as the cross is stamped upon an unbaked bun, he received you into the church through that archaic incantation known as baptism. He terrified your parents into having you baptized in the name of a three-pronged God—not a three-legged stool; for, according to him, if you died before you were damped, you would certainly be damned.—Saladin, in "Birds of Prey."

THE free and philosophic spirit of our nation has been the theme of admiration to the world. This was the proud distinction of Englishmen, and the luminous source of all their glory. Shall we then forget the manly and dignified sentiments of our ancestors to prate in the language of the mother or the nurse about our good old prejudices? This is not the way to defend the cause of truth. It was not thus that our fathers maintained it in the brilliant periods of our history. Prejudice may be trusted to guard the outworks for a short space of time, while reason slumbers in the citadel, but if the latter sink into a lethargy, the former will quickly erect a standard for herself. Philosophy, wisdom, and liberty support each other; he who will not reason is a bigot; he who cannot is a fool; and he who dares not is a slave.—Academical Questions.

Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child

"Reading this lecture," remarked a friend the other day, "will make men better; for if a man reads it one night on his way home, the next night he will take along some oranges or something to his family." This lecture is gotten up in the handsome style of "Voltaire" and "Lincoln," and has as a frontispiece a fine photo-engraving of the Colonel and both his grandchildren, Eva and Robert, the little fellow upon his knee, and Eva in her high chair. It is a pretty picture, and the Colonel's millions of friends will take pleasure in it. In this pamphlet is also the Colonel's Tribute to His Brother, which so many have desired to have in convenient form. Price, 25 cents.

VOLTAIRE

"Voltaire was the greatest man of his century, and did more to free the human race than any other of the sons of men." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with portrait of Voltaire. A handsome pamphlet. Every Freethinker will surely want it. Price, 25 cents.

LINCOLN

This is Colonel INGERSOLL's great lecture, printed in a handsome pamphlet, and containing the Century's famous portrait of Lincoln—said to be the best extant. Price, 25 cents.

SHAKSPERE

"An intellectual ocean, whose waves touched all the shores of thought." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with likeness of Shakspeare from the Kesselstadt death mask. Price, 25 cents.

LIGHT travels 200,000 miles in one second, and Lord Ross claimed he gazed so far into space with his telescope that it would require 500,000 years for light to travel that distance. Where, oh, where is the throne of God with Jesus on the right hand side?

OLD MERCATOR (to little Billy Ducks, just left school, who applies for situation as office boy, and produces testimonial from clergyman): "We don't want you on Sundays, my good little boy. Have you a reference from any one who knows you on week days?"—Sydney Bulletin.

Mrs. Proux: "Why Mary, you are a perfect heathen. I told you to tidy up things before the minister called, and you never even dusted the Bible. Whatever did he think?" Mary: "I'm sure, ma'am, he never noticed that, for I saw him put his hat on it, and he was looking at the purse in your hand."

JUDGE STRINGER: "I understand that, during his recent illness, Tarantula Jack experienced a change of heart?" Alkali Ike: "You bet he did. When he found himself at death's door, with Dr. Slade doing his level best to pull him through, he sent for Preacher Harps, confessed his sins, made his peace with heaven, and resolved to lead a better life if he was spared. And when I dropped in to see him this afternoon, I found him propped up in bed before the open window with his revolver in his wasted hand, peacefully shootin' the glass out of the back windows of the Salvation Army hall, across the alley."—Puck.

It is because we desire to see in this place the largest available collection of entertaining "characters" of all kinds that we bewail the removal of Brother Talmage to Washington. He has been one of the features of life in New York, and one of its attractive sights, if not a genuine American lion, warranted. We have reasons for desiring to see here Schlatter, the miracle worker of Colorado, and also Claretta Avery, the wonderful little ten-year-old Negro girl preacher of South Carolina. If this city is ever to deserve its name of "the Paris of America," it must rake in all the living curiosities that are wandering around anywhere at large.—New York Sun.

A HOLINESS camp-meeting has been in progress some time at Haines's Grove, a few miles from Lamar, and shortly after it had begun, a gaudily-painted poster that astonished the natives in that vicinity was put up by the roadside, painted thus: "Eureka! Here we are! Great Gospel Show and Holy Hippodrome at Haines's Grove! Greatest display of legendary traditions ever placed on exhibition. Two performances daily, under the management of Happy Charlie, the world-renowned pulpit-pounder and sky-pilot, assisted by Hallelujah Jones, the efficient masticator of yellow-legged chicken. In our gallery of Gospel myths and holy relics may be seen the following: Core of the apple that Eve ate; Jacob's ladder; gold bricks from the streets of the New Jerusalem, and cinders from the other place; blubber from Johah's whale; broomstick ridden by the witch of Endor; gangplank over which the animals walked into the ark; Noah's log book; club with which Cain slew Abel; Satan's poker and shovel; etc., etc. New attractions added daily. You keep the grub wagon rolling; we'll do the rest."—Kansas City Journal.

"WHAT's that copper can for? Colorin' pickles?" inquired Mrs. Jones of Widow Brown. "No; them is all that's mortal of poor William," explained the widow, as she wiped away a tear. "Goodness, me; you don't mean to say you've had him canned like corn beef," exclaimed Mrs. Jones. "My, no; I sent his body to the creamery and had him insinuated and them is his mortal remains—just a handful of dust, Mrs. Jones," and the poor widow sighed and wiped away two tears. "I don't believe in that; I think it's downright wicked," declared Mrs. Jones, with a show of asperity calculated to induce an explanation. "It does kind o' seem so, don't it, Mrs. Jones?" moaned Widow Brown tearfully, "but it was mortifyin' the flesh to purify the speret. William wasn't a downright wicked man, though his sinfulness would crop out once in a while, more especially when I tried to convert him. He'd allus laugh right to my face an' say: 'Mary Jane, you can't make me believe that fire an' brimstone business hereafter. I been a gettin' my share of it right along.'" Mrs. Jones rolled her eyes toward the ceiling in horror, and the widow moaned. "Then when I got roused up an' more eloquent, he'd say: 'Mary Jane, you can't never convince me that there's a hotter place than right here.'" Mrs. Jones groaned. "But I allus declared I'd convince him, if it was my last act, an' if his speret is in them ashes I'd just like to ask him if it was hot enough for him."—San Francisco Post.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, ; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

SPECIMEN PRESS NOTICES.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

PIANOS, PIANOS!

$225; - $250; - $275.

After years of earnest study and experiments, Mr. Adam Schaaf, of Chicago, one of the oldest and most experienced piano manufacturers of this country, has produced what is believed to be the most perfect Upright Piano ever constructed. The instrument is thus described:

"The volume of tone is fully equal to any of the best Square Grand Pianos, while the quality is of the most exquisite musical character—pure, sympathetic, and in the highest degree pliable. Its durability and its capacity for standing in tune, is unparalleled in the history of piano-making. In a word, this piano is made to stand, not merely as an ornamental piece of furniture (it is finished in the most artistic and handsome style), but as a musical instrument—not for a day, but for a lifetime."

These pianos received the highest honors at the World's Fair; Mr. GEORGE STECK, Judge of Awards, the best living authority on pianos, reporting as follows:

"This exhibit deserves an award for excellent tone quality, sustaining power, well planned scale, and excellent action, with easy, prompt touch. Material and workmanship are superior."

The distinguished Pianist and Composer, SIGNOR FABIANI, of the Paris Conservatory, says:

"I have used the Adam Schaaf Pianos, and have critically studied their merits, compared them with those of the best American and European makers, and I find them unsurpassed for quality and variety of tone, responsiveness of touch, elegance of appearance, and reliability in every way."

Having made special arrangements with the manufacturer, who is our personal friend, to introduce these superb pianos, we are prepared to offer them to TRUTH SEEKER readers at the above marvelously low prices—from $50 to $150 less than dealers ask for inferior instruments. Every piano is warranted for five years, and the purchaser is not required to pay for it until delivered. We will pay the freight to any station within 1,000 miles of Chicago. Full description of instruments sent on application.

If you or any of your friends contemplate buying a piano it will be to your interest to correspond with us.

Harvard Theology.

The American Citizen, of Boston, Protestantly pious and "patriotic," is greatly worried over the influence of the teachings and spirit of Harvard College. It says:

"No one will deny that the influence of Harvard College has to a vast degree shaped and educated the thought of New England; and, as all know, the policy of Harvard and the culture of Harvard have been in the direction of ultra Liberalism, its creed being 'No matter what you believe if you are only sincere.' So the drift has been away from the old Puritan ideals of right and wrong, to a slipshod, mock theology, which believes in anything or nothing as may be convenient, provided there is 'peace.'"

To intolerant believers in dogma it must indeed seem terrible to place character above profession. That men should prefer to mingle with people who are sincerely in error rather than with those who are hypocrites must be very trying to the nerves of those whose great anxiety is to have everybody believe as they do. Of course we recognize the fact that it is very bad when people sincerely believe that they have a right to persecute others for differences of opinion, but persecution by sycophants is not one whit less odious and disastrous than persecution by sincere fanatics. And in this instance we are not aware that the "slipshod, mock theology" of the graduates of Harvard and of those others who have felt the influence of the spirit of that school has led or will lead to the countenancing of persecution of anybody for heresy. In fact, indifference about dogma naturally tends to make one tolerant of diversity of view, and it is only when an indifferentist becomes a politician that he may also become a persecutor, and then only to advance his own interests by pleasing his bigoted constituents who still cling to "the old Puritan ideals of right and wrong." Not of "right and wrong" in conduct, but of right and wrong in belief, for the old Puritan, and the new Puritan as well, had, and has, a greater horror of intellectual error than of moral delinquency. This may seem to be a harsh thing to say, but all history proves that the most atrocious butcheries of human kind have been perpetrated in attempts to prevent or extirpate heresy. Therefore, we can stand a great deal of the "slipshod" theology of Harvard, but pray to be delivered from the Puritanism represented by such journals as the American Citizen.

"Voltaire Came to Save Christianity."

On November 31 Rev. J. E. Roberts delivered in All Souls' Unitarian church, Kansas City, a sermon in which he compared Jesus and Voltaire. In this discourse the clergyman paid a fine tribute to the genius, the humanity, and the services of the great French Infidel. It was held that he made possible the modern life of comparative liberty and peace. "The plain is habitable because the mountain is beyond. Ceaselessly it passes the electricity from the surcharged earth and receives the hurtling bolt flung from the palpitating cloud. Such times has history, times of convulsion, times when the old order reels and quakes, times when the earth trembles and the mountain is brought forth, the mountain that is to receive the lightning and the dawn and smile at both.

"Voltaire was the mountain. Rugged, defiant, implacable, lightning-scarred, storm-enveloped, immovable, august, sublime, he towered above Europe and the eighteenth century with unspeakable scorn for superstition, secular or sacred, and with unquenchable devotion to reason and light. Kings exiled him. Police officers arrested him. Bastiles and prisons confined him. Ignorance hated him. Superstition execrated him. The priesthood denounced him. The saints slandered him. They moved him not. Scarred and scathed, but unchangeable, the mountain received the lightning and in its ample strength took the storms and hushed their fury into impotent and harmless calm."

"If Jesus came to save the world, Voltaire came to save Christianity," says Mr. Roberts. But there was little in the recorded teachings of Jesus that could help save the world, while Voltaire did much to shatter the ecclesiastical prison which was built on the foundations laid by the Nazarene or those who formulated the doctrines attributed to him. Rev. Mr. Roberts has been able to recognize the worth of Voltaire, but he is yet too much enveloped in the glamour of hereditary conceptions of Jesus to analyze his utterances and their effect upon mankind. "Voltaire was the people. He was that people in rebellion against the tyrannies and superstitions of the past, and in their instinctive and passionate hope of the future. In him died a hideous past and in him a benign future was born." "The continents and the islands of Europe were cursed and corrupted by superstition, ignorance, bigotry, intolerance, and immorality, and all under the authority and sanction of religion and the church. The bloodiest annals ever inscribed on the page of history were written by the age of faith in Europe." All this is true, and it is equally true that this wrong and misery were due to the attempt to fix men's attention on a life beyond this. Did Jesus discourage this other-worldliness? He did not; on the contrary, he encouraged it. He declared that his kingdom was not of this world; he asserted that the more one suffered here the more blissful would be his state of existence in "heaven;" he "awakened in man a new spiritual longing," to use Mr. Roberts' own phrase, and that "new spiritual longing" intensified the sectarian's hatred of new thoughts and lit the flames of millions of martyr fires. We are not dealing with what some unknown Jesus may have said, with the teachings that may have been uttered by one who is not correctly reported in the Bible, nor yet with the influence of this hypothetical reformer upon the ages that will follow ours. But we are dealing with the Jesus of the New Testament as he is there represented and with his influence upon the ages that have passed. We are judging the tree by its fruits, not by what might have been its fruits, and what those fruits were every reader of history knows, not excepting Mr. Roberts, who has to confess that "whatever men may think about ideal Christianity, Christianity as it existed in Europe up to the seventeenth century was, from any standpoint—moral, intellectual, or economic—the most pronounced failure ever recorded since the pathetic story of man began."

It is only the lingering influence of that baleful superstition that leads Mr. Roberts to declare that "God" sent both Jesus and Voltaire into the world to "sweeten life." There is just as much evidence that he sent Torquemada and John Calvin to embitter it, to make it a foretaste of the eternal hell to which the religion of exclusive salvation foredoomed all but the smallest fraction of the human race.

The Theocrats Are Obtuse Pupils.

The Christian Reformer of November 16th returns to the charge upon THE TRUTH SEEKER. All the points it attempts to make are based upon misapprehensions and misinterpretations. When the Reformer comes to reasoning on the principles involved in the contest between Secularism and Theocracy and the facts cited by us, it is hopelessly at sea. As our theocratic friends are the Bourbons of religion, it is perhaps not remarkable that they are such unresponsive pupils; the Bourbon has never been noted for his readiness to learn. As an instance of the unresponsiveness of the editors of the Reformer, take this: We had quoted the opening sentences of E. C. Walker's address on the National Reform Association at the recent Congress of Freethinkers; here is what he said:

"We read in an old legend that 'in those days came John the Baptist preaching in the wilderness, . . . and saying, Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.' Therefore John has been called the Forerunner of Christ. He announced his coming, it is said, and prepared the way for him. We read in the records of our time that in these days comes the National Reform Association preaching in the wilderness, and saying, Repent ye, for the kingdom of Rome is at hand. The leaders of the God-in-the-Constitution party are the John the Baptists of the church of Rome. They are its forerunners. They are announcing its coming and preparing the way for it."

The Christian Reformer disposes of the parallel in this summary fashion:

"Both the editor and the speaker have certainly got things a little mixed. They have the relation of John to Christ all right. John was the forerunner of Christ because he went before him, announcing his coming and preparing the way for him. But how any such relation, either as to time or mission, can be found to exist between the National Reform Association and the Roman Catholic church, it is difficult to see. The Roman Catholic church has been here for some centuries. It has had its reign over the nations. The National Reform Association came forward long ages after Roman Catholicism to pronounce the doom and wind up the career of Roman Catholic tyranny on the one hand, and of secularism in government on the other. It is somewhat amusing to be told in THE TRUTH SEEKER's columns of a 'forerunner' who, instead of preparing the way, comes after and pronounces the overthrow."

You are mistaken; the Editor and the speaker have not "got things a little mixed"; on the contrary, there is not the slightest excuse for the theocratic editors' apparent misunderstanding of the parallel shown. They certainly know the position occupied by the Freethinkers, and the Adventists as well, concerning the effect that the success of the Covenanters would have upon religious liberty in the United States; they know that we have consistently maintained, from the beginning of the theocratic movement for the subversion of the secular Constitution, that it could not succeed without the aid of the Catholic church, and that if with her aid it should succeed, the Catholic church would be the chief beneficiary of the triumphant plot. We are not quite so simple as to try to make that which comes after the forerunner of that which has gone before. It is needless to protest that no Free-thinker has thought of saying that the National Reform Association is preparing the way for the Greek church or the Roman power of the Middle Ages or the Scotch Kirk or the English Establishment. There can be no doubt that the Reformer very distinctly understands that present conditions were in mind when the National Reform Association was affirmed to be the forerunner of the Roman Catholic church. "We read in the records of our time that in these days comes the National Reform Association preaching in the wilderness, and saying, Repent ye, for the kingdom of Rome is at hand," declared the lecturer. The "kingdom of Rome" in what sense? Not spiritual, surely. What then? Political, of course. The National Reform Association is working for the political recognition of Christianity. Our Constitution as it was and is forbids the union of church and state; hence the Roman Catholic church has never been the state church in the United States, no more than has the Protestant division. All the special privileges enjoyed by the churches, Catholic, Jew, and Protestant, have been illegally granted to them by legislators, judges, or executive officers; all these fruits were stolen. But now appears on the scene the National Reform Association with a scheme for the legalizing of all the usurpations by which the churches have heretofore profited; it purposes to so amend the Constitution and change the laws as to make permanent all these usurpations and other and worse ones that it assures us are on its program. This means, necessarily, that the church is to be the supreme political power in the United States. The National Reform Association is thus the forerunner of the politico-ecclesiastical hierarchy of the future. It is preparing the way for the state church, or church-state, rather. The fundamental principles it advocates are the principles of Rome, and Rome will be the most important partner in that church-state—if she is not the whole firm, which is more probable—if the Presbyterians succeed in their attempted debauching of the intellects of the Protestants of the country.

This is a secular republic, in theory, and so far as the Constitution has availed to make it such, in fact. The National Reform Association says that the principle is wholly bad and it has set itself the task of transforming the secular republic into a Christian republic. Rome likewise says that the secular principle is wholly bad, and her astute leaders are closely watching the work of the Protestant theocrats. They are more than willing that the Reformed Presbyterians and Baptists and United Brethren and Universalists shall pull the chestnuts out of the fire for them; they know that Protestantism is hopelessly divided on doctrine and will unite only to pass tyrannous laws in the interest of Christianity; they know that it is losing both to Rationalism and to Rome; they know that if the Christian amendment should be adopted the Protestants would fight so among themselves as to whose special interpretations of the Bible should be favored that they would be an undisciplined and quarreling mob as contrasted with the drilled and united legions of Rome—in short, they know that the National Reform Association is the John the Baptist of the political kingdom of Rome in the United States. And if the Covenanters cannot see that this is so they ought to have guardians, and they will have them when their bigotry and folly have delivered them bound hand and foot into the clutch of the "Scarlet Woman."

It is more than "somewhat amusing" to read the Reformer's comical boasts about pronouncing the doom and winding up the career of Roman Catholic tyranny, especially when we take into consideration the fact that its methods are those that Rome herself introduced to public favor in other lands centuries ago. It is fatuous for the pupil to suppose that he can excel his teacher in molding men's beliefs by legislation. Drs. McAllister and George evidently want to go "dead broke," or they would never sit down to such a game with Satolli and Gibbons for antagonists. It is a very risky proceeding for ordinary mortals to try to beat the devil with fire. They are not in it.

The Reformer is still worried about that cartoon in which itself and the Christian Statesman are depicted as chained to the skull of Calvin. Its reasoning is so deliciously naive that we must quote it here:

"He [the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER] declares that it means that these papers are self-chained to a dead past, and attempts to show that our interpretation is an impossible one. Of course we knew that the interpretation now given by THE TRUTH SEEKER was a possible one [Ah, you did?], but we knew that it could not be the true one because it ignores entirely some of the most prominent and emphatic points in the cartoon. The cartoonist, perhaps unwittingly, put into it some of the venom and bitter hate that are in his mind, and now denies that they are there. [Why this confusing of the cartoonist and the Editor?] But we insist that they are there and no interpretation that omits them satisfies all the points of the cartoon. Mr. Heston, the cartoonist, represents these papers not only as dogs, but as mad dogs. He represents them as chained, of course, because they are mad. In looking around for something to chain them to he lit upon the skull of John Calvin. Dogs do not voluntarily become afflicted with hydrophobia, neither are they born with it. After they become afflicted with it they do not chain themselves and put up public notices to guard the people from danger. But men do suppress mad dogs for the sake of safety to themselves and others. We insist that the most natural interpretation of the cartoon is that it reveals the intolerant, persecuting spirit of THE TRUTH SEEKER. It may be that the Editor did not intend to reveal his real spirit so plainly, but we hold that he has done it. [Another confusing of the Editor with the cartoonist]. If he persists in declaring that we have misread the cartoon, we insist that he shall retract every word that he has spoken or written charging the National Reform movement with the spirit of persecution. If the cartoon is so plain that any one can understand it, as THE TRUTH SEEKER maintains, much more are our written and spoken words easily understood. Crime should be punished because it is an injury to the public and a violation of law human and divine. Our position as to THE TRUTH SEEKER is that it should be suppressed, not because it advocates Secularism, not because it is Infidel and Atheistic, but because it is full of blasphemy. Let it eliminate this feature from its pages and we would treat it with the same tolerance that we give to other respectable unbelievers."

The Christian editor is determined to be persecuted; he will be a martyr, God helping him, whether or not anyone wants to offer him as a sacrifice. His literalism, as before remarked, is very pronounced, and hence will not admit the possibility that the artist may not have wished to chain him to a stake or a cellar floor. But he ignores the suggestion that if the artist had intended to indicate the fate that he, the artist, wished to inflict upon him, he would not have shown him chained to the skull of Calvin, and this repudiation of literalism in a particular where to cling to it would tell against his theory, makes us suspicious of the sincerity of his contention. Of course it would be preposterous to say that Mr. Heston would for a moment suppose that two dogs could be chained to a skull, even if that particular skull could be produced, so as to hold them prisoners, and still less reasonable would it be to maintain that he meant that the entire editorial staffs of the two theocratic papers could be chained to and held captive by the skull. Were not the theocratic editor so possessed by the desire to forcibly suppress those who do not agree with him, he would never have imagined that that cartoon meant aught else than it shows upon its face, the self-binding of the National Reformers to the dead past, represented by the skull of their theological father, John Calvin.

We are told that "dogs do not voluntarily become afflicted with hydrophobia, neither are they born with it." But hydrophobia is a disease to which dogs are subject, some developing it under certain conditions of their systems, and others being inoculated with it through the bites of their afflicted fellow canines. Dogs being born with dog natures are necessarily in danger of developing the disease and of receiving it from their mates. Not all Christians develop the theocratic hydrophobia, but they are all subject to it, and it is absurd beyond the power of words to express to insinuate that Freethinkers have forced the poison into their veins.

The Reformer insists that the cartoon, as it interprets it, "reveals the intolerant, persecuting spirit of THE TRUTH SEEKER." But if men may rightfully suppress mad dogs—which is admitted—and if we hold that the same treatment should be accorded to the theocrats—which is not admitted—what fault can the Reformer find with us if we do attempt to defend ourselves by chaining itself and the Statesman? If we should do that we would be doing nothing more than it avows its desire to do to us. Why does our falsely assumed desire to suppress it reveal an "intolerant, persecuting spirit," while its unquestioned desire to suppress us reveals only the loftiest love for man and God? We hold the theocratic position to be wholly wrong, but we have no desire, nor have we expressed any desire, to prosecute theocrats. All we ask is that they shall not be given the political power that will enable them to prosecute us and other dissenters.

We are utterly unable to see any connection between our explanation that the cartoon means that the theocratic editors are self-chained to the past and the demand that we therefore withdraw all our charges to the effect that the National Reform movement is animated by the spirit of persecution. It has made its own record, and no matter what our cartoons may mean, that record cannot be effaced. The Reformer may say that crime only should be suppressed, and that theocrats would not interfere with us if we were "respectable unbelievers," but such professions are very much like cobwebs; they can be seen through. So long as theocrats are ready to punish "blasphemy" as a crime and have Christian judges and Christian juries to define the offense, there is no possibility of liberty of press and platform. "Blasphemy" is not a crime, and by no possibility can it become a crime; the essential element of crime is invasion, and "blasphemy" is not invasion. But the definitions of "blasphemy," given by Cooley and other jurists and heretofore quoted against us by the Reformer and Statesman, would necessarily, if embodied in law and that law enforced, suppress every Freethought publication that uses plain English, if Christian judges and juries had in their hands the fate of the offenders. Even as high-priced books that deal with problems of sex and because of their great cost and technical style are read chiefly by persons of wealth, education, and "respectability," are not molested by the mousing vice societies, while cheap pamphlets that put in easy words the same information and theories and because of their small cost and simplicity of diction are read by the common people, are ruthlessly hunted out of the market; so the Christian Reformer would call for the suppression of such Freethought publications only as are adapted to the comprehension of the masses. It knows that the advanced thinkers and the better educated class generally are lost to Christianity already, but it hopes to hold the millions, and hence it is especially enraged against papers that present the truth in simple, direct, and forcible English.

A Catholic Echo of the Covenanters.

"The Canadian government ceases joking when it is asked to transmit through its mails obnoxious and blasphemous publications. Recently has this commendable spirit of the postal authorities shown itself by prohibiting an English New York paper, which not only preaches the naked unbelief of a Bob Ingersoll, but which also, in the most ignorant manner, insults our faith. The Canadian government is right; and it is also its duty to protect the believing element of the population from the insults to its holiest beliefs.

"That this scandalous paper spits poison and gall against Canada, is no more than can be expected. The godless have no peace. Perhaps will the unbridled small-writing of the paper finally result in that our postal department will pay special attention to the distribution of such scandalous literature."—Der Herold des Glaubens, Catholic, St. Louis, Mo.

From this it appears that a publication may be denied the privileges of the mails if it is "obnoxious" to the ruling class. It is unquestionable that this is the meaning of the Covenanter and Catholic outcry against THE TRUTH SEEKER. The paper is obnoxious to them, and as they believe that the righteous are the inheritors of the earth and they are the righteous, as has been said before of similar fanatics, they can see no reason why they should not suppress whatever they do not like. But in deference to a supposed popular aversion to persecution frankly for difference of opinion, they generally allege as an excuse for their impertinence and tyranny that the offending person or paper is "scurrilous" or "blasphemous" or "indecent" or "obscene." But these epithets are all of the nature of masks, disguising, to the eyes of the indiscriminating, the repulsive features of religious and moral intolerance.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has offended in that it has exhibited the "naked unbelief" of Ingersoll. Presumably we should have been free from that charge if we had clothed the Agnostic's arguments in the garments of hypocrisy, or if the Colonel himself had done so. Orthodox people always have a great abhorrence for the unclothed, quite possibly because there is absent from it all suggestion of the mysterious and forbidden. However, our greater offense is that we have insulted "our faith," that is, the general faith of the Christians, including the Covenanters, and the particular faith of the Catholics. There is nothing ambiguous about this; it is merely the unblushing affirmation that in America it is justifiable to suppress a paper which a certain school of religionists aver "insults" their faith! If you tell a Covenanter, through letter-press or picture, that Sunday is no more sacred than Monday, he declares that you are a "blasphemer" and have committed a "crime against the public." If you tell a Catholic, through the medium of types or cartoon, that abstaining from eating meat on Friday is a superstition, he asseverates that you have insulted his faith, his "holiest beliefs."

Of course holiness is not an attribute of any belief; religious belief depends upon evidence—and it takes precious little of it to satisfy Presbyterians and Catholics—and the evidence is no more sacred than the evidence that proves or disproves the truth of an assertion concerning any other matter of human knowledge or imagination. No belief, religious or otherwise, is rightfully exempt from adverse criticism and ridicule, and only superstition and bigotry will impel any man to say that Canada is under obligation to "protect the believing element of the population" from "insults to its holiest beliefs." The "believing element" has no more rightful claim to such protection than has the unbelieving element. But to the orthodox religionist there is no faith but his own sacred and deserving of the protection of the civil power.

No, the "godless have no peace"—where the godly have any chance to disturb them. Give the godly the laws they want, and the godless will have short shrift. This will never be a world of peace until it is a godless world. Men filled with the love of God have no room for the love of man unless the men they rule over are of the same faith as themselves. This is the most important lesson of human experience.

Der Herold des Glaubens agrees with its Reformed Presbyterian contemporaries that the postal authorities of the United States ought to follow the example set by those of Canada, and shut this "scandalous" journal out of the mails. This will no doubt delight Brothers McAllister, McCrory, Stevenson, George, and the rest of the Protestant theocrats, but we would whisper in their ears a word of prophecy: When you have successfully played the Forerunner part and the Christ of Rome is in the federal Constitution you or your children will awake some fine morning to find a Roman Catholic holding the postal portfolio at Washington and your Presbyterian papers served just as THE TRUTH SEEKER has been served in Canada with the cordial approbation of yourselves and your far-seeing Jesuit allies. "They who take the sword shall perish by the sword." If you had good business sense you would unite with the Freethinkers in working for the total secularization of the state. That way lies your only safety in the end. Continue in your present course, and we shall indeed be crucified first, but before we are dead you will be decorating the crossed poles to the right and left of us.

The Latest Prayer Test.

The Christian thaumaturgists are at it again. They are once more manufacturing arguments for the Rationalists. They seem determined to impress on the common mind the fact that prayer is not answered. Men and women of exceptional powers of intellect and capacity for observation are already convinced that prayer goes just so far as the vocal organs of the incantationist are able to project it, but the masses of unscientific and unthinking people are still under the delusion that it goes much farther; that, in truth, it reaches a far-away region called "heaven" and penetrates the ear of a being who is named "God." And they even believe that this magnified man pays heed to the quintillions of supplications that are thus tumbled into his auricular appendages and accedes to the contradictory requests of his subjects. But every few years the masses receive an object lesson that staggers the open-mouthed faith of at least a small number of them. Thirty-five years ago began the terrible civil conflict that cost hundreds of thousands of lives and billions of dollars' worth of property. Both North and South the people prayed to God that he would bestow victory on their side. Remarkable as it might seem at first thought, they prayed to the same God. This opened the eyes of a few. The South was beaten; God "gave victory" to the North, and this probably opened the eyes of a few more. But the South remains the most religious part of the nation, and so we may suppose that this prayer test did not do very much to enlighten its Christian people. Neither did the assassination of Abraham Lincoln let light into the brains of the credulous devotees on the hither side of the Potomac.

A little more than a decade and a half after the close of the Civil War came the mortal wounding of President James A. Garfield by Guiteau. The surgeons probed for the pistol ball, but could not find it. For weeks the president lingered between life and death. Meanwhile the Christians prayed. They prayed in the privacy of their homes and in their churches. They prayed spontaneously and in ordered concert. Clergymen prayed. Laymen and laywomen prayed. Children prayed. Days were given over to prayer by the whole nation. God was begged to spare the life of the stricken man. Men and women prayed to him in English, in German, in Dutch, in French, in Swedish, in Danish, in Norwegian, in Russian, in Bohemian, in Spanish, and in many other languages. He was prayed to not only in the United States, but in the British Isles, on the Continent of Europe, in Mexico and South America, and in other lands. He was prayed to by Trinitarians and by Unitarians, by believers in the eternal agony of the wicked and by merciful annihilationists, by Catholics and Protestants and Greeks, by Methodists and Presbyterians and Universalists, by Disciples and Episcopalians and United Brethren, and all the rest of the sectarists. But all in vain. God did not deign to tell the surgeons where to search for the bullet. He did not deign to stretch forth his arm of might and save his believing son, the ex-minister. James A. Garfield died in spite of the prayers of the nations. This indeed was a prayer test, and it was not a prayer test made to order. It came in the course of human events, and there could not be said of it by hedging Christians, as was said by them of the proposition of Professor Tyndall, that it was an attempt to make God a party to his own humiliation. James A. Garfield died, and with him died the faith in prayer of thousands of men and women. The Garfield object lesson is yet instructing the people. One would suppose that the medicine men of the church would never court another such failure. But they have.

On Thanksgiving Day the Christian Endeavorers of Cleveland prayed for the conversion of Robert G. Ingersoll to Christianity. At whatever place they were at noon, they were pledged to there offer up a prayer for this purpose. The woman president of the "May You" branch of the society made the suggestion, and it was so well received that it was embodied in what might be called a general order to all the members. Some of the Cleveland ministers thought that, as private prayers were asked for, they would not mention the matter publicly before their Thanksgiving sermons. Others, notably the suburban preachers, prayed long and fervently. At the Columbian Labor church, the headquarters of the Salvation Army, the praying, under the lead of "Joe the Turk," was fast and furious. This is his prayer, as reported:

"O Lord, we have an arch enemy who is traveling over the country. He is working against Thee. He is working against us. He is endeavoring to injure the cause. We have all faith in Thee. We believe that Thou canst do this thing. Thou hast answered our prayers before, and we believe that Thou wilt do it now. O Lord, Thou hast everything and canst do everything. Save this enemy. Make a friend, a co-worker of him. O God, Thou art all-powerful and holdest everything in Thy hands. Answer this our prayer."

Then followed a half-hour of religious frenzy that would have put a combination of Howling and Dancing Dervishes to the blush.

Now, if God has all the power that "Joe the Turk" says that he has, he can convert Colonel Ingersoll without an effort. But if he does not "save this enemy" we shall be forced to conclude that he does not want Colonel Ingersoll to be a Christian. In that contingency, there is no help for the Freethinker—he can't be an "Endeavorer," and so we hope the "saved" will stop abusing him. He is one of the elect of God unto damnation, and couldn't believe that Jonah had a saloon stateroom in the whale, even if he tried to all his life.

But the Cleveland episode was only the beginning of the latest great prayer test. At 2 P.M., Sunday, December 1st, all the Christian Endeavorers of the United States and Canada, supported by the uniformed legions of the Salvation Army, were to pray for the conversion of the Agnostic lecturer and author. Up to the time of going to press the invocations have not taken effect; THE TRUTH SEEKER is informed that Colonel Ingersoll is still in full possession of his senses, and the ever-genial Charles A. Davis, his advertising manager, is kept busy fixing dates and arranging routes for the winter campaign. As the New York Sun says, the woman president of the "May You" branch of the Christian Endeavor "has forced upon the public a prayer test bound to be of extraordinary notoriety." After the smoke of battle clears away there will be a good many more Infidels in the country than there were before she fired the first gun.

J. B. Coulter, one of THE TRUTH SEEKER's subscribers, was on November 4th murdered at his home, two miles east of Cobden, Ill. He was killed by a charge of shot which entered his forehead. As a watch and money on his person when killed were not taken it is apparent that robbery was not the object of the assassin. Mr. Coulter was 69 years of age. His funeral services were largely attended and were secular.

On November 10th the statue of the Virgin Mary was crowned at New Orleans with imposing ceremonies. A committee of women had begged of the citizens the jewels for the crown, but the most significant feature of the occasion was the opening of the exercises by the firing of a salute of twelve guns at six o'clock by a detachment of the Louisiana Field Artillery, while gun salutes were continued at intervals during the evening. We suppose that this fresh evidence of the growing recognition of religion by the state will be very gratifying to our friends of the National Reform Association, and we may reasonably expect that they will call attention to it in their coming convention at Baltimore as one of the most pleasing and encouraging signs of the times. But should some one there facetiously object that the participation of the state troops in the ceremony of crowning the Virgin was a recognition of a sect of Christianity, we should be obliged to maintain that the point was not well taken. We confess that we cannot understand why Protestants are so eager to let the Catholics have all the benefits of the female member of the divine quartet. We are constantly told that the effect cannot be greater than the cause, and hence the mother of God must be greater than God; and if God incarnated in Christ should be in the Constitution and be recognized as King of the nation, it is not reasonable or fair to deny to his mother some measure of official recognition. She should be at least Queen Regent.

Superstition in Present Times.

[From "Recent Recrudescence of Superstition," by Prof. E. P. EVANS, in the October Popular Science Monthly.]

The convention of Catholics held at Cologne [Germany] during the last week in August, 1894, passed a resolution urging the immediate founding of a university at Fulda, which should be sanctioned by the pope, controlled by the bishops, and wholly independent of the state. The kind of instruction which young men would receive in such an institution may be easily imagined. The hexameters of the fathers and the works of Albertus Magnus would be the text-books in natural science, while theology and philosophy would be nothing but a rehash of the quiddities and quodlibets of Thomas Aquinas and Duns Scotus.

Two books recently published may be cited as fair specimens of the sort of researches to which the professors of the proposed Fulda University would probably devote their time and talents. The first of these volumes is entitled "Wunder und göttliche Gnadenerweise bei der Ausstellung des heiligen Rockes zu Trier im Jahre 1891;" aktenmässig dargestellt von Dr. Felix Korum, Bishop of Trier, of which a fourth edition has just been issued by the Paulinus printing office in Trier (Treves). When it was announced in 1890 that the "holy coat" of Trier would, after a lapse of forty-six years, be again exhibited for the adoration of the faithful, many sincere Catholics could hardly believe that, in the latter half of the nineteenth century, such an appeal to the crassest religious credulity would be made, or that it would meet with any general response. Nevertheless the exhibition took place in the following year and was crowned with immense success. Vast crowds of people flocked to the sacred shrine, and rumors went forth throughout the land of persons who had touched the garment and proved its miraculous virtue by being healed of their infirmities. This immense concourse of devotees presented to the eyes of the bishop a "glorious spectacle" and is characterized by him as in itself a "moral miracle;" a mind less blinded by bigotry, and therefore more capable of tracing the logical connection between cause and effect, would discover in this marvelous phenomenon only the natural result of the kind of religious instruction that has been systematically imparted by the Catholic clergy to the souls intrusted to their special care and spiritual cure during the last fifty years.

Dr. Korum seeks to give his brochure a quasi-scientific character by a so-called "documentary representation" of the miracles wrought by the "holy coat," consisting of certificates issued by obscure curates and country doctors and indorsed by an episcopal commission of theologians and physicians, who have very discreetly forgotten to sign their names to their reports and thus relieved themselves of all personal responsibility for their opinions. The council of Trent decreed that no new miracles are to be accepted as authentic unless allowed and approved by the diocesan bishop, who, after taking the advice of theologians and other pious men, is to come to a decision which shall be consentaneous to truth and piety (veritati et pietati consentanea). Unfortunately, the interests of truth and piety are not always identical, and the demands of the former are apt to prove fatal to the claims of the latter. The diseases reported by our author as having been healed were nervous and hysterical affections, chorea or St. Vitus's dance, and a few cases of certain milder forms of lupus and tabes, which, as is well known, often disappear for months and even for years without the aid of medicine or miracles. It is also essential to a miracle that the afflicted person should be instantaneously relieved, or "cured from that very hour." The bishop, however, records no instance of this kind; as a rule a very considerable time elapsed, often weeks and months, before the contact with the "holy coat" began to produce any perceptible effects; meanwhile the patient had been subject to a variety of sanitary influences, such as change of scene and other diversions, any one of which might have brought about the desired result, and in some cases also underwent medical treatment. Under such circumstances it would be the height of absurdity even for those who admit the possibility of the miraculous healing of disease to claim that the recovery was due to supernatural causes. Indeed, of the thirty-eight cures said to have taken place during the exhibition of the "holy coat," Dr. Korum owns that twenty-seven may have been effected by natural means, thus leaving only eleven in which he would fain discover the working of divine agencies.

One of the most eminent of modern neuropathologists, the late Professor Charcot, published shortly before his death an interesting paper on faith-healing, in which he acknowledges the reality of the cures performed by this means, and states that his own practice furnishes many examples of the kind; but every therapeutic miracle, he adds, has its explanation, and we are gradually becoming better acquainted with the laws which govern the origin and evolution of such phenomena, and better able to trace them to their natural causes. Two factors are absolutely essential to cures of this kind; first, a peculiar mental constitution of the patient, easily accessible to confidence, credulity, or, as it is now called, suggestibility; secondly, a certain definite form of disease confined to a very small province in the domain of therapeutics, and comprising only those affections which the influence exerted by the mind upon the body suffices to heal. To this class of ailments belong partial or complete paralysis, cramps, convulsions, and similar functional disorders, tumors and ulcers, muscular atrophy, defective vision, and other troubles of a hysterical nature, which can be cured by hypnotic suggestion, or by impressing upon the mind of the patient the conviction of their non-existence, or by appealing to the firm belief in some remedy which has no intrinsic virtue. Under such circumstances a cripple may recover the use of his limbs simply by being commanded to rise up and walk, or a person suffering from tabes dorsalis may be restored to health and strength by wearing a holy relic of high repute or by going on a pilgrimage to some wonder-working shrine. In both cases the cure is effected by the exercise of credulity under more or less morbid and abnormal conditions produced either by somnambulism or superstition; but in neither case is the result attributable to supernatural causes. The sole aim of the physician is to heal the sick, and he should be liberal-minded enough to make use of any remedy which experience has proved to be effective—it may be a pill or a pilgrimage, a dose of sulphur or devotion to a saint.

An admirable reply to Dr. Korum's book is a brochure of eighty-three pages written by Friedrich Jaskowski, entitled "Der Trierer Rock und seine Patienten vom Jahre 1891" (Saarbrücken: Carl Schmidtke, 1894). The author is a Catholic priest in the diocese of Trier, and therefore under the jurisdiction of the bishop, the absurdity of whose statements and the untenableness of whose arguments he so courageously exposes and so conclusively refutes. The holy coat, he says, has been in the custody of the cathedral since the twelfth century, and was exhibited and adored as a sacred relic probably a dozen times from 1512 to 1810, but during these three centuries no healing virtue or wonder-working power was ever ascribed to it. In 1810 some ignorant and superstitious devotees reported that miracles had been wrought by it, but these stories were not indorsed by the ecclesiastical authorities. Not until 1844 did the popular demand for miracles become so loud and persistent that Bishop Arnoldi finally yielded to it and announced officially that "bodily wonders" or miraculous cures had been performed. If the holy coat can restore the sick, Jaskowski thinks it rather odd that it should have no power of self-restoration; it gets moldy when shut up in a damp closet, wears out by use, and has to be cleaned, darned, and patched like any other garment. The miracles of healing cited by Dr. Korum are then subjected to a critical examination and shown to be utterly unworthy of credence. In several instances the persons said to have been cured died shortly afterward. Of the thirty-eight cases cited, thirteen were men and twenty-five women. "This predilection for the fair sex" is a rather suspicious circumstance, indicating that the maladies were mostly hysterical and nervous and might be easily ameliorated by any influence that would powerfully affect the imagination, without the aid of either medicine or miracles.

The success, both devotional and pecuniary, which attended the exhibition of the holy coat of Trier in 1891 on German soil excited the religious and patriotic zeal of French Catholics, who resolved to try what healing virtue might still inhere in the "holy seamless coat" of Argenteuil. This rival relic, the gift of the Byzantine Empress Irene to Charlemagne, had not been officially exposed and had its therapeutic powers publicly tested since 1680, and it was decided that the "elevation" should take place from May 14 to June 10 in the year of grace 1894. No sooner was this announcement made than it greatly alarmed the jealousy of Trier, whose bishop published a pastoral letter denying the genuineness of the coat at Argenteuil, and inviting the faithful to pay their devotions only to that at Trier. This view was also taken by a French ecclesiastic, the Benedictine Abbe Vonel, who wrote a pamphlet declaring that the legend of the Argenteuil relic had no historical foundation, and that the whole thing was merely a "pious illusion," which the church should have sufficient love of truth as well as sense of her own worthiness to repudiate. This conclusion filled the inhabitants of Argenteuil with consternation; especially the tradesmen and innkeepers of the little town on the Seine uttered loud and indignant protests against the attempt to tarnish the traditional glory of this sacred shrine and to diminish the prospect of putting money in their pockets, while the people of Trier rejoiced at the condemnation and probable extinction of a dangerous competitor. At this juncture Monseigneur Richard, archbishop of Paris, intervened and induced the Abbe Vonel to withdraw his brochure from publication. In order to remove any lingering traces of skepticism from the public mind, the bishop of Versailles submitted a small piece of the holy seamless coat to the chemists of the Gobelins manufactory, who reported that the web might possibly date from the time of Christ, and that the stains may have been produced by blood; whether it was really the vesture upon which the Roman soldiers cast lots they would not undertake to decide. This vague and utterly worthless document was eagerly seized upon by the bishop and printed in the newspapers as a confirmation of the truth of ancient tradition by modern science.

We may add that the ecclesiastical authorities of Argenteuil do not deny the genuineness of the relic at Trier, but only assert that it is an upper garment, one of those which Christ's crucifiers parted among them, whereas theirs is an under garment, worn next to the skin, and therefore endowed with greater healing virtue than could possibly be possessed by a mere overcoat. The masses, however, do not seem to have been seriously affected by the accusations and recriminations passed backward and forward between the guardians of the two shrines vying for public patronage. On May 14th, the first day of the "elevation," thirty-seven extra trains left Paris for Argenteuil, and forty-two thousand persons paid their devotions to the wonder-working coat; and when the exhibition closed on June 10th half a million pilgrims had visited the little town.

Another book indicating the rank growth of superstition in recent times is Dr. Theobald Bischofberger's "Die Verwaltung des Exorcistats nach Massgabe des römischen Benediktionale," of which a new edition, revised and enlarged, was published by Roth at Stuttgart in 1893. The author evidently prides himself upon his powers as an exorcist, and relates with great unction and assurance his experiences in casting out devils by a hocus-pocus worthy of an American medicine-man or an African conjurer. In the section of his manual entitled "Recognition of Demonic Diseases" he states that the signs of diabolical possession are quite conspicuous, but not altogether infallible, such as understanding foreign tongues without having learned them, and revealing the place where objects have been hidden, a peculiar faculty now known as mind-reading.

Diabolical possession, if permitted to continue for a long time, finally gets to be chronic and inveterate, and develops into an organic and incurable disease. Very often, too, it is quite impossible to determine whether the demon is the originary cause of the malady or merely takes occasion of it to get possession of the person through the breach made by illness, like an enemy lying in wait and ready to seize every opportunity to assault the temporary citadel of the soul. Women, however healthy, are, from the very nature of their sex, subject to various bodily indispositions from which men are wholly free, and are therefore more liable to demonic affections; hence the vast number of unfortunate women who have suffered as witches in times past, not necessarily because they were wicked or morally corrupt, but because they were weak, the devil taking advantage of their physical infirmities to get possession of their persons and to make them the agents of his will.

The theory that "sin is the source of demonic infestations" is accepted by Dr. Bischofberger only in its general application to the human race; if applied to individuals and families, he thinks it often works great injustice. He censures the conduct of many guardians of souls, who say to those afflicted by demons: "It serves you right; you ought to lead a different life; Satan has power only over bad people." Such remarks betray a lamentable ignorance of the devil's devious ways and cunning devices. Equally reprehensible is it to tell mothers who seek help from the church for their suffering children: "Your child has been baptized and is in a state of saving and sanctifying grace and inaccessible to devils. You must consult a physician." The truth is, adds our author, little children are very frequently demoniacally possessed for the same reason that women are.

Demons are said to watch with lively interest the progress of modern science and to build great hopes upon it. On one occasion, when the priest came with consecrated oil (oleum simplex) and holy water and began to utter the prescribed exor-cism, the evil spirit cried out: "Woe is me! I thought that rubbish had long since gone out of vogue and been discarded as dead superstition." In the ages of faith it was customary to cast out devils in the presence of the whole congregation; but, owing to the growth of skepticism even among so-called believers, it is now deemed better to do it scorsum a multitudine (apart from the crowd), which would be attracted by idle curiosity rather than by the spirit of devotion. It is desirable, however, that the priest should select from the kinsmen and friends of the energumen a number of pious men who, after confessing and taking the communion, shall sustain him by prayer and fasting. Dr. Bischofberger firmly believes that our insane asylums contain many demoniacs who might be healed by the church, but whom "science falsely so called" has condemned to the madhouse and the strait-jacket; he condemns the priests who would fain show their enlightenment by indorsing the decisions of the alienist, and exclaims: "O spirit of the age! How strongly hast thou infected even the clergy!" It may also be regarded as a concession to this spirit that it is now admissible to call in a physician in order to repair the damages done by the demon to the bodily organism, whereas in the middle ages, and indeed down to the seventeenth century, the church positively forbade any such intervention, and maintained that the divine power which cast out the devil would also heal the breach. With the general decline of faith in miracles it is permitted to have recourse to medicine, which, however, must be blessed by a priest before being administered to the patient.

Curiously complicated knots and intricate twists and tangles in the hair of animals "are always signs of demoniac infestation." Some eleven years ago the cattle of a peasant in Dr. Bischofberger's parish had their jaws so cramped and contracted that they could hardly eat. The demoniac attack, although severest at first, extended more or less over the whole day and night. If the cows succeeded in getting a little fodder into their mouths, they would keep it there almost motionless for half an hour or more, and only swallow just enough to keep them alive, and after four or five weeks they were all reduced to the verge of starvation. Our learned doctor of divinity then went through with the prescribed benedictions of kine, fodder, stall, etc., as he informs us, and standing before each animal in turn said, "I command you, demon, in the name of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, that you desist from tormenting this creature of God and no longer disturb it in the exercise of its natural functions." Gradually they began to chew their food slowly, and no sooner was a cross burned in the tuft of hair between the horns than they fell to and ate with a ravenous appetite.

In another case with which he had to deal he found the devil more obstinate. A peasant woman had suffered from various ailments, and after giving birth to a child fell into a state of extreme nervous prostration. The præceptum probativum indicated demoniac infestation. By the use of consecrated oil and the proper benedictions the evil spirit was cast out of the woman, but went into the stable, where the cattle became strongly agitated. The bovine benedictions expelled it from the cattle, when it returned to the woman, from whom it passed into her husband and children, but, owing to their good health and bodily soundness, it could find no firm foothold there and was easily driven out, whereupon it went back to the woman and one of the cows. A veterinarian gave the animal some medicine, which the priest had blessed, and benedictions were pronounced upon the entire building with all its inmates, men and cattle. Shortly afterward it was found that the devil, instead of going back to hell as told to do, had taken up his abode in the well, which was about half a dozen yards from the house, for no sooner did the cows drink the water than their hair bristled and stood on end; also the woman had a relapse after taking a sip of it. Dr. Bischofberger expelled the devil from the well by throwing into it a little consecrated salt, and, after chasing him with the weapons of the church from one nook and corner to another, finally succeeded in getting rid of him and purgating the whole premises. "We thus see," he concludes, "how the demon makes every effort to deceive, weary, and discourage the officiating priest."

In conclusion, the author of this manual of exorcism says, "People fondly imagin that these cunning devices of the Prince of Darkness may have been practiced in former centuries, but that they have been dissipated by the light of the nineteenth century like the mist before the sun." His thirty-seven years' experience as a priest prove this optimistic assumption to be wholly unfounded.

The Religion of Deeds and the Religion of Words.

Every Stoic was a Stoic, but in Christendom where is the Christian?—Emerson.

'Tis writ: "In the beginning was the word!"
I pause, perplexed! Who now will help afford?
I cannot the mere word so highly prize;
I must translate it otherwise,
If by the spirit guided as I read.
"In the beginning was the sense!" Take heed,
The import of this primal sentence weigh,
Lest thy hasty pen be led astray!
Is force creativeness then of sense the dower?
"In the beginning was the power!"
Thus should it stand: yet while the lines I trace
A something warns me once more to efface.
The spirit aids; from anxious scruples freed,
I write: "In the beginning was the deed!"

—Goethe.

Robert Burns once said that of all nonsense religious nonsense is the most nonsensical. Burns spoke of the religious nonsense of his time, but his rule holds good when applied to the religious nonsense of our own time. Religion is subject to the laws of evolution; the religions of the present have evolved from the religions of the past and are in many respects an improvement upon their parents, but the religious nonsense of the present is as nonsensical as it was centuries ago. Some fine specimens of religious nonsense are put on exhibition every year during the long winter evenings at the church revival meetings. The Methodist church is especially active in this line. It beats all its rivals. The midwinter exhibitions of the Methodist church are perhaps the finest of the kind we have in this country. The revivalists are undoubtedly well-meaning men and women; they are honest and sincere; they work for what they believe to be the benefit of mankind, and yet I have no hesitation in saying that the revival meetings, far from being a benefit, are an injury to mankind. The enthusiasm of the revivalists is very commendable, and many Freethinkers and reformers can take lessons from them. Without enthusiasm we cannot accomplish anything great. In fact, I am of the opinion that if the movement of progress is very slow, it is to a great extent due to the fact that many of the so-called reformers and Freethinkers are not active workers; they lack enthusiasm. Ideas cannot be of great value unless their possessors can use them for the benefit of others. Heine says:

We do not take possession of our ideas, but are possessed by them.

They master us and force us into the arena,
Where, like gladiators, we must fight for them.

But people with no enthusiasm seldom fight for their ideas. Give us enthusiastic men and women and the world will be saved; but while enthusiasm can do a great deal of good, it can also do a great deal of evil. Enthusiasm in the wrong direction cannot but be harmful.

The aim of the revival meetings, it is claimed, is to convert unbelievers to "Christianity" and thus save them from a burning hell in the next world. "Save your souls, flee from the wrath to come," is the burden of their song. The sufferings of the unconverted in the flames of hell are portrayed in such dark colors that weak-minded persons are terrified to death and often become insane. The revival meeting often furnishes inmates for the lunatic asylum. An English man of science, who prides himself on being a Catholic, not long ago tried to prove that there is real "happiness in hell," but our Methodist friends of the revival meetings reject such a doctrine as unworthy of notice. Let scientific Catholics talk as they will; let the revised version of the Bible put out the flames of hell; it makes no difference to them; they keep on preaching a red-hot hell, as if nothing had happened. Strange our Methodist brethren will not preach an old-fashioned hell in their ordinary Sunday sermons; they will sometimes even admit that hell is not a place but a condition, but as soon as they start a revival meeting, they "raise hell" in earnest and are very liberal in distributing fire and brimstone.

We constantly boast of the great achievements of the nineteenth century, of the great statesmen, poets, philosophers, scientists, and inventors it has produced; of the great progress we have made in all departments of knowledge. All this may be true. It cannot be denied that the present century has done a great deal to enlighten and elevate humanity. Pessimists may bewail its faults and limitations; they may call our attention to the fact that the condition of the masses is no better now than it was a hundred years ago; that slavery exists in fact, if not in name; that greed and avarice are triumphant. These are, of course, serious and damaging charges; still, I am of the opinion that in spite of all faults this century is by far the greatest in the history of the world. But when I enter a Methodist church during a revival meeting, I am inclined to think that the nineteenth century is not a reality but a dream, that Darwin and Haeckel never existed, and that we still live in the Middle Ages.

I have said, and I say again, that I have nothing to say against the revivalists as men; I have nothing but admiration for their zeal and sincerity. If they really believe that Calvin and Torquemada are enjoying eternal bliss in heaven, while Goethe and Darwin are in hell, it is not only their right but their duty to say so; but what shall we say of a religion that teaches us such a monstrous doctrine? Think of a heaven which has no place for many of the best and greatest men, but which welcomes some of the worst specimens of humanity, who become "converted" on their death beds! Think of a God who damns a good man for failing to believe something which he could not believe!

To convert men to Christianity, or at least to that portion of Christianity which teaches us to be kind, merciful, pure in heart, to hunger and thirst after righteousness, to do our duty regardless of how it may affect our personal happiness, to make peace with our brother-man before offering a sacrifice at the altar of God, and to do as we would be done by, is a praiseworthy work; but how much of such Christianity do we find in our churches? How many "Christians" make a practical application of the teachings of Jesus? The name of Jesus is altogether too often on the lips of the professed Christians, but of what use is the name if it does not inspire men to live better lives and improve the condition of the world? "In the beginning was the word," quotes the so-called Christian, but Goethe, who was of a true religious nature, says: "In the beginning was the deed." This is the Alpha and Omega of true religion; this is the hope and consolation of humanity. "I cannot the mere word so highly prize," but what is the religion of the churches if not the mere word? If the deed exists at all, it is so hidden in an obscure corner behind a mass of creeds, doctrines, and ceremonies that it is almost invisible.

Imagine a man who had never crossed the threshold of a Christian church, but who is acquainted with the teachings of Jesus. Let such a man find his way into one of our orthodox churches during a revival meeting and he will not be able to understand what connection there is between the church performances and the religion of Jesus, and yet the worshipers of the "word" honestly believe that they are real Christians doing the will of Jesus.

We are in a great need of revivals, but not of the Sam Jones type. Let us have a grand revival of the religion of humanity which teaches us to educate, enlighten, and make this world a paradise. If the churches want to do some good, let them preach such a religion. They must vacate the realm of the unknown and keep their feet on terra firma. If there is a God, he is able to take care of himself; he has no need of the help of the priest and parson. Let the churches cease talking so much about heaven and hell; let the preachers stop giving us nonsensical descriptions of how the inhabitants of those countries enjoy themselves. Are the preachers sure that they know the truth about heaven and hell? They have never visited the realm of the unknown; all they can do is to guess. Are we under obligation to accept their guess as the only true one? Cannot every thinking man do his own guessing about matters which admit of no proof? Why should we trouble ourselves about problems beyond the power of men to solve? Why gaze at the stars and leave the mud under our feet in its present condition? Heaven and hell are mere shadows, but the world in which we live is a reality. So let our ministers do something for this world, let them try to alleviate the sufferings of this life. Instead of helping God, let them help man; instead of fighting an imaginary, invisible Satan, let them fight the real, visible Satan of crime, vice, injustice, and ignorance; let them, in short, become teachers of mankind; let them say, with Abou Ben Adhem: "Write me as one who loves his fellowmen!" If they do this, the future generations will rise and call them blessed, but if they persist in following their present course, the future will have no use for them. They will become fossils to be placed in a museum of antiquities. CYRUS W. COOLIDGE.

A Youthful Friendship Renewed.

From the London Freethinker.

A few days ago in conversation with Mr. George Anderson we learnt that he had just been in communication with a friend he had lost sight of for more than forty years, and all through one of Mr. Putnam's letters in THE TRUTH SEEKER. The friend in question saw a reference to George Anderson there, and said to himself, "Why, that must be my George Anderson."

He wrote and discovered that it was, and now they are "Dear Georging" and "Dear Williaming" each other as though they had parted only yesterday. So strong is the friendship formed in the godlike time of youth.

Fifty years ago Mr. Anderson belonged to a Young Men's Society at Arbroath, and he converted nearly all the members to Freethought; though the Society degenerated when he left it, for when he returned some time afterwards he found them discussing whether an old maid or a young widow made the best wife.

It was at this period of his life that Mr. Anderson became acquainted with William Cant Sturoc, who visited America, settled down there, and so disappeared. The place of his settlement was Sunapee, Sullivan Co., N. H. He was admitted to the bar in 1855, and is now a respected citizen, widely known for intelligence and integrity, for liberal thought and a certain poetic gift which even law has not succeeded in suppressing. A portrait of him appeared in the Granite Monthly for December, 1893. The face is keen and intellectual, with geniality and humor about the eyes and mouth.

Mr. Anderson asked Mr. Sturoc whether the law over there was as badly against Freethought as it is here. Mr. Sturoc replies that there is no state law against selling tickets or charging a door-fee on Sunday, but municipal regulations have lately been enforced to put down Sunday theatricals and concerts. There are occasionally fanatical outbursts, encouraged by the clergy, against individual rights. Societies may take and hold property, but the intention of testators is sometimes frustrated by bigoted judges.

The Liberal Club.

The writer of these lines attended, on Friday evening, November 29th, the 767th regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club. Upon his waistcoat, made conspicuous by a moderate exuberance of person, he wore the badge-pin of Freethought. There was a debate in sight, and the hall was inordinately full, some of the listeners occupying picnic chairs in the vestibule. Mrs. Emma Beckwith presided, impartially extending or shortening the time of the speakers as their efforts seemed to her good or otherwise.

The Rev. E. J. O. Millington, who is understood to be a Presbyterian, opened the discussion of the subject—"The Authority and Necessity for Faith." Mr. Millington is still a young man, with a build like Franklin Steiner's and a face twice as long. His thick auburn hair lay smooth across the top of the head and undulated properly elsewhere. His hands were white, his countenance pale. He was armed with a roll of manuscript. Having made his bow, he assured the audience that it gave him great pleasure to be there. He represented no church, and would not be held responsible for what any school of theology might teach. He would define faith as "assent to testimony." If the testimony appeared satisfactory, we were justified in believing. He quoted Aristotle, Dr. McCosh, and Professor Drummond, and also cited Ingersoll, but did not quote him, to show that the highest knowledge is not scientific. His faith, he said, was not contrary to anything that he knew, nor was it antagonistic to reason. He was an evolutionist, but he found that evolution made great demands upon his faith—he must accept the testimony of the men who had done the investigating. The value of the testimony was the thing to be fought over. Defining his own faith, Mr. Millington said that he believed in God, the creator and father, and his good will toward mankind; in the Lord Jesus Christ, the reality of sin, and the necessity and possibility of redemption; that the wages of sin were death, and the gift of God the same old life eternal; that the gospels were a perfectly credible history of Christ, but that Christ himself is the real authority. Incidentally, he would be pleased to defend the reliability of the gospels against any who chose to question it. Christ became inexplicable on the hypothesis that he was merely human. He was not related to his age and nation, nor even to any other, and such was his marvelous nature that he in himself furnished the only necessary proof of the existence of God. Humanity could not have produced him. There was magic in his name, which was mighty unto redemption from sin, and the Rev. Mr. Millington would rest his case upon saved men.

Mr. Millington made a good impression. He was not at all abusive; he gave Freethinkers the credit of searching for truth with as great earnestness as the same quest is followed by Christians, and believed that all could get together on a platform of doing good. Only, he prophesied, when we got there, Christ would be the central figure. He took his seat cheered by hearty applause.

Then came Mr. Thaddeus B. Wakeman to correct

Mr. Millington's errors. This contention, Mr. Wakeman said, could not be fought to a finish, for the reason that the combatants were not in the same ring and could not reach each other over the ropes. Mr. Millington lingered in the world of tradition and theology, and his method was theological and traditional, while Mr. Wakeman had long since thrown that method overboard and swabbed the decks. He no longer relied on testimony, but upon evidence. We might doubt the testimony of Copernicus or of Newton, but an eclipse proved that the Copernican system and Newton's mathematics were correct. Science is verifiable truth, and there is no other way to prove anything. Thought and things agreeing constitute truth. Mr. Millington believed in God, but what god? How does he present him to our minds? He must be conceived of as the Eternal Fact, the totality of the world, or he is a spook—an illusion of the childhood of the race, as Santa Claus is of the individual. The old theological god is out of history and out of the thought of enlightened people. No creator is thinkable. Phenomena form an infinitesimal series, and to attempt to follow them back to any beginning is like carrying out a circulating decimal—for example, dividing 10 by 3. Theology is opposed because it is not true, and neither is it good. The difference between science and religion is not intellectual, but ethical; for to teach, as theology does, the creation and afterwards the extermination of the human race, is untrue and immoral. The man who still promulgates the old superstitions of the Bible is out of all comity with the progressive world. Consciously or unconsciously he is a fraud, and the truth is not in him. The Old Testament creation story is absurd, but the crowning absurdity is the creation of Christ as a redeemer—the notion that God made men good, that they degenerated and made it necessary for him to drown them out; that the descendants of the survivors got worse still, and that God was compelled to kill his own son as an excuse for saving them. Such teaching, in addition to being absurd, is basely immoral. The idea of exclusiv salvation has had the effect of turning the earth into a huge blood pudding, and the Christians of to-day owe mankind an abject apology for the atrocities committed in the name of their religion.

Christ, said Mr. Wakeman, never existed as one man. There was no man living in the first century who held the notions attributed to Christ by Mr. Millington, and if Jesus of Nazareth were in the hell he would not understand a word the reverend gentleman had said. Mr. Millington's Christ was an ideal of the nineteenth century. No man Christ, who walked on two feet, is known to definite history. He has been removed, and the Christ of the gospels is the composite photograph of at least five different characters, or appearances, who embodied the notions of the Jewish insurgents against the Roman government. This will appear from reading the New Testament history in the following order: 1. The epistles of Paul; 2. Revelation; 3. Mark's gospel; 4. Matthew; 5. Luke; 6. The Acts; 7. St. John. The notion was that when the messiah came the kingdom of heaven mentioned in the Lord's Prayer would descend from the sky, the Romans would be wiped out, and the reign of David restored to the Jews. Christ is reported as saying that those within the sound of his voice would witness these things. The Christ idea is the worst enemy of the human race. It is embodied in the czarism of Russia and in the pope of Rome. Its fruits are witnessed in the history of Christianity and in the Armenian atrocities of to-day.

Mr. Wakeman was even more vociferously cheered than Mr. Millington had been, and there was a short discussion by volunteers. Mr. Henry Frank supplemented Mr. Wakeman's notion of God as the Eternal Fact by suggesting that the deity might be conceived of as the Moral Energy of the universe. He added that Christianity once depended on the miracles of Christ; that it had afterwards changed its base to his bodily resurrection, and now, driven from that refuge, it rested its case on Christ's personality, which was quite as unstable as the foundations it had abandoned.

Then Mr. Henry Nichols got in a word or two. Mr. Nichols inhabits this immoral sphere by a supreme act of condescension, and attends the meetings of the Liberal Club at a great sacrifice of self-respect. He first instanced the fact—which is admitted by all, of course—that the world owes its civilization to the benign influence of Christianity. All our educational institutions are Christian. An auditor suggested Girard College, but Mr. Nichols put him down at once by stating that the Christians controlled Girard's institution. The interrupter could only murmur "Stolen!" while Mr. Nichols went triumphantly on. He asked if it was proposed to do away with the churches and substitute the Liberal Club, with its salacious discourse, where a man could not safely bring his family. (At this the wearer of the badge-pin glanced apprehensively at his own family, but as one member thereof was tight asleep and the other on the broad grin, he was reassured.) And then your literature, said Mr. Nichols; what have you got? He went on to say that the publisher of the leading Freethought journal—meaning THE TRUTH SEEKER—had confessed to him that the policy of the paper was to cater to the degraded element. (The present publisher authorizes the writer to say that so far as he is a judge the above statement by Mr. Nichols has all the elements which constitute a lie.) Time prevented the speaker from elaborating his views, but he is understood to be something of a conservative, especially on the population question. As a successor to the Rev. George Vaughan, he leaves nothing to be regretted.

Mr. Rowley, of Brooklyn, was refreshing after the old gentleman who had last spoken, and gave new life to the discussion. He declined to acknowledge the authority of faith, which was always great, he said, in proportion to the ignorance of the person who exercised it. The man who walked by faith needed no knowledge, and generally possessed little; while those who possessed knowledge had no use whatever for faith. Science made no demands on credulity. If we doubt, we have only to investigate and verify; and if we do not choose to do that, we pay the penalty by continuing ill-informed. Tempus was fugiting rapidly, and Mr. Rowley had a short inning.

Mr. Millington, in his rejoinder, maintained two points: First, that belief in God rests on testimony, and he adopted Santa Claus as an illustration. The child believes in Santa Claus because it finds the gifts on Christmas morning. This point seemed to the audience generally to prove exactly what Mr. Wakeman had said on the same subject. Secondly, Christ must have been divine because there is no other name to "kunjel" with and save men from sin. Find another, said Mr. Millington, slapping his shin with one hand and banging the desk with the other, and you have proved your case.

Mr. Wakeman, in rejoining, had no difficulty in finding the names. He mentioned the lights of science and Freethought—Darwin, Huxley, Thomas Paine—at which Mr. Nichols arose and solemnly asked, "Do you class those men with Bob Ingersoll and your crowd here?" Mr. Wakeman told Mr. Nichols that he did, and the audience told Mr. Nichols to sit down—and he sat. The speaker said that he and the colonel could not agree on many points, but that all his opposition to the great iconoclast in minor matters was swallowed up in admiration for the services of Ingersoll as a destroyer of superstition; for this he was ready to kiss the hem of his garment. Mr. Millington kept his feet much of the time while his opponent was speaking, and the two alternately shook their fingers at each other and addressed the audience. Neither succeeded in maintaining his gravity, and general hilarity prevailed. The debate proved so interesting withal that the house was still crowded when at 11 o'clock the disputants shook hands and expressed a hope to meet again in this world.

A Plea for United Action.

The evolution of Freethought in this country has reached the point when co-operation is the supreme necessity. There is not only more defensive work to be done; not only is the enemy more aggressive and dangerous, but the time has arrived for the process of building, of organizing the fruits of victory into means of human progress. If we do not do this, all the bitter struggles of Freethought will only make the church more powerful; for, in its own way, the church will use the advantages attained by Freethought to aggrandize itself. Not only does the church throttle the individual Freethinker, but it robs him also of the results of his sacrifice. It condemns his good name, but appropriates his intellectual property. If Freethought itself does not evolve into an organized power, it will simply play into the hands of the church. The church will use it, as it uses art, science, and philosophy, to sugar the pill of its tyranny. The church fights the individual Freethinker; it will kill him if possible, for it cannot use the Freethinker as a living man. But when the Freethinker is dead it can and does claim his discovery, and uses it to make more brilliant its own laurels and enlarge its despotism. It will not do to fight the church single-handed, for when the most valiant Freethinker dies, the church claims his body, buries him, defames him, and utilizes his mental wealth. Is it not time that Freethought should claim its own; that it should be an independent movement, and enjoy the fruits of its own glorious victories? Is the church to become the final master of the human race, so that even the Freethinker is its servant? This will assuredly be the case if there is no co-operation among Freethinkers.

The church is the arch-monopolist, and it would monopolize intellect and all that intellect produces. It will snatch the honey of the Freethinker's lonely toil, while it leaves him to starvation and martyrdom.

The conflict between the forces of the church and radical Freethought is fundamental. It is not the results of Freethought which benefit the world, so much as its method, which is always the supremacy of reason and experience, and the utter abolition of faith. It is not the truth merely that is of service, but the way in which we acquire the truth. One may accept truth with slavish spirit, as he accepts gold and jewels. The gold and jewels are of value, but of what value if worn merely as the ornament of servitude? Of what value is truth if you accept it as you would accept error itself, without toil or investigation? It is not the truth itself that is best, but the constant search after the truth by free inquiry. The church frequently accepts the results of Freethought, like the robber that it is; but it opposes tooth and nail the method of Freethought. It is the method of Freethought that keeps eternally bright the progress of mankind, and defies the church. It is the method upon which we organize, not upon the results of that method. We organize upon no truth, however large and permanent, but upon the way in which that truth is discovered and sheds its blessings upon the world.

We do not organize upon any creed, even if that creed contains the beauty and grandeur of all ascertained truth; for the moment we do this then ascertained truth is the prison-house of the human mind. Ascertained truth is always limited, and if made the boundary of human thought it becomes radically false. Being a true thing in a false relation, it is the most abominable of lies.

We organize upon the basis of free inquiry in every direction and to every possible result. It is this basis, this method, that the church is now attacking and which we must defend. In behalf of this method of Freethought we do not in this American Republic have free speech, free press, or free mails. More and more is the church endeavoring to place its restrictions on these, for more and more it sees that the method of Freethought is eventually its destruction.

We are therefore in the midst of a battle; the battle for human rights, the right to think, the right to be free and equal. We have against us a mighty and disciplined host. While there are many thousands openly upon our side and a silent majority of millions, still we are at a disadvantage because we lack a common organization. At present, in Freethought, it is too much every man for himself. A great deal is accomplished by this individual effort, and it should be maintained constantly; but in addition to individual effort, why should we not have combined and universal effort? Every active Freethinker must see the availability of this united action and that it is the condition of complete success. The American Secular Union and Freethought Federation is the only national organization to carry on the warfare for political freedom. We must support this or cease to co-operate, let things drift, and allow the church to manipulate politics without opposition. Undoubtedly there are thousands of Freethinkers in this country who are willing to unite. Let us reach them by all possible means, and enroll them in our ranks. The officers of the Union and Federation need the support of every Freethinker. Do not fail to become a member. The fee is only nominal, one dollar; and the fund thus raised will be of invaluable service.

We must work in Congress, on the platform, and through the press. The non-taxation of churches, the Bible in schools, and Sabbath laws are the great questions that confront us throughout the land. Other questions are looming in the future—God-in-the-Constitution, blasphemy laws, and restrictions of the mails. To meet these questions we must have an organized force; we must have comradeship and discipline. If a few thousand will thus combine we shall exercise a vast influence.

Let every active Freethinker do what he can to secure memberships. Write to the secretary for instruction, for documents, and the constitution. Organize a local society wherever possible, and affiliate with the national association. Induce your friends to contribute to the cause. Let us make a grand effort for a five thousand membership this year. This will multiply our means of usefulness a hundredfold. It will insure the triumph of our cause. Three hundred Greeks held back a million Persians. We can do the like by united action, for we are fighting against barbarism and tyranny, and the progress of man is our inspiration and strength. Join the Union and Federation at once. Now is the time. We have one national organization, and it was never in better trim for work. Give us the means to go forward as never before in the cause of liberty and civilization.

Address all communications to E. C. Reichwald, secretary, headquarters, 141 South Water street, Chicago.

Remember that we are struggling, not for ourselves only, but for all the world, and the generations that come after us. Our contest is as deep and broad as humanity itself. The voices of the martyred past are with us, and the happiness of unborn millions is our goal. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, President of American Secular Union and Freethought Federation.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

Dr. G. E. Morrison, in his book, "An Australian in China," shows that it will take the Protestant missionaries, at the rate of conversion that they reached in 1893, about 125,000 years to bring the 400,000,000 of the population of China into the fold of Christ, admitting that all the so-called "converts" remain in the fold after they are corrupted, which, of course, is too preposterous to believe, in the light of experience. Certainly not a very encouraging prospect.

It is pleasant reading, this note about Prof. Hjalmar Hjorth Boyesen, given out on the authority of the Philadelphia Press: "His most important achievement was his work on Goethe, which was translated into German. He was told by the Prussian Ministry of Instruction that it would be used as a text-book if he would expunge sundry Liberal passages, and to his lasting credit be it gratefully remembered, now that he is gone, he refused to alter his opinions to earn royalties." Literary independence is so rare in this age that such an example as that set by Professor Boyesen is very refreshing and encouraging. It is the most lamentable fact of the time that our writers are, as a rule, the slaves of the dollar, the parson, and the young person. We call it the most lamentable fact, because without free and fearless writers corruption and tyranny can degrade and oppress without let or hindrance.

"According to popular opinion, he [Ingersoll] has spent a large part of his public life ridiculing the Bible. He has never uttered one single word of ridicule for the Bible itself. He has only ridiculed certain unfounded conceptions of the Bible which he regarded as standing in the way of human freedom and the progress of human thought."—Rev. Minot J. Savage.

Mr. Savage is partly right and partly wrong. It is true that Colonel Ingersoll and other Freethinkers have ridiculed the conception of the Bible as an infallible revelation of the will of a perfect god, but he and they have also ridiculed the Bible itself—that is, many parts of it—because of its inherent unreasonableness and the cruelty, in numerous instances, of its precepts. No matter what its origin, the Bible contains much that calls for ridicule, and Ingersoll has not refrained from bestowing it. Not all the conceptions of the book which he has ridiculed are "unfounded"; in fact, the most of them are based on the clear and unmistakable affirmations of the volume itself.

In Maryland the mob who were lynching a man "reverently took off their hats" while prayer was offered for the soul of the victim. In consonance with invariable Christian custom, they were ready to ask God to have mercy on the soul of a man for whose body they could show no mercy. So hot were they for the vengeance they formally asked their God not to duplicate that they could not wait for the guilt or innocence of the prisoner to be judicially determined and his punishment, if he was adjudged guilty, meted out by the officers of the law which they pretend to reverence. Of them a correspondent of the World truly says: "They are possessed by the same ignorant fanaticism, the same mistaken zeal for a perverted idea of justice, which made our ancestors burn witches at the stake," and he adds that "the one effectual remedy for such diseases" is education. And he might well have said still further that that education will not be advanced by putting the Bible back into the schools in Chicago, or keeping it in the schools elsewhere.

It isn't a great way from now to the sun festival known as Christmas—an adaptation of pagan rites to Christian necessities—and those who intend to follow the pretty custom of making presents to their friends on that occasion will find on another page of this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER a list of books suitable for that purpose. If our friends desire we can hold the books till a few days before the festival and mail or express them so that they will reach the destination at the right time. A present that we would recommend is to send to your Liberal friend who does not now take it, a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER a year for $3, which carries with it a copy of the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" in boards. For $3.50 we will send cloth bound book, with gilt side stamp—a handsome present indeed, with the added attraction of a weekly remembrance from yourself to your friend in the shape of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Such a present will do you good, your friend good, and us good—a combination of goodness which seems hard to resist.

SOME REASONS WHY. By Robert G. Ingersoll. A new lecture never before in print. Paper, 25 cents. Contents: Some Reasons Why. Duties to God. Inspiration. God's Experiment With the Jews. Civilized Countries. A Comparison of Books. The New Testament. Christ's Mission. Eternal Pain.

Something of the epigrammatic eloquence and logic of this lecture can be seen from the concluding paragraphs: "The Old Testament filled this world with tyranny and injustice, and the New gives us a future filled with pain for nearly all the sons of men. The Old Testament describes the hell of the past, and the New the hell of the future. The Old Testament tells us the frightful things that God has done; the New, the frightful things that he will do. These two books give us the sufferings of the past and the future—the injustice, the agony, and the tears of both worlds."

"ANXIOUS SUBSCRIBER."

[In the words indicated, and in others, the "e" is "silent," that is, it performs no function in those words. That is why it is dropped, as a first step in spelling reform, and in harmony with one of the recommendations of the American Philological Association. If "Anxious Subscriber" will read a copy of the New York Independent he will notice similar omissions, and if he will consult the new Standard Dictionary he will find a large number of words with the improved spelling indicated. It seems to me the Eastern row is bound to end in "takee, takee" after all. Old Mother Victoria has too many Mohammedan subjects in her dominions and says, "Let's moral suasion a little while longer." It all comes from the blanked missionaries' disobedience of the command of their Jesus: "Into any city of Samaria enter ye not." We have now three or four Christs in various parts of the country playing to the credulous, with Talmage and Sam Small, Buckley, and McCabe. The latter is converting Ingersoll with all the earnestness of a country parson praying for rain. The Sunday fads, the beer fads, Vennums and Carons, are doing more work and better work for the emancipation of the race from hereditary superstition than all other agencies combined. Do you see it that way, George? I do.

Faithfully yours, WM. E. RENWICK.

An Unfavorable Opinion of the Cartoons.

RENSSELAER FALLS, N. Y., Nov. 14, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I have been a Liberal for about seven years and a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER for nearly three years.

The paper is able edited. Your editorials are of the highest class, and a spirit of fairness, reason, and logic permeates them. In brief, I am exceedingly well pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER in every respect save one, viz., the cartoons of Watson Heston.

While some of his pictorial work is of a high order and fitly portrays the grandeur of our cause, on the other hand, a great deal of it is really shocking, not only to the Christian, but to those Liberally inclined. Moreover, I have talked to nearly all the Freethinkers in this vicinity on the subject, including S. G. Newcomb, a former subscriber, and Mr. Flack, of Ogdensburg, N. Y., who is now a subscriber, and they all agree with me that those illustrations do more harm than good to the cause of Liberalism.

It is almost impossible on that account to use your paper as a missionary document. The moment you shock an individual he seeks no further. I believe if your subscribers could vote on the question, a large majority would be found opposed to the illustrations.

Off Its Hinges.

TURIN, GA., Nov. 20, 1895.

TO WATSON HESTON, the Unvarnished Artist of the Age.

The gate is off its hinges

When Heston strikes a boss—
Lo! how a Christian cringes
At every skull and cross.

The gate is off its hinges

When a nation prices goods—
The tyrant who infringes
Should dangle in the woods.

The gate is off its hinges

When taxes run too high;
Each man should price his "tinges"
And goods of every dye.

The gate is off its hinges

When men demonetize "
The silver of the "pinges"
Whose stamp is in the skies.

The gate is off its hinges

When a ruler speculates
On bonds and aurum—"stinges,"
In these United States.

The gate is off its hinges

When churches pay no tax;
Down with the lie that swings
A man for printing facts.

The gate is off its hinges

When bigots rule the state,
And every coward cringes
Around Saint Peter's gate.

The gate is off its hinges

When bloomers shan't be worn
By a pretty girl who sings
A long dress every morn.

The gate is off its hinges

When a lass shan't ride a wheel
And show her pretty fringes
Three feet above her heel.

The gate is off its hinges

When woman is a slave,
And men drink holy "vinges"
And call on God to save.

The gate is off its hinges

When a P. M. G. dictates;
When Carrion crow impinges
We smell the British states.

Perhaps Angels Are Red or Yellow.

MONTEREY, TENN., Nov. 18, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: My TRUTH SEEKER did not arrive week before last (November 9th), and I am disappointed. If you have a stray copy of that date please send it. What do you think of the following: "A Montgomery special to Alabama State Herald tells of a smart Yankee who is selling pictorial Bibles to the Negroes in that country in which all the angels appear black instead of white. He is selling the Bibles as fast as he can deliver them at $8 each." Of course the Herald laughs at the ignorance and superstition of the Negroes, but fails to observe that the believers in white angels are equally as ignorant and superstitious as the Negroes. This slick Yankee is no worse than the reverend cormorant who feasts off the labor of the washerwoman and half-starved needlewoman. Since trade has commenced to revive there are many of our great powder towns in the South which are endeavoring to induce capitalists and others to locate with them, and they always offer one grand inducement, viz., their church accommodation, and they are exceedingly anxious to induce Christian gentleman of high character to build up homes amongst them. A while ago I had a little confab with one of our "prominent" citizens about the contradictions of the Bible. He seemed astonished when I quoted a few, and informed him where he would find more, and referred him to W. H. Burr's little work, which I had loaned to another "prominent" citizen. He mentioned this conversation to his pastor, a sheep-shearer and wool appropriator. This eloquent gentleman honored me in his next piece of pulpit twaddle by asserting that it was a very easy task to silence any Infidel by proving that there were no contradictions in the Bible. I politely sent him word that, as he was supposed to know more about the Bible than any of his flock, it would afford me great pleasure to meet him in open debate, and that I was prepared to take the affirmative and prove that the Bible contained a large number of contradictions. The reverend gentleman has, since then, displayed an enormous amount of eloquent silence. This, however, was the means of bringing me in contact with several men who looked upon me as a curiosity. They had never before come in contact with a genuine Infidel. After a little talk, however, they found their views and mine, on ethics, morality, and creeds, were not far asunder; but they had not thought of such things before, but would do more thinking in the future.

Respectfully, JOHN PRITCHARD.

Reticent Clergymen.

Mr. W. H. Maple, the author of "No Beginning; or, The Fundamental Fallacy," which the Truth Seeker Company advertises, sends the appended challenge to clergymen and other believers in supernaturalism; but although a number of eminent doctors of divinity have received both the challenge and a copy of the book, not one of them has as yet deigned to return an honest opinion on the subject of inquiry. Following is Mr. Maple's circular:

In my search for the basic truth underlying the religious beliefs of the world, I have arrived at the conclusion that the only conception of the universe that is in harmony with the products of human intellect generally, is the one which identifies "God" with nature. To my mind science and religion can be fully reconciled only in one way, and that is by completely eliminating supernaturalism from conceptions of the supreme being.

This view requires, it is true, a modification of the word religion, but definitions must necessarily change with advancing knowledge.

In my opinion, the only God whose existence is unquestionable, whose almightiness is beyond dispute, is the totality of natural things.

I have seen fit to put—in my book, "No Beginning," as plainly and as briefly as possible—some of the mental processes that have led me to such conclusion into the form of an attempted demonstration of the non-existence of a first cause or beginning for that aggregate of substance and force which we denominate the universe. I claim to prove, with all the certainty of a mathematical demonstration, the non-existence of a first cause; and in the interest of truth, and that alone, I invite candid criticism on the question of the sufficiency of my logic to establish this main thesis of the little work.

If in your opinion the argument advanced fails to sustain the conclusion arrived at, please to point out in the plainest possible manner its defects, and thus greatly oblige, Yours very respectfully,
WM. H. MAPLE.

Did Not Observe His Own Rules.

ST. JOSEPH, MO., Nov. 14, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: In speaking of the impossibilities of this life we are led to think of the one and only Christ so frequently spoken of in the New Testament, and what an impossible relation existed between him and himself. For, according to the teachings of the book of holy sayings, he was the father and son and the holy ghost at one and the same time. The father of God and the son of God, therefore he must have been his own grandfather; and as he was the father of God, we, as children of God, are grandchildren of Jesus Christ; and if such could have been the case, how did he, before he was born into the world, gain association with his mother and poor Joseph? He must have been very ignorant; and what a great sin God committed in so betraying Joseph's confidence, and then beating him out of the honor of being Christ's father. He committed adultery, one of his great forbidden sins, one for which he cursed all mankind. God committed the same sin, and thereby reaped great glory and fame by it. And yet, when two little innocent people who were as guileless as babies, would eat a little apple, he would tear them from their little garden and forever keep them out of the kingdom of heaven. I think he must have been a very unjust God when he would not let his people do things that he could not refrain from doing himself, and it is one of the greatest wonders in the world that Joseph did not bring suit for divorce against Mary, and likewise bring suit for damages against Jehovah for alienating his wife's affections. That would be done to-day should the same kind of business be carried on.

JOHN R. ALLEN.

That Picture!

SNOWVILLE, VA., Nov. 20, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Some, even among Liberals, are saying Heston's picture of the burning of the Negro (in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Nov. 16) is too hard on Christians—that they are not more cruel and vindictive than Infidels are. But it is evident that they must be so. Believing in an angry, cruel, vindictive God, and a Jesus who wanted his enemies brought before him and slain, naturally cultivates these feelings in their own hearts. Contrast the vituperative utterances of Jesus with the mild, kindly, considerate opinions of Ingersoll in his "Crimes Against Criminals," and see which doctrine tends most to make loving, merciful, and noble-hearted men, women, and children.

A Bible God, who sends fire, flood, and pestilence upon his helpless children, who are precisely as he, 10,000,000 years before they were born, intended they should be; and his son Jesus, who called all who came before him, and taught a theology different from his, "thieves and robbers," and called his contemporaries, who failed to accept him, "serpents and vipers;" who sent people who could not believe him "into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels"—is not such a God and such a son of God calculated to imbue a race with their own wicked, malicious, abhorrent cruelties? The Christian mob burned the ignorant, helpless murderer only a part of one day and in a common wood fire—God and Jesus condemn millions of men, women, and children to a sulphurous fire all day, a million of days—10,000,000,000,000,000 days and as many more after that, and no hope of an end to it. Indeed, Heston's picture is not too hard on such a belief, one that creates and molds such mobs.

But, say you, what must be done with such a wretch as that Negro was? How shall we punish him?

I fear you will hardly accept my judgment as the correct one; but I say now, as I said long, long years ago, as all real thinkers must say, once they shake off the coils of the serpent of theology—Never punish at all! Confine or sequester criminals so they cannot injure others. Let them have all the liberty possible, all the happiness possible, so they earn their own living and their own privileges. Educate them into a higher and better morality. Remember they are like idiots or insane people. They are victims of heredity, training, and environment. They could no more help being themselves than you could help being yourselves. Do you think that poor, ignorant black man would have done as he did had he been born of an Ingersoll and reared in his family?

Condemn the crime, but be just to the criminal.

Each of us inevitable;
Each of us limitless;
Each of us with his or her right upon the earth;
Each of us allowed the eternal purports of the earth;
Each of us here as divinely as any is here.—Whitman.

ELMINA.

Has No Reason to Feel Thankful.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., Nov. 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: In the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER I notice you devote some space to the discussion of eight propositions sent you by a Mr. Shaw, of Maine—which said propositions were handed to him by some believer in an "uncaused first cause." I take this means of acquainting you with the fact that, in my judgment, your discussion of these propositions is the most profound and philosophic discussion of those questions that it has ever been my pleasure to read. Your answers and postulates coincide with my own views exactly.

So, Mr. Editor, while we may differ on some economic and current legislative questions and conditions existing in our country to-day, we are certainly of "one mind" on the greatest problem involving existence itself, in its relation to origin and destiny.

Also, I want to congratulate you on the critique in same issue discussing the president's Thanksgiving proclamation. I have nothing for which to thank an alleged ruler of the universe. I have recently lost by death, a bright, healthy, happy little son six and one-half years old. He had just arrived at that point along the highway of life where he was beginning to do something and was a source of interest and pleasure to his parents. He had just started to school, was learning nicely, and would ask a countless number of questions which puzzled his elders. He had every reason for wanting to live. He loved his home life; he loved his younger brothers and all his little playmates, and he was in turn beloved by all. His health and pleasures were all carefully looked after by his fond parents, and his every wish, in reason, was gratified. He possessed an inquiring mind, and thus early in life gave great evidence of that quality of mind that betokened philosophical research in mature years. He was all in all that fond parents could wish. And I fail to understand why such a bright, promising, healthy, and vigorous boy should be suddenly taken away by brain fever within a week. Don't tell me that a "wise, merciful, powerful ruler of the universe" has to do with his untimely taking away. If such were true, it would more intensely embitter me against such a ruler. There is no power but the immutable forces of nature, that occasioned his dissolution.

And to contemplate the taking away of our dear little boy without any apparent reason makes one think that the creation of the human family, or rather the development from the forces of nature, of the human family, was all a great blunder, if there is any power responsible for our existence other than the inherent forces of nature. It is sad to lose one of our own flesh and blood. To me it has left an aching void in my entire being.

Very truly yours, H. CLAY WILSON.

Still in the Pit of Ignorance.

ATLANTA, GA., NOV. 17, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The Interstate Exposition here is an excellent affair, and does credit to its projectors. It is patterned after the "White City" at Chicago, though of course on a smaller scale. The grounds were admirably adapted to the purpose and have been well laid out and the various buildings placed properly to suit the general landscape. The instructive purposes of the fair are well worth a visit from any part of our country, for here are to be seen fruits of genius that have ripened in the last few years. One thing is to be regretted, though, and that is the closing of the Fair on Sunday. The Christian element here have things in tightly fitting harness, and theaters, stores, and other places of amusement and business are closed on Sunday. This, of course, corals the mass of people in the churches on that day, and they (the churches) are having a picnic, if crowded houses may be termed such. I went to the First Baptist Church this morning and could not get in the door for the crowd that surrounded it. Seeking other fields, I struck the Congregationalist church, where I was so fortunate as to get a seat; but it filled up so densely that some persons, including myself, had to leave to avoid suffocation—one lady fainting outside the door. But while in the church I obtained some new and interesting points in the conduct of their business. All of the orthodox churches dish up the same old dogmatic hash as of old, with perhaps some new forms thrown in as spice. They are working like Trojans and drumming like wholesale grocers.

I had never been in a Congregationalist church before this morning, and had thought that that sect was not so cramped in its ideas as some of the others; however, on seeing and hearing, I concluded that they were about the same. On an ordinary, four-foot, revolving blackboard, on the right hand side of the pulpit, was a picture that I would call amusing did I not reflect that it was used to stultify my dear fellow creatures. I was so inspired by the sight of it that—something I seldom attempt—I too out note book and pencil and made a rude sketch of it. Y. P. S. C. E. (Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor) was on a blood-red field. There were clouds upon the right of silver and gold color. A circle (the earth) inscribed "Rejecting Christ" was as black as the original board, as was also a pit, underneath the earth, labeled "The Consequences." The pit, extending round to the left, with a cavernous looking roof, was surmounted by a dim likeness of human shape and heroic size that would have made me shudder to look at when I was a child.

And this is Christianity. Let us more fortunate Freethinkers abate no effort to deliver our people from it. S. S. BRYAN.

The Political Polyphone.

CONCLUDED.

The remedy for the evil, that most everyone will admit exists the moment his attention is called to it, is in the adoption of the polyphone. The polyphone, as its name denotes, is a phone from the polls, or a political telephone, for the transmission, in black and white, of the wish of each individual voter on each issue, direct to his representative. It is suggested by the Australian ballot system of voting, and consists simply in placing the platforms of all parties on the ballot, or consolidating all the platforms into one and so placing it. The platform to be divided into national, state, and municipal or local issues. The wish of the voter on each issue is indicated by marks opposite each plank thus: x (for), o (against). When no mark is made the voter is neutral, or has not determined.

It is of vastly more importance that the voter have a choice of planks than that he should have a choice of candidates, but he could have both where the Australian ballot system is used. The man who stays at home and attends to his own business is seldom personally acquainted with candidates for any office higher than road overseer. The rabid inferior party papers have lying about the private character of candidates reduced to such a fine art that the non-professional cannot distinguish between falsehood and truth. A man can be fairly well posted on every question of importance by reading the very best that can be said for and against it in the non-partisan papers (which are the papers people should read), and have as good an idea what is best for the country and himself in particular as most anyone else has. The adoption of the Polyphone might be objected to by some on the ground that it would revolutionize politics. But what needs revolutionizing more than modern politics in the United States? Some of the most prominent advantages to be derived from the adoption of the Polyphone might be enumerated; others will readily be suggested to the thoughtful mind:

First—It would be virtually submitting every important national, state, and municipal measure to a direct vote of the people interested.

Second—It would annihilate sectionalism and class legislation, which, under the present system, will become more and more pronounced at each succeeding election. Each individual and each section of the country would then be equally and fairly represented with each other individual and section. Of course all individuals and sections would be in the minority on some particular issue, but would also be with the majority on others, so that no section could claim a victory over another section.

Third—It would do away with polypartyism. The colossal hubbub kicked up every four years incident to election, deranging commerce, partly suspending industry, and so disgusting to all, would be a shame of the past. There would then be only the majority party and the minority party on each particular question, and each individual and section would equally belong to both parties. No radical change could then be made in the administration or policy of the government unless demanded by a majority of the people, and if the majority make a mistake in their demands, and reforms or policies do not prove satisfactory, they can promptly correct their mistake by voting a repeal or modification at the next election.

Fourth—Every campaign would then be "a campaign of education," not only on the tariff or currency question, but on each and all questions agitating the people. It would be the standing and continual duty of the minority party to educate the majority party out of the errors of its ways, and vice versa. It would stimulate discussion in the press, even throughout the rural districts, and throw it into proper and legitimate channels, viz, the discussion of the merits or demerits of the issues and not the merits or demerits of the private characters of the candidates.

Fifth—All legislators would then have the desires of their immediate constituents reduced to figures and placed before them, and their duty would be plain and unmistakable. They would be in duty bound to work for the interest of a majority of their constituents as expressed at the polls, no matter if it was contrary to their own interest or judgment. Under the present system the representative represents himself and nobody else. He substitutes his own private interest and opinion for those of his constituents. His interest and opinion may be antagonistic and diametrically opposed to those of the people he is supposed to represent. That condition is brought about by several reasons. 1. He cannot know positively what the majority wish. 2. He is seldom engaged in the same occupation or profession that the majority are, hence his sympathies and interests are not identical with theirs. 3. Political advancement and emoluments, so much desired by most politicians, and offices are bestowed upon them for work performed for the party in general and not for services rendered their constituents in particular. 4. And last but not least is the influence of lobbyists furnished by trusts and syndicates to inform legislators what their constituents most need and must have, and in the absence of a voice from the people most any recommendations can be driven home to the conviction of the legislator, especially if said recommendations are lubricated with a liberal supply of the oil of political warfare.

Sixth—It would be a perfect process of measuring the desires of the people on any question of importance, and all reforms or changes advocated by any considerable number of citizens could be placed upon the Polyphone, and the strength of the issue could be tested. It would act as a safety-valve where the discontented element, that will be around long after the advent of the millennium, could air their grievances. They would be compelled to fight the masses of the people upon the rostrum and through the press for a redress of wrongs instead of going a-gunning for rich men and officers.

Seventh—It would bring out a full vote at every election, for everyone would be vitally interested in one particular plank at least, and would go to vote for or against it, and incidentally, while there, would be likely to vote on all in which he was interested. As it is now, many do not vote, saying that one party is as good as another or as bad as another, and no party will do anything to help them. Indeed it is practically of no use to vote so long as one cannot make known what he wants a representative for.

Eighth—Politics would be eliminated from the offices of public trust. All officers would be non-partisan except in a private capacity. They would be employed to perform specific duties and would be held accountable to their employers and not to any party. The moment they failed to represent a majority of their employers without a satisfactory excuse they should be handed their time and promptly "fired." If I should hire a hand to work for me a year at stated wages per month; and he should leave me and work for my neighbor, I would be voted a fool if I continued paying him wages. And yet, to some extent, is not that just what the masses are doing? Are not some of their employees drawing double wages? Law making should be put on a business basis on the part of the people as it is on the part of the lobbyist, the trust, and the politician.

Ninth—The most efficient statesmen that the nation produces in any section could then be put in office and kept there so long as they wished to remain. Their tenure of office would not depend on the ups or downs of any issue, but altogether upon their ability and honesty in representing their constituents. As it is now, our most capable statesmen may be thrown out of a job through no fault of theirs, while an unqualified, dishonest scoundrel may ride into office and power on the crest of a reactionary wave of public sentiment on any issue. The official terms of our officers in the army and navy do not depend on the whim of the people or any petty issue; then why should that of our civil officers depend on it? May not that be the reason statesmanship has not been developed to its highest possibilities? Men who have given the best part of their lives in preparing themselves for the duties of directing the destinies of a nation are then suddenly relegated to private life by the dissatisfied element voting another ticket just to have a change, expecting a change in parties will increase the value of what they have to sell and reduce it on what they buy.

The press is the great educator of the people, the molder of public opinion. It must be depended on to guide the ship of state in a proper course. Evolution is pressing forward in all branches of human achievement. Why should not a little of it be infused into the science of government? The grand inventions and the application of steam and electricity by mechanical ingenuity have annihilated time and distance. The nations of the earth are nearer together and more intimately connected to-day than were the states of the Union fifty years ago. Conditions are rapidly changing. What is good policy in one decade may not be in the next. No political party can keep in power perpetually by harping upon its glorious achievements in a past generation. The people now have very little reverence for a rock-ribbed, hide-bound party that is unable to insert a new plank in its platform or modify an old one for fear of losing votes. The inordinate caution of the Republican party in not changing its platform brought about the very condition it so much dreaded—its defeat. An elastic, flexible party, with the use of the Polyphone, could remain in power indefinitely if it would heed its dictates.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

The Dear Old Flag.

(To Henry M. Taber, who, at the recent Free-thought Congress in New York city, exhibited a United States flag made by his mother when she was ninety-three years of age.)

Bright stars upon an azure field,
Held by the red and white,
Of highest worth, they ever yield
Rich treasures of delight.

The dear old flag—a brilliant mass
Of jeweled hope and love,
Protects alike, each clan and class,
Where'er it floats above.

This gracious flag, some memories bind
That time cannot erase;
Fond memories that hold enshrined
A sweet and lovely face.

Dear memories of one who wrought
With keen, unflinching sight;
Whose earnest wish and truest thought
Were ever for the right.

And when the years deep shadows cast,
And numbered ninety-three,
Mid thronging visions of the past,
She wrought this flag for thee.

So patiently, with grace and skill,
She stitched with loving hand,
And blended well her own good will
To all of every land.

More precious far than untold gold,
Is this fair banner now;
Her love, within each starry fold,
Doth still unfading glow.

Though dead, her works yet speak and tell
Of loyalty and truth,
Where honesty and justice dwell
In everlasting youth.

O dear old flag, we honor thee
Wherever thou art set!
Thou art the symbol of the free,
Fair Freedom's coronet.

November, 1895.

SUSAN H. WIXON.

H. G.'s Fort Assaulted.

I see in your issue of November 23d that Comrade "H. G." claims the fort and undertakes to smooth things over the best he can; but in my opinion he gets them mixed up wonderfully. It were better perhaps to drop the matter now. As he says, but as he was rather caustic, I may be pardoned for calling attention to his assertions in a general way. To begin with, I think the mistakes of Comrade "H. G." are easily explained, as he was kind enough to refer to one of the great sayings of Mark Twain by way of illustration, I will be generous enough to refer to the sayings of one of our great men, viz., A. H. Clough, and see how they will hitch. He says: "I will look straight out, see things, not try to evade them. Fact shall be fact for me, and truth the truth forever." Now, I ask, is not that a worthy and truthful saying? If it is, then it places the fort just where it belongs and it places Comrade H. G. in a true light, and he is a "goner," sure pop. He commences by admitting that mine is the generally accepted opinion of the facts in the case, and emphasizes his statement by saying that I was probably a trooper under Harney or Kearney. Now I wish to make the statement and emphasize it by saying that Comrade H. G. is in this matter, like most all other of his statements, badly mistaken; for I never was a trooper under anyone, although I have belonged to different troops. Perhaps Comrade H. G. doesn't know the difference between a troop and a trooper. A little consultation with Webster will set him all right in that respect. He also admits that my knowledge of these things is older than his, and that it is interesting and noteworthy, and no doubt I could tell more about these things than he could. That is just what I thought in the beginning; that is what prompted me to write my first article. But he doubts whether it is any truer than his. Well, I started out to tell the truth—my article being headed "Some Truths About Snakes," while his was just the reverse, viz., "Some Errors About Snakes." We must give Comrade H. G. credit for sticking manfully to his text and doing justice to his subject; and as to which has come the nearest to doing justice to the heading of his article, I am very willing to leave to the readers of the Corner to decide. He says he has no corrections to make, yet he says that he stands corrected as to the size of the prairie dog generally. Then, if he would look straight out, see things, not try to evade them, as Mr. Clough says, he might stand corrected on several more points. It is manly and noble to acknowledge our faults and mistakes, but it is more manly and noble still not to have any to acknowledge. And to cap the climax, he admits that he doesn't know anything about the woods rattler or his mesmerizing powers. I thought he did not at the time I wrote, that is the reason I spoke as I did. Now he admits that I was correct. He misquotes me where he speaks of the snake going up the limb and taking a bird off; he doesn't look straight out. I did not say the snake went up to the limb and took a bird off, but that the snake was on the ground and mesmerized the bird, and the bird went down to the snake. "Fact shall be fact for me and the truth the truth forever." Then he says that ten thousand different explanations might be given for a common occurrence like that. Now that is certainly a good many explanations for one little incident, and I will leave Comrade H. G. to figure them out—too big a task for me. He says the bird may have been watching Mr. Berry instead of attending to business. What would have been the result had the bird been watching Comrade H. G. instead of me? He would likely have known more about such things, would he not? Perhaps. The trouble with Comrade H. G. is that he doesn't "look straight out." He has his own preconceived notions, and then calls all deluded who do not see as he does. "I will leave that," he says, "to the millions who adhere to Mr. Berry's delusion." Well, if I am deluded I have the satisfaction of knowing that I have the millions with me. But suppose that Comrade H. G. is the deluded party (which, by the way, is as probable as any) he will not have the millions to sympathize with him. Then he will begin to wish that he had "seen things—not tried to evade them." Assertions alter not the truth, he says. Very true; and just such statements as Comrade H. G. has made have been made time and time again, but they did not affect the truth a particle. I thought that he did not have much faith in books, and said so in my article. He now comes out boldly and admits that I was correct, and says that he neither believes nor disbelieves them, only with reservation, or so far as they agree with his ideas and notions of things. His inclination is to believe that he is right and every one else wrong. But that has too much common sense to entitle it to popular approval. I do not doubt the statement. He says that Comrade Berry has seen snakes run into holes preceded by prairie dogs. He doesn't dispute my statement about them living in towns, but he does dispute the statement that the dog, snake, and owl all live out on the plains harmoniously together. But as long as I have the millions on my side, as he says, I will feel perfectly safe, and leave it to the readers of the Corner as to who is justly entitled to the fort. Books, he says, are of human origin. But is that any reason or excuse why they should not be truthful and believed? I am at present reading one of the best books I ever read in my life—"Right Living," by Miss Susan H. Wixon. I get new ideas and see things I never thought of before; but because they are new and do not happen to agree exactly with my former ideas of things I don't come out and say, like Comrade H. G., that I neither believe nor disbelieve them; because the author's experience is as ten to one of mine, and because I can't see as far and plainly as she can, is no reason that I should doubt the truth of her statements. I would kindly advise Comrade H. G. to get Miss Wixon's book and read it, if he has not already done so, for it will assist him, as Mr. Clough says, to "look straight out, see things—not try to evade them." But if he has already read it, I am afraid he has done as he says—neither believed nor disbelieved it. In that case it has not done him much good. In conclusion I will say that I have the kindest feeling and regards for Comrade H. G., and hope he will take good care of the fort till I get there.

How Lincoln Examined a Young Man for the Bar.

C. C. Brown, of the law firm of Brown, Wallace & Brown, Springfield, is the surviving partner of the old firm of Stuart, Edwards & Lincoln, the Stuart being that Major Stuart, who believed in Lincoln from the beginning, and lent him law books to study before the unpromising youth left Salem town and tried the temper of the capital, and the Edwards being the husband of a Miss Tod, sister of Mrs. Abraham Lincoln.

"I was examined by Lincoln for admission to the bar," said Mr. Brown. "At that time the judge traveled about the circuit, and there was a committee appointed in each county seat, I presume, whose duty it was to examine all applicants for membership and report upon them. Lincoln and Herndon were the committee here at the time, and I met them in their office. The examination was brief and not all to the point, I remember."

"What were some of the questions?"

"There was but one—the old one—'Which way does the Mississippi river flow?' and the answer was the old answer to it: 'The Mississippi river flows down stream.' After that I took them down to Chatterton's restaurant and treated them both to fried oysters and pickled pig's feet. They ate very heartily, and all the time we were eating Lincoln told stories."

"Of course, Lincoln knew I had been studying law in Major Stuart's office, and he had no fears but I was qualified, I suppose. Anyway, he and Herndon made a favorable report, and I was admitted to the bar."—Chicago Times-Herald.

Christmas Gifts.

Alice B. inquires if to Freethinkers Christmas is appropriate for presents to friends?

For that matter any time when the spirit moves is a good time to kindly remember our friends. We should not be governed in this respect by clock or calendar. Our friend, Jason Waters, once suggested that the Fourth of July was much more a significant occasion for a gift period in the United States than any other time in the year. But, as the custom has become established of remembering friends in December, people of all ways of thinking seem to have fallen in with it. Christmas is only an old Pagan festival under another name, and in its original meaning is really rather attractive than otherwise. Those of Liberal views can take the opportunity to spread the gospel of Freethought by the presentation of books that teach no superstition. THE TRUTH SEEKER carries an excellent assortment of good and useful literature, a selection from which not only may serve to open the eyes of some to the truths of a larger liberality, but, at the same time, advantage an excellent journal of Freethought and Reform. Alice need have no qualms of conscience as to observing the winter solstice by the presentation of a good book.—Ed. C. C.

L. G. Reed writes thus of our lecture on the "New Woman": "I had the pleasure of listening to your interesting lecture on the 'New Woman,' delivered at one of the sessions of the Freethought Congress. The lecture was not only full of instructive facts, but it must receive the prize for originality and apt humor. I wish every Christian woman had a copy of it. Hope it will be published in THE TRUTH SEEKER. How strange that woman should admire most the apostle who most degrades her."

[Thanks, brother, for kind words of approval.—Ed. C. C.]

[The editor of the Corner is under obligations to Charles C. Carlton for a box of nature's curios, including arrow points and a beautiful spear head from Idaho. Oliver Carlton sends, also, a soft and silk-like pelt of some small animal unknown to the editor of the Corner. Its fur is very handsome. These friends will please accept thanks for additions to her cabinet. Charles is the lad who recently was the object of Mrs. Delia Gifford's anxiety as to the saving of his soul. That good lady need have no fears for the safety of our Charles. He for whom nature has charms, who learns to read her open book, written millions of years ago, who can trace her handwriting on the rocks and ledges, is far superior to those who see only the myths and fables of two thousand years ago.—Ed. C. C.]

Health and Happiness.

V.—HOW TO EXAMIN A CHILD.

Meconium.—Almost immediately after birth the newly born evacuates the contents of the intestinal canal, a slimy, viscous matter, of a blackish brown color, almost inodorous, and slightly acid, known as meconium. Occasionally this evacuation does not take place for three or four days, in which case the evacuation may be induced by administering a light purgative (as the syrup of chicory). The entire mass thus evacuated amounts to about two or three ounces. During the first two days of its life the infant generally evacuates only meconium; on the third day the matter is mixed with veritable digested food, or, among infants that nurse well, even on the second day. The meconium is expelled at several different times and in unequal quantities; a rapid evacuation is a sign of good alimentation. Among infants badly nourished the elimination is protracted. The stools of an infant at the breast present the characteristic color on the fourth day, and number from two to four in twenty-four hours during the first few days; later from one to two only. Frequent liquid stools, colored green or mixed with gum-mous, cheesy, and fatty drops, are always indicative of bad digestion.

The examination of the infant, in order to be complete, ought to be done at two different times: during sleep and during the waking state, or when it is agitated.

During sleep one can more readily appreciate the physiognomy and the attitude of the child, the color of the skin, the mode and number of respirations, the number and force of the pulse, which may be felt without waking the child. Let the hand glide very cautiously and lightly to the wrist and place the extremity of the index finger on the radial artery, that is, on the thumb side and under surface of the forearm near the bend of the wrist. If the child makes a movement of the arm, follow the movement; it will rest very soon; the sleep is not interrupted, and the pulse can be counted without difficulty (the pulse of a new-born infant is about 120 in one minute, and becomes slower as the child grows older).

When the child is awake study especially the characteristics of the cry, the manner in which the child holds its head; how it swallows; the play of the features, and its manner of behaving in the presence of a strong sunlight, when infants will more readily submit to an examination. At the same time examine the expression round its mouth, the lips, the openings of the nose, and the brow. Then introduce a finger in its mouth; observe if it sucks at once with force, as it will if vigorous and well; at the same time examine the condition of the gums, tongue, and throat. Mothers ought to habituate children to willingly open their mouths for inspection, and they may be readily taught this playfully, so that in case of serious illness the condition of the throat may be ascertained and treatment given, if necessary, without difficulty. To obtain full view of the mouth and pharynx (the space back of the soft palate, the uvula and movable curtains which separate the cavity of the mouth from the pharynx, or the anterior or posterior pillars of the pharynx, between the two which are located the tonsils), introduce the handle of a teaspoon into the mouth, place it on the tongue and press it down, when the entire interior of the throat will be seen.

When the first inspection is terminated, the child should be completely undressed, in order to examine methodically all the functions—in order to ascertain whether the first impressions were correct, and to avoid errors that might be committed in making a diagnosis—successively passing in review the members, the thorax, and the abdomen.

It is comparatively easy to examine the thorax by exploring the chest—that is, listening to sounds, first, by auscultation (listening to the breathing, as the air passes in and out of the lungs, the respiratory murmur); second, by percussion, which is done by placing the left hand on the chest and striking with the right middle finger, hammer fashion, on the fingers of the left hand, producing different kinds of sounds, which may be clear, dull, or tympanitic, etc. So also may the heart's sounds be heard and the normal thereby distinguished from the abnormal rapidity of the heart's action. The exploration of the abdomen is particularly important, the digestion being the capital function in the newly-born and that which perhaps troubles it most easily. One must never neglect to examine the seat from time to time around the orifice, as, if there is indigestion, the fecal matter in a short time produces erythema and excoriations. Look at the tongue, note the odor of the breath, and pay attention to the number, abundance, color, and general nature of the stools.

The examination of the urin may be made in ordinary cases by inspecting the linen of the child. It is easy to detect by the coloration whether it is charged with salt, icteric, or sanguineous. If the urin is to be examined by the doctor, it is better to procure it after an interval of sleep. This enables the physician, in certain cases, to discover a nephritic albumen due to scarlatina, which escapes the attention of the mother.

By applying the nose to the open mouth and smelling the breath, one may easily detect whether the breath is naturally healthy, acid, fecal, or fetid—an excellent method of ascertaining the condition of the stomach, etc. In case of fever, too much reliance may be placed on the pulse; the variations in children are too extensive to explain the intensity of the febrile movement and the progress of the malady. The thermometer, on the contrary, renders in the first infancy greater service than at any other age. In conclusion, we may say that there is no doubt that the most precious element in diagnosing the newly-born is observation of the coloration of the integument (i. e., the skin), the attitude, the physiognomy, and the cry.

NUMEROUS are the people who have "builed better than they knew." A small boy in one of the public schools was asked to define a demigod. "A demigod," he said, "is a vessel that holds wine, gin, whisky, or any other liquor."

"That clock's clean wrong," said a man as he pushed his way into the thick of the enormous crowd that had assembled. "It's a gweed five hours ahint." "Hoot, min!" answered the wag. THERE used to be a young man (we forget his name) from Charlotte, N. C., who occasionally made forays and incursions into this country with a panorama. It consisted of home-made pictorial representations of Daniel in the Lion's Den, the Last Judgment, the Destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, the Interior of the Temple at Jerusalem, and other events and scenes supposed to be historic. They were perpetrated on many yards of cloth and apparently by violent physical exertion, the desperate exercise of a fancy flamed by alcoholic stimulation and entirely reckless expenditure and application of paints of vivid colors and endless varieties. For our part we never blamed the panorama gentleman from Charlotte for representing the Apostle Paul being struck by red lightning while wearing a pink toga and a yellow helmet and riding bare-legged on a piebald horse with short stirrup leathers like a jockey. Neither did we object because the prophet Daniel was placed in orange-colored ulster overcoat among the lions. The purpose was to catch the public eye, and few people among the public could deny the correctness of the costumes or situations, and nobody could prove that St. Paul did not ride a piebald horse on the occasion of his electric admonition to change his course of life. When the canvas is large and the audience distant the paint must be spattered on abundantly and vividly, and the long repressed imagination must have leave to break forth riotously and do some limber and bewildering turns.—Greenville (S. C.) News.

Those acquainted with Department Commander Weissert and Department Chaplain Wharton can best appreciate the following: They are both good talkers, and at soldier gatherings are apt to be called on to make a few remarks. In company with several other Milwaukee comrades, they were invited to attend the anniversary camp-fire at Oconomowoc. While on the cars, the commander took a vacant seat and commenced studying up something for his evening's speech. After a long silence, he suddenly addressed the chaplain: "Say, Wharton, what was the name of the man in the Bible who tied the foxes' tails together?" "Goliath, of course!" "Of course. Yes, yes. I knew it all the time, but I couldn't recall his name," said Weissert, as he fell into another reverie. The hall was packed full with an expectant and eager crowd. In the middle of his speech, and in illustration of some point, Weissert paralyzed his audience by saying: "Everybody knows that Goliath would never have been heard of except for his exploit of tying the foxes' tails together." There was a deathlike silence, a stifled groan from the chaplain, who occupied a seat on the platform, and then the very rafters shook. "Great Scott! Weissert," said Colonel Gray in a stage whisper, "Goliath didn't tie the foxes' tails." "Goliath didn't tie the foxes' tails?" "No, he didn't. Don't make a fool of yourself," responded the colonel. "Well, all I know about it is," said Weissert, as he turned and pointed his finger at the suffering parson, "all I know about it is what the chaplain told me an hour ago. He told me Goliath did tie the foxes' tails, and he was there and saw him do it!"

Gems of Thought.

THE exclusiv pursuit of what are distinguished as pleasures and amusements is disappointing.—Herbert Spencer.

BRUTAL and vulgar minds, when by accident they find themselves on the side of respectability, forego none of the privileges of the position.—W. B. Young.

You must measure the strength of a man by the power of the feelings which he subdues, not by the power of those which subdue him. And hence composure is often the highest result of strength.—Fred. W. Robertson.

"THE essence of knowledge is, having it, to apply it." First to know—first to acquire. Then to dispense—to mix the elements of the social world to new combinations. Absurdly do we play wanton with a precious fact and submit it to ejection from half the proper territory of its inheritance.—Horace L. Traubel.

TOULOUSE was a favored town. It was rich in relics. The people were as ignorant as wooden images, but they had in their possession the dried bodies of seven apostles—the bones of many of the infants slain by Herod—part of a dress of the Virgin Mary, and lots of skulls and skeletons of the infallible idiots known as saints. In this city the people celebrated every year with great joy two holy events: The expulsion of the Huguenots, and the blessed massacre of St. Bartholomew. The citizens of Toulouse had been educated and civilized by the church.—Ingersoll.

THE student of human affairs should be wide visioned and philosophic in preparing himself to give out conclusions as to any age or generation. If he allows himself to be covered up and confused by the intense interests of the present, his judgment will be weak because based upon inadequate data. Just as well go to the business man or the cobbler for profound generalizations and well based reasons, as to him who reads history for pleasure and for mere facts, without the power and habit to detect the relation which events bear to each other, and to the age which gave them, and to humanity out of which the events grew. This inability to interpret human history or comprehend human attributes leads to pessimism or tyroish optimism. He who judges mankind and reaches conclusions as to its destiny, by reason of his own experiences or the experiences of his community, or even those of his nation, over a short period of time, is sure to fail.—Progressiv Age.

THE time will come, and that soon, when sound historians will adopt as their guide the principles and methods of ethnologic science, because by these alone can they assign to the isolated fact its right place in the vast structure of human development. In the past, histories have told of but little but of kings and their wars; some writers of recent date have remembered that there is such a thing as the People, and essayed to present its humblest annals; but how few have even attempted to avail themselves of the myriad side-lights which ethnology can throw on the motives and manners of a people, its impulses and acquisitions! It is the constant aim of ethnology to present its results free from bias. It deprecates alike enthusiasm and antipathy. Its mission is "to define the universal in humanity," as distinguished from all those traits which are the products of fluctuating environments. This universal, however, is to be discovered, not assumed. Take, for instance, the doctrine of evolution as applied to man. It is not only a doctrine but a dogma with many scientists. They look with theological ire on any one who questions it. I have already said that in the long run and the general average it has been true of man. But that we have any certainty that it will continue true is a mistake; or that it has been true of the vast majority of individuals or of ethnic groups is another mistake. As the basis for a boastful and confident optimism it is as shaky as sand. Taken at its real value, as the provisional and partial result of our observations, it is a useful guide; but swallowed with unquestioning faith, as a final law of the universe, it is not a whit more inspiring than the narrowest dogma of religious bigotry. Ignorant of his past, ignorant of his real needs, ignorant of himself, man has blundered and stumbled up the thorny path of progress for tens of thousands of years. Mighty states, millions of individuals, have been hurled to destruction in the perilous ascent, mistaking the way, pursuing false paths, following blind guides. Now anthropology steps in, the new Science of Man, offering the knowledge of what he has been and is, the young but wise teacher, revealing the future by the unwavering light of the past, offering itself as man's trusty mentor and friend, ready to conduct him by sure steps upward and onward to the highest summit which his nature is capable of attaining; and who dares set a limit to that?—Prof. D. G. Brinton.

- 16 represent Uncle Sam and the Priests, The Church Robbing the People, Thanksgiving, Sabbath Laws, Children and the Church, Woman and the Church, The Church and Thomas Paine, Studies in Natural History, The Bible and Science, The Clergy and Their Flocks, Piety in Our Penitentiaries, The Atonement Scheme, The Lord and His Works, Prayer, The Creeds, Christians and Mohammedans.

- 8 represent Samples of Christianity's Work. Missionaries, The Lord's Instruments, Bible Doctrines and Their Results, The Church and Slavery, Priests and Politics, Ireland and the Church, Church's Idea of Civilization, The Uses of the Cross, Unkind Reflections on the Church, Persecutions of the Church, Some Allegories, Heaven, Hell, Miscellaneous.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings, that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

SENATOR DAVID B. HILL's lecture course in the Northwest has proved a financial failure and he has abandoned the tour after delivering four lectures.

ARTHUR STADTHAGEN, a Socialist member of the Reichstag, convicted of libeling the Prussian ministers and police, has been sentenced to a year's imprisonment.

BISHOP A. W. WAYMAN of the A. M. E. church died at Baltimore on Nov. 30th. His diocese included Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, and Wisconsin. He was 74 years of age.

A SEVERE storm swept over a part of the North on Nov. 25th, particularly the lake region. Chicago streets were blocked with snow, and many wrecks are reported on the lakes.

ON Sunday, Dec. 1st, the Sunday law was more rigidly enforced than ever in New York city. Flower sellers, egg dealers, and other red-handed criminals were rushed in by the police.

UNDER a new law of Minnesota townships can secede from one county and join another. Objecting to a bond issue, seventeen townships of Cass county have just gone over to Crow Wing county.

A REAL "dispensation" has happened at Fairmont, Tenn. Rev. D. F. Levy has just died there of blood-poisoning caused by running a splinter into his knee when he threw himself violently on to his knees to pray.

ON Nov. 29th at the Tilly Foster iron mines near Carmel, N. Y., earth and rock caved in at the mouth of the inclined shaft and rushing 300 feet to the bottom, killed probably a dozen workmen and mangled several others.

ARTHUR ARNOULD, of France, died in Paris on Nov. 25th. He was the author of a history of the Inquisition and other books. During the Revolution of '71 he was a leader of the Commune and was elected to the National Assembly.

It has at last been decided by the courts that the Negroes, formerly slaves, of the Cherokee country, are entitled to a portion of the money paid the Cherokee nation for the Cherokee Strip. The Negroes will get about $1,300,000, and their proper interest in the unsold lands.

REV. J. T. M. JOHNSTON, D.D., pastor of the First Baptist church of Jefferson City, Mo., declared in a sermon on Nov. 24th that United States Minister Terrell in Turkey ought to be hanged for not protecting, as he alleged, American missionaries against the Mohammedans.

AN explosion in a cartridge factory at Palma, Island of Majorca (belonging to Spain), resulted in the death of seventy persons, whose bodies have been found, and the probable fatal injury of more than twenty others. It is said that the explosion was caused by a workman who had been dismissed.

MORE victories for the Cubans, via Cuban channels of information; more burning of sugar plantations by the insurgents, and more denials by the Spaniards of the asserted Cuban triumphs. It seems certain, however, that several expeditions have recently landed men, arms, and ammunition for the revolutionists.

IN Cleveland on Thanksgiving Day the Christian Endeavorers and Epworth Leaguers prayed for the conversion of Colonel Ingersoll. The incantation was participated in by several thousand persons and was performed in private. At the Salvation Army meeting and in some of the churches there were public magic rites of the same class.

THE CARPENTER'S SON MEETETH CHUMS FROM A FOREIGN PORT.

And after six days Jesus taketh Peter, James, and John his brother, and bringeth them up into an high mountain apart. And was transfigured before them; and his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light. And, behold, there appeared unto them Moses and Elias talking with him.—Mat. xvii, 1, 2, 3.

Two Liberals are among the winners of the literary prizes offered by the New York Herald, each the first in his class. Julian Hawthorne gets the prize of $10,000 for the best novel, the work being entitled "Between Two Fires." Edgar Fawcett secures the $2,000 prize for a short story, entitled, "A Romance of Old New York."

THE Parliament of the Dominion of Canada will meet in its sixth session on Jan. 2d. The Manitoba school question will be the subject considered. It seems very probable that if Parliament passes a remedial order for the restoration of Catholic schools in Manitoba, in accordance with the decision of the English Privy Council, Manitoba will secede from the Dominion, which means the establishment of an independent crown colony.

IN the Republican House caucus in Washington on the night of Nov. 30th the only exciting contest was over the chaplaincy, for which eight ministers engaged in a hot and undignified scramble. Sunday was "desecrated," the fight lasting until past midnight and the selection taking place in the "holy [dis] quiet of the Sabbath morn." Rev. H. U. Coudon, of Michigan, won the $900 prize, with Rev. H. D. Fisher, of Kansas, a close second.

ON Nov. 29th the police of Berlin summarily closed eleven Socialist clubs. Editor Foerster has been sent to prison for three months for permitting a certain article to appear in the Ethische-Kultur. Dr. Charles Parkhurst says that New York newspapers that opposed the Sunday crusade would in Berlin have been confiscated, machinery and all, and their managers put on bread-and-water diet, thus intimating that they would have been served right.

THE Pennsylvania miracle-liar is again sending his stories to the papers. His latest is of a girl near Wilkesbarre. Seven years ago a playmate thrust a finger in her left eye, blinding it, and the right soon lost its sight also. Four years ago she heard a sermon in which it was declared that God would do anything for those who had faith in him. She acted on the priest's advice and has been praying ever since for the restoration of her sight. Now she is gradually recovering the power to see. The miracle is that anyone can believe this to be a miracle.

OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, the radical Unitarian clergyman, died in Boston on Nov. 27th. He was born in that city in 1822. First an anti-slavery advocate, he in 1867 became the first president of the Free Religious Association. He next became a transcendentalist and a disciple of Mill and Spencer. In 1879 he severed all his church connections and thereafter reckoned himself among the Agnostics. During his later years he devoted his energies entirely to literature.

NOVEMBER 29th there died in Ellischan, Bohemia, Count Edward Francis Joseph Taaffe, for fourteen years prime minister of Austria. He was born in Prague, in Bohemia, 62 years ago, of noble Austrian parents, but was descended from an ancient Irish family, and held the title of Viscount of Corren and Baron of Ballymote, Sligo, in the Irish peerage. In the park of his home in Ellischan he had erected a massive vine-covered ruin, a perfect reproduction of his ancestral castle of Ballymote.

ALEXANDRE DUMAS III. died in Paris on Nov. 27th. His grandfather, the founder of the family, was the son of a Marquis de la Paillette and a Negro woman, a slave, whom he had made his mistress in San Domingo when he was its governor. Alexandre I. owed more to his mother than to his father, for she belonged to that race that enjoys the distinction of being the only race of any color that ever freed itself from slavery without assistance. Dumas III. is the last of the name. All three of the Dumas achieved success in the battle of life.

NEW BOOKS

ROBT G. INGERSOLL

The Field-Ingersoll Discussion. Price, paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

In 1888 the Rev. Dr. Henry M. Field wrote an open letter to Colonel Ingersoll, with the intent to convert him. The letter was published in the North American Review, and was replied to by the person addressed. All our older readers know the value of this discussion. To those who do not remember it we can only say that they should lose no time in procuring a copy if they want a controversial treat.

The Ingersoll-Gladstone Controversy about Christianity. Price, paper, 25 cts; cloth, 50 cts.

When the Field-Ingersoll Controversy closed in the North American Review the Christians felt that their champion had been very badly worsted in argument, and the publishers of the Review engaged the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone to attempt to rehabilitate the Presbyterian creed. He wrote a long letter to Colonel Ingersoll, to which the latter replied at length and, it is generally agreed, completely demolished the greatest controversialist Christianity can produce. These letters are now for the first time available in pamphlet form.

Myth and Miracle. Price, 25c.

This is one of Colonel Ingersoll's best lectures, but never before put into print. Everyone who has heard it will most certainly want it, and those who have not heard it will have a rare treat in its perusal, as something new from the Colonel, which also is something that everybody is looking for.

Which Way? Price, 25 cents.

This lecture is a consideration of the difference between the natural and the supernatural, and some reasons why the former is the best way to go. Perhaps no one of Colonel Ingersoll's orations has won more general applause from enlightened audiences than this. It contains that most magnificent of perorations, his visions—"This was. This is. This shall be." The lecture was never before printed in pamphlet form. It is splendid. Send for it.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, ; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

SPECIMEN PRESS NOTICES.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

Send us a new subscriber and get the book free of all expense to you. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us $3 and get the book and the paper for one year.

PIANOS, PIANOS!

$225; - $250; - $275.

After years of earnest study and experiments, Mr. Adam Schaaf, of Chicago, one of the oldest and most experienced piano manufacturers of this country, has produced what is believed to be the most perfect Upright Piano ever constructed. The instrument is thus described:

"The volume of tone is fully equal to any of the best Square Grand Pianos, while the quality is of the most exquisite musical character—pure, sympathetic, and in the highest degree pliable. Its durability and its capacity for standing in tune, is unparalleled in the history of piano-making. In a word, this piano is made to stand, not merely as an ornamental piece of furniture (it is finished in the most artistic and handsome style), but as a musical instrument—not for a day, but for a lifetime."

These pianos received the highest honors at the World's Fair; Mr. GEORGE STECK, Judge of Awards, the best living authority on pianos, reporting as follows:

"This exhibit deserves an award for excellent tone quality, sustaining power, well planned scale, and excellent action, with easy, prompt touch. Material and workmanship are superior."

The distinguished Pianist and Composer, SIGNOR FABIANI, of the Paris Conservatory, says:

"I have used the Adam Schaaf Pianos, and have critically studied their merits, compared them with those of the best American and European makers, and I find them unsurpassed for quality and variety of tone, responsiveness of touch, elegance of appearance, and reliability in every way."

Having made special arrangements with the manufacturer, who is our personal friend, to introduce these superb pianos, we are prepared to offer them to TRUTH SEEKER readers at the above marvelously low prices—from $50 to $150 less than dealers ask for inferior instruments. Every piano is warranted for five years, and the purchaser is not required to pay for it until delivered. We will pay the freight to any station within 1,000 miles of Chicago. Full description of instruments sent on application.

If you or any of your friends contemplate buying a piano it will be to your interest to correspond with us.

Some Funny Utterances in a Sermon.

Rev. Dr. David James Burrell, of the Marble Collegiate church of this city, said in a sermon the other day, referring to the laboring man, that he "is coming to his own—coming to that standard the pattern for which was set by the carpenter of Galilee." That is rich, surely. Consulting the alleged record, we find that "the carpenter of Galilee" told servants to obey their masters, and yet Rev. Mr. Burrell praises the results of strikes! The servants of whom Jesus spoke were slaves, and yet they were told to obey. The carpenter did not utter one word in condemnation of slavery. As to the pay of free workmen, he held that the man who labored three times as long as another was entitled to no greater wages than the other. Mr. Burrell, the modern laboring man demands not merely equal but increased pay when he works over-hours. The pattern for the standard of the present-day workingman was not "set by the carpenter of Galilee."

"In the social world we see a convention of women. That means the coming of the new woman—not the women who are loudly agitating, who want a woman's Bible, who are its authors, and who attack the preachers of the word of God. They are the same old women. But there is a new woman who glorifies her sex in the name of sister, mother, wife, and who finds her coign of vantage in the home and in the many fields of women's industry. This new woman is a combination of Ruth and Esther, with all womanly kindness and charity of Christ."

Perhaps Dr. Burrell is not aware that the new woman who wants "a woman's Bible" is the same woman who pioneered the way in "the many fields of women's industry." Then it is all very well for Dr. Burrell to praise Ruth, and there is no stain upon her name, but it is very much to be doubted that he would be as lenient of the same conduct in one of the "new" women as he is of the conduct of Ruth, who kept the customs of her mother-in-law's people. As for Esther, she took the place of the queen, who herself had too much self-respect to be made a display of for the entertainment of the king's drunken court and later Esther received from the compliant monarch an order for the hanging of the already murdered ten sons of an old enemy of her race. So vindictive was she that she could thus take vengeance on the mangled bodies of men who had done her no injury! Is this the best selection that Mr. Burrell could make from the heroines of the Bible to set off against the ungodly new women who are trying to make that Bible express a little respect for their sex?

Regarding the "charity of Christ," it may be necessary to say that it was not displayed to any great extent in his fierce denunciations of those who did not agree with him. We are perfectly willing that Dr. Burrell should say, in answer to this, that the Bible misrepresents Jesus. Only by discrediting the Infallible Oracle can he remove the blemishes from his Christ.

"To win," says the preacher, "reformers must have political charity and forbearance." But how can political or any other kind of charity and forbearance be manifested by "reformers" whose only conception of "reform" is bayonet rule? "In the state election we achieved victory for the American Sabbath and temperance reform." Where is the forbearance in forcing the minority to observe the Sabbath of the dominant power?

"There has come an end to destructive criticism, and the credit of the Bible is more firmly established. That old book has come to stay until God's people hear his words from his own lips."

This will certainly be news to the hundreds of writers whose very recent criticisms of the Bible have been so destructive; it will be news to the publishers who are putting them upon the market, and to the reviewers who are trying to find in them some comfort for orthodoxy. In view of the fact that the vast majority of educated men and women believe either that the Bible is a purely human production or that at least many parts of it are interpolations and corruptions, while in past ages all Christendom held it to be the very word of God, inspired and inerrant—in view of this fact, we say, it takes considerable assurance to assert that the credit of the Bible, manifestly as the revelation of God, is more firmly established than it was before the work of criticism began. That seems to us very much like whistling when one's courage is at zero.

Still Evading the Issue of Religious Liberty.

The National Reform Association demands the adoption of a Christian amendment to the Constitution, and such other changes in that charter and in the laws as will recognize the Christian's god, Christ, and the Bible, as supreme in the government. It wishes to thus shut Freethinkers out of all positions of public trust, if not to disfranchise them, to make and enforce blasphemy laws, establish a stronger press censorship, support religion by direct appropriations as now by the exemption of church property from taxation, compel all to observe the first day of the week as a Sabbath, maintain religious instruction in the public schools, and force upon all "Christ's law of divorce" and other canons of what it is pleased to call "Christian morality." It has been and is the work of THE TRUTH SEEKER to enlighten the people regarding the proximate and ultimate designs of these theocrats, to show what is the logical outcome, in persecution, of the principles they hold, and to urge all lovers of equal liberty to resist the encroachments of the foes of the civil republic. To this end THE TRUTH SEEKER has used argument and satire, expressed by means of letter-press and cartoons. It has consistently and persistently frowned upon all suggestions of retaliation in kind; its demand has been that the Constitution remain as it is, guaranteeing the rights alike of Christian, Jew, Infidel, and pagan. It has opposed and opposes all forms of proscription for opinion's sake; it antagonizes a press censorship of any kind, and in all other ways it has stood unflinchingly for the equal rights of citizens of all schools of thought. The theocratic papers have been utterly unable to find a flaw in the editorials of THE TRUTH SEEKER, so far as the principle of equal religious freedom is concerned. Neither have they attempted, except in a perfunctory, faint-hearted way, to dispose of the facts we have marshaled and the arguments we have presented. Clearly, they have recognized the futility of any such effort. They have repeatedly charged us with "persecuting intolerance" but they have never dared to attempt to make good their charges by the citation of our own words. How, then, it may be asked, do they try to support their accusations? Well, they turn their imaginations loose on Mr. Heston's cartoons; it is comparatively easy to prove anything by a cartoon—particularly if the editor's readers do not see it, as in this instance—and the Christian Reformer seems to have early realized this, for it has on previous occasions, as our subscribers know, asserted that THE TRUTH SEEKER's pictures evidenced the possession by us of a vindictive desire to persecute the lamb-like Covenanters and other advocates of persecution. In its issue of November 16th the theocratic organ makes charges in connection with our first page cartoon in the number for November 2d similar to those it had made against the John Calvin cartoon of an earlier date, and which we disposed of last week. It says:

"There is a cartoon representing the members of the National Reform Association as murderers, quoting in part a sentence from the Christian Reformer to the effect that when Christians have the power they have the right to acknowledge God and to enforce his law against immorality. We charge THE TRUTH SEEKER with slander and the spirit of persecuting intolerance. It is either this or something else as bad or worse. Accusations against us of crimes equivalent to murder are frequent in its columns. Does the editor of that paper believe in capital punishment for murder in the first degree? If so, he believes that we should be put to death, for that is the crime with which he charges us. Does he believe in imprisonment for life for such a crime? Then that is the punishment he would mete out to us. Would he let us off with less punishment, or none at all? Then he either believes that such criminals as murderers should not be punished, or else he does not believe his own charges against us. He may take whichever horn of the dilemma he pleases. If he believes his charge of murderous spirit made against us, and would invoke the penalty of the law against us, our statement that he is of an intolerant and persecuting spirit is true. If he believes the charge and would not so punish, he takes a position that would break down all civil government by letting criminals of all kinds escape. If he would let us escape because we are guilty of no such crime as he charges, he is guilty of the basest kind of slander. We insist, therefore, that until this matter is cleared up we are justifiable in making the charge of persecuting intolerance against THE TRUTH SEEKER."

Let us see about this terrible cartoon. On one side, in the foreground, stands a figure dressed in Puritan garb, wrapped in the cloak of religion, wearing the label "Christian Reformer"; the hands are outspread piously and the eyes turned heavenward as in prayer; from beneath the lower garment slightly protrude a pair of cloven hoofs; in the background appear the gable and steeple of a church. On the other side in the foreground stands the same figure, stripped of his disguise of gown and cloak and hat and mask, and revealed as the devil of theocratic treason. He is trampling upon the Constitution of the United States; in his right hand he grasps the blood-dripping sword of Christ; in his left he holds an unfolded scroll upon which are written these sentences from the Christian Reformer of July 27, 1895: "The government will be transformed so as to harmonize with Christian principles. Nor do the people need to wait until all are converted before this is done. Where Christians have the power they have the right to do it." Above the scroll, upon a wall, are seen quotations from Washington, Franklin, Grant, and Garfield, all expressiv of the principles of separation of religion and the state. Behind the devil of theocracy there lies upon the ground the skull of murdered Liberty. In the background there is a crowd over which floats the banner of the Society of Christian Endeavor. This crowd is gathered about a stake to which an Infidel is chained, and the fagots at his feet have just been ignited.

Now is this picture a libel upon the theocrats? It has its sanction in the quotation from the Christian Reformer to the effect that the Christian majority has a right to transform our civil government, equally protectiv of the rights of Christian and Infidel, into a government which will recognize and enforce Christian principles, logically and avowedly at the expense of those who do not accept the said Christian principles, thus destroying the equality before the law of Christian and Infidel. There is no question about this; it is the ten thousand-times admitted and boasted purpose of the theocrats. The devil of theocracy stands upon the overthrown civil Constitution. So the theocrats admit it is their intention to stand, and they are at present arguing and working for the amendment that would accomplish this result if adopted. The symbolical representativ of theocracy grasps the Sword of Christ; so would the priest of theocracy wield the sword of King Jesus, either himself or by proxy. Liberty has been slaughtered. With the theocratic program realized in practice, how much life would there be left in liberty in these United States? The Infidel is being burned at the stake. In the ages that are past, neither Catholic nor Protestant has hesitated to thus destroy the "enemies of Christ." Would they hesitate now? In portions of this country Christian mobs have this year burned at the stake, with the refinements of torture, fellow Christians who have committed crimes against individuals.

But the Christian points to his Bible and declares that there is a crime worse than outrage or murder, and that this crime that can never be forgiven is blasphemy against the Holy Ghost. If mere murder may be forgiven upon profession of belief, if repentance will erase every debit mark against man except that made by blasphemy, does it not logically follow that the Christian will more cruelly punish blasphemy against the Holy Ghost than he will any crime committed against man or woman? The Christian of the past did this; with him, as with the God of the Bible, blasphemy was the most heinous of offenses, and he ruthlessly murdered millions in obedience to the commands of his theological conscience. Would the theocrat of to-day do differently if he had the power and could not suppress Infidelity by milder punishment? Have not the Christian Reformer and its allies in the theocratic press repeatedly declared that the Editor of this journal is guilty of the crime of blasphemy and that the paper should be suppressed because of this? And if, as the Bible says—if, as the Christians of the ages gone have solemnly affirmed—blasphemy is the one crime that God will never pardon, and if, again—as the National Reformers so positively claim—it is the province of civil government to enforce on earth God's law, including the decree against blasphemy, what is to be done with us when the theocrats get all the power they are now after?

Suppose that we continue to "blaspheme"; will we be let alone if simple fines and short terms of imprisonment do not avail to stop our presses? Has it not always been the case that suppressiv laws have grown more and more severe and their enforcement more remorseless and cruel until the opposition was crushed out or successful rebellion broke the power of the tyrant? If THE TRUTH SEEKER should survive fines and imprisonment and confiscation; if, driven into subterfuges, it should appear under another name or be printed on concealed machinery and be distributed in the night, as has been done before and is done in Russia now, where would the theocrats stop in devising adequate deterrents? Suppose that lengthening terms of imprisonment did not prevent the continued publication of blasphemous literature, would they confess themselves beaten so long as they possessed political authority to suppress blasphemy? If death by hanging or electrocution did not accomplish the results desired would they shrink from adding the rack, the thumb-screw, and the stake to their list of reformatory agencies? There is nothing in the history of the church to justify the supposition that they would voluntarily pause in their crusade in the name of God. In the light of the indisputable and generally undisputed facts cited, it is certain that Mr. Heston's cartoon is not a libel on the National Reform Association. Now we ask the Christian Reformer to explicitly say what it would do with "blasphemers" in the contingency presented.

The absurd questions asked by the Covenanter paper can be answered in a very few sentences. In common with other Freethinkers, we believe that a free press and free mails are equally important with free speech. We believe that progress is dependent upon freedom of investigation and expression. We are opposed to all theories of constructiv treason or constructiv invasion of the individual. To constitute a crime there must be the overt act. Forgery, libel, and slander are such overt acts, as are theft, arson, rape, murder, and torture. But the advocacy even of Sunday laws, blasphemy statutes, and all the rest of the vicious legislation proposed by the theocrats, is not an overt act. It is merely the expression of opinion, of ill-founded, bigoted opinion, we are bound to believe, but it is never safe to forbid by law the expression of even ill-founded and bigoted opinion. Truth always in the end if not at once suffers more than does error by such interference. The schemes advocated by the National Reformers are criminal, when measured by the effects that would follow their inauguration, but the doer, not the theorizer, is to the one to be restrained or punished. Not the editor who argues that the blasphemer should be imprisoned but the man who imprisons him is the criminal in fact. Only the free passage of the currents of controversy can make a healthful atmosphere. But when the bigot advances from words to deeds he has passed from the arena of reason to that of brute force and must take the consequences of his acts if he meets with resistance.

If the enactment and enforcement of blasphemy laws resulted in the killing of "blasphemers," the men who voted for the law and those who enforced it would morally be guilty of murder, and only their possession of the machinery of the government, or the forbearance of the friends of the victims in case these should come into power, would save the persecutors from prosecution and punishment.

The Christian Reformer will see that we have not taken either horn of the dilemma that it presented. We have demonstrated that the teachings of the theocrats would logically result in the very crimes that Mr. Heston depicted, and so have proved that they are not libeled by the cartoon. We have shown—that they should have known before—that the Freethinker would not punish for the expression of opinion, no matter how ridiculous, ignorant, or intolerant that opinion may be, and we have also made it clear that when Dr. McAllister and his co-workers pass from theory to practice they will find us ready to resist their acts of invasion, if we deem such resistance expedient.

An Elusiv Canadian Christian.

Week before last we printed here two letters, one written by the editor of the Epworth League paper, Onward, of Toronto, and the other by the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Below will be found the rejoinder of Mr. Withrow to the last mentioned communication:

"TORONTO, CAN., NOV. 26, 1895.

"E. M. MACDONALD, Esq., 28 Lafayette Place, New York, N. Y., Dear Sir: On my return from Atlanta I found two or three copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER with a mass of other mail matter. I read your criticism, but did not see the reprint of my article. But even if I had I would still deny your right to have whatever you choose printed in the paper which I edit. That paper was established for the special purpose of promoting a belief in the Bible, which it is your purpose to destroy. I decline to make that paper the vehicle for promulgating doctrines which I believe to be subversiv of morality and religion, of good citizenship, of law and order. I remain,

"Yours very truly, W. H. WITHROW."

We confess that we are unable to understand why Mr. Withrow did not see the reprint of his article, when, as we before stated, it was distinctly said in the criticism which he says he did read, just where the reprint would be found, and it was there, only two pages further on, under the heading he himself had given it.

We cheerfully admit that Mr. Withrow is the sole judge of what shall go into his own paper, and we are not trying to prove that we have a right to have what we choose printed in Onward. But nevertheless we must insist that if the editor of that paper wished to "tote fair," and if he was not afraid to have his readers see our simple statement of fact, he would print our letter in reply to his own. The matter which he refused to print did not embody doctrines "subversiv of morality and religion, of good citizenship, of law and order," even from his point of view, unless he deems a refutation of his false assertions subversiv of all these things; which, of course, it is quite possible he does, for it is not difficult to think that he, as a devout believer in the Bible, imagines that it is incumbent upon him to imitate the example of Yahveh, although putting the "lying spirit" into his own mouth instead of that of the prophet of his enemies.

Have you ordered your holiday books? If not, see the list offered on page 797.

"Ingersoll's latest is the same old hash in a new dish." Catholic Union and Times.

Father Cronin's latest is the same old hash in the same old cracked, crime-discolored dish of the church.

The press dispatches say that Mrs. Henrietta Pierce, of Wheeling, W. Va., died of starvation on Thanksgiving Day. Examination revealed that she had eaten nothing for days. She was a comparative stranger in the city and was unable to find work. But while her neighbors did not know of her condition God did—or Theism is false—and so he is responsible for her pitiable death on our official thank day.

In Texas they burn criminals to death at slow fires and hold that Sunday recreation is a crime. Cruelty and superstition are inextricably interwoven. A double scull championship match was arranged to come off on the lake at Austin on November 10th. Mayor McDonald positively forbade the race, and all because November 10th happened to be Sunday. Whatever the pretext may be upon which this meddling and intolerable action was taken, the real cause of the order, as of the law or ordinance appealed to authorize it, is the fear—well-grounded, no doubt—that to permit other attractions to compete with the churches on Sunday would greatly deplete their congregations. But what right have legislativ and executiv officers to prevent fair competition?

A correspondent suggests that if Colonel Ingersoll had been stricken with paralysis and had then, in this weakened condition, gone into the church, and this just at the time the Christian Endeavorers were praying for his conversion, it would not have proved anything beyond his own personality. Necessarily not, but the people who prayed and their fellow Christians would have insisted that it did prove something else. As a rule, they "convert" heretics and Infidels only when they are suffering with weakened bodies and brains. And, singularly enough, they think that the few moments or hours that the dying man spends in this world after he has been "converted" completely neutralizes the testimony that he gave for Free-thought during the years of his physical and intellectual health. They are the only people we know who think that the beliefs of a diseased brain are of more importance than the opinions of a brain in health. That impression is one of the real "mysteries" of Christianity.

Belief in a god is the greatest of brain-turners. The conception of an absolute personality that interferes in the affairs of men in answer to prayer leads logically to the idea of sacrifice, which, of course, is merely a kind of bribery. God-intoxication may be very mild or very severe, or it may stop at any of the intermediate degrees, but as soon as it has reached a certain stage the victim is liable at any moment to bid farewell to all normal restraints and become a raving maniac. Where the god notion has taken a strong hold on the mind, insanity most often assumes the form of religious homicidal mania. Then you hear of the Abrahams, the Freemans, and the rest of the child-sacrificers. Thus, only a short ago Mrs. Elias Gilder, of Allentown, Pa., killed her babe to placate her angry divinity. After hacking the child's ankles with a butcher-knife and badly beating its body, she completed the work of sacrifice by smothering it. The studious observer will note, in this connection, that the deity to whom the offering was made is the local one—the deity indigenous to or adopted long ago by the people to whom the god-demented woman belongs. This illustrates again the purely human origin of all god-concepts and the non-supernatural development of religions.

The rejection of the dogma of an eternal hell does not necessarily prove that the rejector is a Liberal or that in practice he would be less intolerant than his more orthodox brethren. Dr. A. A. Miner's affiliation with the God-in-the-Constitution party is a case in point. And the other day the New York State Universalist Convention in session at Troy adopted a resolution indorsing the Sunday closing crusade in this city. The Universalist organs repudiate the principle of evolution, and that church is itself a striking example of involution. It long since ceased to grow, and Universalists appear to think that it is necessary for them to be ultra conservativ in order to retain their standing as Christians. Their main body was long since passed by the advance guard of the old "hell fire" denominations, which, when Universalism was a living power, were out of sight in the rear of the small but aggressiv party of earnest reformers led by Murray, Ballou, and their successors.

Another religious murderer was executed the other day. He was Charles N. Smith, of Illinois. He killed his child and sister-in-law. According to his confession, he intended to kill his whole family, but not the sister-in-law. He said that he regretted her death. He was at one time a professional base-ball player. Then his thoughts turned to religion, and his investigations led him to conclude that the Catholic religion was the true religion. It should be noted in passing that it was only after he thought seriously on religious matters that he became a criminal. In his confession occurs this passage:

"At last, by an unseen hand, I was lifted high enough to be able to see that there was no hope of re-uniting with my family here upon earth, and the world having no pleasure for me, I calmly and deliberately, with a rational mind, decided that if I could not live with them, I would be united with them in heaven, and took that means of accomplishing my desire. . . . I did it under the belief that God, knowing the injustice under which I was suffering, would judge me leniently and justly."

The foregoing is from the Quincy (Ill.) Herald of Nov. 22d, 1895. It is clear that the unfortunate man's mind was unbalanced, although his reasoning was orthodox. There is no contradiction in these two statements. He argued to himself that he would have time to repent and prepare for heaven, as he did. He died on the gallows in the odor of sanctity. Smith says that he committed the crime believing that his God, knowing the injustice under which he was suffering, would judge him mercifully and justly. It appears not to have occurred to him that if God had wished to treat him fairly he would have prevented the injustice which, unprevented, led to the double crime. Besides, where were the mercy and justice of God when he permitted—nay, ordered, from the beginningless beginning—the killing by Smith of the unoffending child and girl? Smith cannot now consider these questions, but there are in the United States about 120,000 ministers and religious editors who have no business to pretend to interpret "the will of God" while they are unable to solve these problems acceptably to all thinking and humane men and women.

To the Friends of the "Ironclad Age."

You are herewith introduced to THE TRUTH SEEKER. While a few, perhaps many of you, have in the past taken both papers, many more have not. It is therefore incumbent upon us to explain to you the cause of this introduction, and at the same time bid you a sad if not a last farewell. Whatever prestige the Ironclad Age had came through the peculiar individualities of its founder, J. R. Monroe, M.D., and his successor, Mrs. Power. For many years before the demise of Dr. Monroe it was his well-known wish that the paper should be perpetuated and that his son, V. H. Monroe, M.D., should occupy the editorial tripod. The son felt that he could not sacrifice a large practice (which his sire had done before him) to give the paper the attention required. It then devolved upon his daughter, Lulie Monroe Power, to take up the work of her lamented father. This she did, and bravely carried it forward, laying it aside only when life ceased. For the sake of the well-known wishes of both Mrs. Power and her father, and for the cause of Freethought—which has all too few champions—we endeavored to form some alliance by which the paper could be continued. The paper without an editor was a ship in mid-ocean without a rudder. Failing in this, together with the accumulation of debt and discouragement, the estate was forced into the hands of an administrator. This made it necessary to sell the plant, which was done at a sacrifice.

It also became our duty to fulfil our obligations to subscribers who had paid in advance. This labor of love THE TRUTH SEEKER has undertaken to do for us; we have placed in its hands the subscription list, and hope we can assure it of the good will of the friends of Mrs. Power and ourselves. THE TRUTH SEEKER will now take the place of the Ironclad Age in making weekly visits to both those who have paid in advance and those who have not; for as we expected the latter to renew for the Ironclad, so shall we still hope that they will renew by sending the amount of their arrearages to THE TRUTH SEEKER, with as much in advance as they conveniently can. We feel sure that this arrangement will please the friends of the Ironclad better than any other we could make except to continue. We have also transferred to the Truth Seeker Company all the books, copyrights, good will, etc., of the former publishing business of the Ironclad Age, and those desiring these books will find them at the Truth Seeker Office. We know from many years' dealing with them that our successors will do everything they can to continue the pleasant relations which have existed between the Ironclad and its subscribers and friends, who will find prompt and generous people to deal with, and we solicit our friends to send them as prompt and generous orders. Speaking for the late Mrs. Power and ourselves, we ask every subscriber to renew his Ironclad subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER at once. You will find the paper different in many respects from the old Ironclad, though nearer than any other and equally determined in its advocacy of liberty and Freethought principles. As there is now one less Freethought journal claiming your loyalty and support, let our friends be as determined that others shall continue to exist.

As it may be of interest to our friends to know the destiny of the Ironclad Age equipment, we will say that it was sold to a Christian syndicate, they being the highest bidders, and what was for forty years known as the "Den" is now the rendezvous of a score or more of D.D.s. They had no trouble to sell $50,000 stock for cash, and hereafter the Ironclad equipment will grind out thousands of copies weekly of the superstition-breeding Westminster Endeavorers.

Thanking our friends for many past favors, and trusting the new acquaintance will prove mutually agreeable, we are, fraternally,

R. H. POWER AND DAUGHTER PEARL.

The foregoing leaves little for us to add, as it explains the whole reason why the subscribers to the late Ironclad Age are now receiving THE TRUTH SEEKER.

It is a matter for deep regret that the Age did not receive sufficient support to warrant its continuance; for, as Mr. Power says, Freethought has all too few champions. We have known, read, and admired the Age for a great many years. We hope that its former readers will now admire and read THE TRUTH SEEKER for as many more. We shall certainly do our part to make the acquaintance pleasant and to build up an abiding friendship between them and ourselves.

We have assumed the obligation to send THE TRUTH SEEKER to those who have paid in advance for the Age. This will cost us a good deal. There is one of our new friends paid to 1910. We are glad to know so generous a friend, and shall take great pleasure in honoring the obligation we have assumed. On the other hand, the accounts due the Age for subscriptions have been transferred to us. We hope these will be promptly paid, so that the two accounts may balance. And we ask these friends also to renew their subscriptions as soon as they have read a few numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER and become satisfied that it is what they want, which we think will not take them long to do, for our artist and contributors make the paper one of the most interesting publications to be found in this country, for all whose minds are free from superstition. Those whose subscriptions to the Age were paid in advance will get THE TRUTH SEEKER for the same length of time they would have received the Age, though the price of THE TRUTH SEEKER is a little higher, as the paper is larger, and in exchange for this courtesy we hope they will promptly renew when that time is reached.

With these few words of explanation, we submit our paper to the kind consideration of our new friends, hoping that the acquaintance may be as long as we feel sure it will be agreeable.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Mr. Samuel P. Putnam spoke on "Freethought in England" before the Manhattan Liberal Club last Friday evening. The lecture is deep and thoughtful, and as an outline of the evolution of rationalism in Great Britain it is thoroughly instructive. Mr. Putnam leaves New York for the West this week.

"An earthquake in Constantinople just now, if it were severe enough, would clear the political atmosphere for the time being, calling the truce of God among the infuriate factions and enforcing it at least upon such as were buried in its ruins. There has been enough scattered seismic agitation in the vicinity during the last year to lay in the dust the dome of Sophia and the crescents of Dolma Bagche and the Yildiz Kiosk and all its other temples and palaces if it had been concentrated upon them. Relief from critical social and political conditions is not always to be expected from an opportune cataclysm, but the thing might happen, and if Constantinople were to drop out of sight beneath the waters of the Bosphorus, as Lisbon once did beneath the Tagus, it would extinguish a lot of political jealousies and rivalries old and rooted as the Symplegades, and might be productive of salutary consequences all around."—New York Tribune.

Which, being put into few words, means that the only agency at God's command for stopping the quarreling of his children of differing religious faiths is wholesale destruction of life by natural convulsions. "The truce of God" is sounded by the bugler of indiscriminate murder. Is it true, then, dear Christian friends, that your God can sheathe the sword of religious slaughter only in the ruins of engulfed cities, amongst the crushed bones and mangled flesh of innocent women and children? We wish you joy of your resourceful "all-father."

The Christian and the Hottentot.

From the American Quarterly Register, conducted by B. B. Edwards, Recording Secretary of the American Education Society, Boston, Mass., 1833.

The term South Africa is of course an indefinite one. By it is comprehended, in general, the British colony of the Cape (which includes a space of 120,000 square miles) and the various countries and tribes north to about the twenty-sixth degree of south latitude.

The Hottentots within the colony of the Cape of Good Hope, the Bushmen, the Corannas, and the Namaquas, all speak the same language (allowing for varieties of dialects and accents), have nearly the same physical peculiarities, and are branches of the same original stock.

When the Portuguese first visited the Cape of Good Hope they found the inhabitants rich in cattle, living in a comfortable manner, and possessed of sufficient spirit to repel aggression. It was said that they were remarkable for the excellence of their morals, that they kept the law of nations better than most civilized people, and that they were valiant in arms. When the Dutch took possession of the colony the Hottentots seem to have been much more numerous than they are now [1833]. All the Hottentot tribes were distinguished by the appellation, "The good men." Bogaert relates that during the first fifty years of the Dutch occupation the natives had never been detected in committing an act of theft upon the property of the colonists. The first that took place happened in the year 1700. The offender was discovered and seized by his countrymen, who brought him to Cape Town and delivered him over to the inhabitants. After having been punished by whipping, he was banished by his own people from the colony, as unworthy to live in it. Barrow, and M. Levillant, both very intelligent travelers, bear the most unequivocal testimony to the benevolence and integrity of the Hottentot character. Dr. Phillips says that he has never been able to discover from his intercourse with the natives, or from any other source, that they ever attained any distinct notion of a supreme being, or that any idea of a future state of existence had at any period prevailed among them. Africaner, the most intelligent native of South Africa who has ever been known, declared that, previous to his acquaintance with the missionaries, he had no idea of a spirit, creator, or supreme ruler. By the God of the white people he only understood something under that name which they might carry about with them in their pockets. Neither the Hottentots nor the Bushmen have any word in their language to express the deity. The missionary, Brownlee, says that the Caffres have a word to express a supreme being, but none to designate a future state.

The Dutch formed a settlement in 1652. The site chosen was on the southern edge of Table Bay, and the party consisted of one hundred males. This number was speedily recruited by fresh arrivals from Europe, and the population has continued up to the present to double itself within the space of about twenty years. Their weakness at first, perhaps, contributed to confirm their peaceable deportment toward the natives. The Dutch East India Company, under whose control they were placed, seem not then to have regarded the conquest or occupation of the country as an object worthy of their attention. It was considered merely as an appendage to Batavia, and a convenient station for watering and refreshing the fleets engaged in their eastern commerce. Accordingly, for a number of years the intercourse between the old and new occupants was conducted in the most amicable spirit. As the Colonists increased in number, and began to feel their security and strength, and the difficulty of supplying their wants by barter and fair purchase, their encroachments daily augmented until they were no longer tolerable. Posts were formed in advance of the fort, and productive patches of land began to be considered as the property of the settlers. The Hottentots gradually withdrew from the Cape. No limit being fixed to the extension of the colony, the number of farmers, or boors, as they were called, rapidly increased; and as they removed farther and farther from the seat of government, their trade with the natives began occasionally to be interrupted by disputes and quarrels. It soon became obvious that the very existence of the natives was about to be considered as subservient to the boors. The successive governors, either from weakness or want of correct information, were led, at first, to wink at the aggressions of the colonists, and finally to aid them in their enterprises. As early as 1702, a party of Dutch boors took by violence from a single kraal of Hottentots about 2,200 head of cattle, and 2,500 sheep, shooting, at the same time, several men, women, and children. The Hottentots were soon reduced to great indigence. Such of them as preferred famine itself to slavery, retired, with the few sheep and goats left them, to the mountains, or to the most barren and uninviting parts of the desert, acquiring the name of Bushman or Boschjes-men. Others, who remained in the fertile territory, gradually lost their independence, sinking into servitude as herdsmen and domestics of the boors. The Bushmen, who had for a long time suffered with exemplary patience the injuries heaped upon them, finding that no retreat could protect them from the cruelties of their oppressors, sought resources of annoyance from the desperate condition to which they were reduced. The colonists, smarting under the retaliatory acts of the Bushmen, formed the project of exterminating them. Accordingly, about the year 1770, they sent to the seat of government the most vilifying representations of the Bushmen, accusing them of incessantly plundering the property of the colonists. In the year 1774, the whole race of Hottentots who had not submitted to servitude were to be seized or extirpated. The privilege of slavery was designed exclusively for the women and children; the men, whose natural habits disqualified them for the purposes of the colonists, and whose revenge was probably dreaded, were destined to death. The decision of the government was followed by an order for raising three commandoes, or military parties, who, under the command of field-cornets, were to scour the country, to surprise the kraals, to shoot the men, and to divide the women and children among the different members of the expedition. This horrid system continued till 1794, when the colony fell into the hands of the English. Hostilities did not cease for a day between the Bushmen and their implacable enemies, who considered the murder of a free Bushman as a meritorious act. The boor, when traveling across the country for pleasure or business, massacred the natives as game or noxious animals, and it is not improbable that the number killed by the regular commandoes fell short of those murdered by private individuals. Barrow says, in 1797, that he had heard one of these wretches boast of having destroyed, with his own hands, nearly three hundred of these unfortunate Bushmen. The effect of this system was to transform them from peaceable, contented, and useful neighbors and visitors, into ferocious and vindictive enemies. "They knew themselves," says Barrow, "to be hated by all mankind, and that every nation around them was an enemy planning their destruction. Not a breath of wind rustled through the leaves, not a bird screamed that were not supposed to announce danger." The degradation of the Hottentot character was the necessary result of such treatment.

The foregoing bit of history, copied from a report of Christian missions in South Africa, published more than sixty years ago, illustrates the usual methods, so far as practicable, by which Christian nations deal with the occupants of countries they invade for the purpose of plunder and conquest. The methods described seem also to be strictly in accord with those employed by the Jews, under direction of their Jehovah, as recorded in the Jewish-Christian Bible (see Num. xxi, 14-18; Deut. vii, 1-3; 1 Sam. xv, 8, 9). The only remarkable matter in the above recital is, perhaps, that the Hottentot inhabitants of South Africa, as found in the early part of the seventeenth century, were honest to an extraordinary degree, no theft having been known among them for more than fifty years. No historian would for a moment think of risking his reputation by making a like statement concerning any other race of the human family. And behold, these people were without a god, without a bible, and without a system of religion. For centuries all other nations have held that these were necessary to make man just, humane, and moral.

Priest and preacher alike have confessed through the pulpit, the platform, and the press that were it not for the fear of an angry God they would recklessly plunge into viciousness and crime. Even women of apparent refinement, culture, and education have unblushingly declared that were they without fear of future punishment, there was no crime they would not cheerfully commit. Yet on the shores of Africa dwelt a people without hope of future reward, and without fear of future punishment, who, in the excellence of their morals, surpassed all nations of the earth. Peace and prosperity reigned; no wealthy class was supported in idleness by the toiling poor; no dens of infamy, no saloons, and—no churches. Alas! that history must record the fact that the people of nations owning a god, a religion, and a Bible, invaded the country of "the good men," seized their lands, stole their goods and chattels, and either massacred or enslaved men, women, and children.

It has frequently been asserted that the civilization of the black man was due to the accident of slavery; in other words, the African being compelled to live in company with the men who robbed him, he had, as a result, become civilized; which means, perhaps, simply that he now believes in the Christian religion, often gets drunk, often commits crimes, after the example of his white Christian brother.

But the facts should not be overlooked, as recorded in the above-named missionary report, that it was nearly fifty years after Christian settlements were formed on the lands of "the good men" that the first criminal was found among the Hottentot inhabitants (1700). And if common school history states facts, it was in 1620 that the first ship load of black people were brought as slaves to the United States by the notorious Dutch trader.

When the white men of the South, almost to a man, fled to the seat of war in defense of their beloved institution of slavery, leaving their families—their mothers, wives, sisters, and daughters—to the sole care of the colored man, the fidelity and devotion with which he guarded his trust stand as a monument of evidence that these white men well understood the integrity of the heart of the African race. The pages of history during that four years of protracted warfare were unstained by a record of robbery, rape, or murder at the hand of the colored man. No, not even in retaliation for the many like crimes against him, or his, during his long years of bondage. Faithful unto the end, he labored for the best interest of his charge; and when at last his stolen freedom was returned to him, alone and empty-handed he went forth to meet his fate in an unequal struggle for bread upon a strange and uncertain battleground.

Obstacles in the Way of Christianity in Japan.

The Christian readers of the Chicago Record—they must be Christians, for the Record prints no Sunday edition, and fought bitterly for shut Sunday gates for the World's Fair—were no doubt disagreeably surprised when they read Mr. Curtis's account of affairs in Japan, a summary of which account is reproduced below from the editorial columns of the Columbus (Ohio) Journal, and the Christian readers of that latter paper no doubt share the unpleasant surprise of the Record's readers.

"In one of his recent letters from Japan to the Chicago Record Wm. E. Curtis makes the statement that that country is a land without faith. In almost every schoolhouse you can find an Infidel. The works of Herbert Spencer, John Stuart Mill, and other authors of the same sort were translated into the Japanese language as soon as the Bible, and reprints of many scientific volumes of the controversial sort can be purchased in any bookstore for less than they cost in England. There are weekly and monthly publications devoted to the discussion of scientific topics which are not only open but able antagonists of the Christian faith, and it is from them that the missionaries meet with the greatest opposition and discouragement. He relates that one of the native faculty of a Christian university, founded by the prayers and the contributions of the pious people in the United States and managed by the American board of foreign missions, himself a graduate of Yale college, has recently renounced the church that pays his salary, and is now making frequent public addresses that would do credit to Colonel Ingersoll."

His Martyrdom Completed.

We have to record the death of Viktor Emanuel Lennstrand, one of the founders and martyrs of organized Freethought in Sweden. His imprisonment for blasphemy, and subsequent establishment of Fritankaren, appealed strongly to the sympathies of English Freethinkers. Viktor Lennstrand was born at Gefle on January 30, 1861, so was only in his thirty-fifth year. He was educated at Upsala University, where he became acquainted with the works of Darwin, Spencer, Mill, and other Freethinkers. With the courage of his convictions, he got into a conflict with the authorities by lecturing in Upsala against Christianity, in 1887. In March of the following year the Swedish Utilitarian Society was started. By May he was sentenced to a fine of 250 crowns for denying the truth of the Christian religion, and, as he continued his propaganda, on November 29th he was imprisoned for three months for the same offense. Mr. Lennstrand defended himself manfully, and challenged the prosecution to prove that what he said about the Bible God was false. These were the first prosecutions for blasphemy in Sweden since 1821, when Professor Erik Gustav Geijer was indicted for his work on "The Protestant Creed," and was acquitted. Having full information of the case from our veteran friend, Capt. Otto Thomson, a subscription was started in England, and we had the mournful satisfaction of contributing towards the expenses of his imprisonment. Continuing his advocacy, Viktor Lennstrand founded Fritänkaren as a journal of Freethought, and lectured throughout Sweden. During 1889 he was subject to no fewer than eight prosecutions for blasphemy, each time being acquitted when brought before a jury, and sentenced when brought before the official tribunals. His last prosecution was for a pamphlet on "The Idea of God," which has been translated and published in English. Eventually he served two sentences of three months at Malmo, and one of six months at Stockholm. Of a delicate constitution, it is only too likely that these imprisonments ruined and shortened his life, as, in the opinion of his friends, he was not the same man afterwards. Though he continued his active propaganda, he has been for some time past suffering from ill-health, and went back to his native place to die. Of an impetuous nature, it seems likely that the sword has worn out the sheath. In the Social Demokrater (November 2d) Hjalmar Branting, the Socialist leader, and one of his former opponents, pays a tribute to him as an enthusiastic fighter and a distinguished propagandist. Lennstrand will be remembered for his sufferings and his efforts to arouse Sweden from her pietistic lethargy. We hope that Swedish Freethinkers will unite over his grave to continue the work which he so valiantly began.—Freethinker.

Modern Idol Worship.

Americans are wasting pity on the poor, ignorant Indians of Mexico for their adoration of the splendid painting of the Virgin of Guadalupe, while thousands of our own people assemble to do equal homage to a piece of carved wood believed to have been wrought to represent the same woman whom the Guadalupe painting represents. A little more than a month ago at Guadalupe Hidalgo a $400,000 crown of gold and jewels was placed over the top of the painting with great pomp and religious ceremony. Last Sunday in the American and enlightened city of New Orleans the block of wood was crowned with a diadem of gold, jewels worth many tens of thousands of dollars, and with almost equal pomp and ceremony, conducted by perhaps fewer archbishops and other clericals. The ignorant Indians have been taught to believe, and hence do believe (for ignorant people generally believe whatever their religious instructors teach), that the painting was wrought by miracle on the tilma of a passing Indian, and that the picture itself possesses some psychical power whereby it can work miracles. The supposedly intelligent people of New Orleans have been taught that their sacred block of wood was carved by some unknown human artist, was thrown aside among other old lumber in the garret of a convent in France until a superstitious nun came across it just before her departure for America in the early part of the present century, when she brought it over and set it up in a niche of the Ursuline convent in New Orleans—but all the same they have been taught, and doubtless verily believe, that this wooden image has wrought miracles. They rob the brave firemen of New Orleans of their just meed of praise for saving the convent from destruction by fire, by attributing the salvation of the building to the devout prayers offered up before this block of wood; and they strip the last leaf of laurel from the brow of Old Hickory and his heroic little army and cast them at the butt-end of this wooden idol by attributing to it the "miraculous" salvation of the city of New Orleans from invasion of the British forces in 1815—as though that inanimate chunk had more to do with putting Pakenham in a pickle than did the splendid strategy and steadfast heroism displayed out on the plains of Chalmette.—Ex.

The Same Rights for All.

A few years ago The Truth Seeker of New York forwarded to a patron in Canada a few copies of Paine's "Age of Reason." The authorities there intercepted the books, and refused to allow them to be delivered. The secular press of the country was perfectly silent in regard to this invasion of natural rights and disrespect for the comity of states.

A few days ago some Bibles were shipped to Turkey. They were stopped at Beyroot by the Turkish authorities, and flaming headlines now grace the columns of our dailies with "More Villainies in Armenia."

Turkey is a Mohammedan country. Its people mainly indorse the teachings of their prophet, and repudiate Christianity. Why do not the authorities of Turkey possess the same right to suppress the circulation of what they deem pernicious literature, as have Christian nations? The religious press rejoiced when the Dominion suppressed Paine's work, but howl with rage, and would gladly involve the world in war, because their fetich was prevented from reaching its destination.

Many a time we hear from Christian pulpits: "This is a Christian nation." It was but a little while ago that Talmage made this declaration in substance, and it was echoed by lesser lights in every part of the land. Apply the same principle to Mohammedan and Buddhist countries, and an overthrow of these countries is threatened.

The Progressive Thinker favors the toleration of all religions in all countries. Canada should not be bulldozed into the reception of literature which they consider obnoxious to their institutions; neither should it be done in Turkey. It deplors violence in any country to suppress opposing beliefs. Still it concedes the same right to Turkey and China to oppose Christianity in their countries as has Russia to slaughter or drive out Jews from their country. The crime of killing and enslaving Jews and Mohammedans in Spain at the close of the fifteenth century by Christians is not paralleled by the expulsion and slaughter of Christians in Armenia. In Spain, the lands, the personal property, the persons and government of the subjugated people, were turned over to Christians, and princesses were made scullions in Christian kitchens.—The Progressive Thinker.

A Happy Thought.

The following is from the London Law Times, and contains the suggestions of Judge Chalmers, a writer therein:

"In connection with the subject of perjury, there is a further amendment of the law which I think would be beneficial. I refer to the abolition of the oath in civil proceedings. As far as I can judge, an oath has no longer any religious sanction for the masses. A county court witness swallows an oath as easily as he does an oyster, and the administration of the oath becomes an irreverent farce.

"A cynical friend of mine suggests that, though the religious instinct be dead among the people, the sporting instinct is happily very much alive, and might be utilized in the cause of truth. In county court cases he would substitute a shilling bet for the present oath. The witness, instead of being made to swear, would be made to bet a shilling that he would speak the truth.

"No doubt a much greater proportion of truthful evidence might be obtained in this way, and a great deal of useless profanity might be avoided; but the Anti-Gambling League, like the poor, are always with us, and my friend's plan is not feasible. For myself, I should like to see a simple declaration substituted for the oath, with a reminder that the witness was liable to be punished for perjury if he did not speak the truth."

A Change of Method.

Commenting on the Christian Endeavorers' prayers for the conversion of Colonel Ingersoll, the New York Sunday News makes this good point: "But our present business with this manifestation is not to anticipate its results, but to remark upon the improvement in human methods, affecting conversions in religious belief, which we are experiencing, in contrast with those which were used by our respected ancestors. Two centuries or less ago Mr. Ingersoll would not have been reasoned with or appealed to. He would simply have been tortured until life should be half extinct in his wretched body, and would then have been roasted in a slow fire with pious deliberation. Such was the treatment universal in Christendom of all who dared repudiate or doubt the established faith. In those days the thousands of good Christians who now pray for him would have looked upon his dying agonies and rejoiced and triumphed. What a wonderful change, what a glorious improvement has come upon human nature in those two centuries!" To the attention of those who say that science and Freethought have had no effect upon Christianity we commend this great improvement in the proselyting methods of the church.

They Will Change the Laws Likewise.

The National Reform Association is about to make another determined effort to have the constitution of the United States so amended as to "suitably acknowledge God." But whose God? The association should be requested to properly define this before seeking popular support to so momentous a step.

Is it to be the God of the Calvinist or of the Universalist? Are the American people to officially indorse the God who is satisfied with sprinkling, or the God who insists upon immersion? Is the Constitution to acknowledge the Trinitarian or the Unitarian conception of the Deity? Are we to bow as a nation to Huxley's Inscrutable First Cause, or to the pantheistic

God of the granite and the rose,
Soul of the sparrow and the bee, which the Spiritualists invoke?

The National Reform Association should by all means be compelled to decide whose God they intend to compel us to acknowledge officially and as a people. They should also state exactly what they expect to follow this indorsement of a deity up with. They should define what penalties will fall upon those who unfortunately subscribe to an entirely different ideal of deity from that which the National Reform Association may decide to adopt for the American people, and how this official indorsement will influence the relations of church and state.

The fact is, the National Reform Association are striving for something impossible and wholly undesirable. Their action is the first step toward a state church. And they will have to remodel not only the Constitution but the public sentiment of the country to accomplish their purpose.—St. Louis Sunday Post-Dispatch.

Observations.

A correspondent of the New York Voice, himself a Prohibitionist and a Christian, charges that the Prohibition party, as represented by its platform and its speakers, aims at a theocracy in this country. The editor meets the accusation with denial, and tries to refute it with argument and fact, but he leaves the case worse than he found it. Of the Prohibition speakers he says: "They do favor a Christian government, and so do we, and so, we are pretty confident, does the Prohibition party. We believe that the Christian principles are the standards to which the nation's laws should conform."

He goes further. "We do believe," he states, "in just what the preamble of the Prohibition party says, namely, that 'Almighty God' is 'the source of all true government,' and 'his law' is the standard."

That is what the editor of the Voice believes. What he says he does not believe is "that any ecclesiastical interpretation of God's law is 'the standard to which all human enactments must conform.'"

It will be seen, after a moment's scrutiny, that what Dr. Funk, editor of the Voice, says he believes is in fact exactly what he says he does not believe. I am not going to place in parallel columns the declaration of the national Prohibition party that "Almighty God is the source of all true government," and the words of the Declaration of Independence, that "governments derive their just powers [not from Almighty God, but] from the consent of the governed," of whom God is not one. The blind and deaf testify to the difference between these two principles. One asserts a theocracy—from theos, god; the other a democracy—from demos, the people. Unless words are frauds, like some who use them to deceive, a government derived from a god would be a theocracy.

But if Dr. Funk were to tell the truth—which he is not likely to do—he would admit that the notion of governments derived from God is a pseud-idea. There is no God, and therefore nothing is derived from that source. There is, however, a set of men called ministers, who, with a mendacity, a gall, a nerve, a monumental cheek—an access of assurance which if displayed regarding the verifiable would distinguish them as the chiefest impostors known to the human family—pretend that they have the law of God in a book, and that they are authorized to construe the same for the governing of their fellow citizens. What they tell us is all we know about God, and they are all conscious or unconscious liars. Any man searching for this god runs against these ministers, for they are He with a capital H, and their word is all there is of his "law." The theocracy, then, when we get close to it, is a hierarchy—that is, government by ministers.

But Dr. Funk says he does not believe in ecclesiastical interpretations of God's law. Then I would like to have him show me an interpretation of God's law, accepted by two or more persons, that is not ecclesiastical. He can't do it and he will not try. He is an ecclesiastic himself. He may point to the Bible as the law of God, but neither he nor any other sane and civilized person would consent that the Bible should be embodied in the civil law. His plan for enforcing God's law is as follows, in his own words: "The churches can, by instilling Christian doctrines into the minds of the people, and thus by molding their convictions, secure the enactment of laws that conform thereto."

Churches and doctrines! The publisher of the Standard Dictionary will not define the churches as anything but ecclesiastical bodies, nor Christian doctrines as anything but interpretations of God's law. And there we have the ecclesiastical interpretation which Dr. Funk says he does not believe in.

If what this spokesman for the Prohibition party has said is any indication of the state of his mind, he favors an ecclesiastical government for the nation, and is pretty confident that the Prohibition party shares his convictions. The trouble with him is that he is a sort of Jesuit, a shuffler, an evader, a hypocrite—words which I dislike to use, but I am speaking descriptively, and they describe him. I have not the gift of telepathy, and cannot read his mind. I can, however, read his words, and they mean that he believes in a theocracy, but does not believe in calling it one. Regarding the Voice as a business proposition, as a religious journal, as an opponent of the liquor seller, as an organ of collectivism, and as an advocate of compulsory moralism, I can formulate Dr. Funk's creed in such a way that those who do not read him consecutively may know his general drift. It is: 1. The almighty dollar; 2. Almighty God; 3. Prohibition; 4. Socialism; 5. Asexualization; the whole being reduced to a common denominator in an almighty Funk.

Kind reader, did you join the Christian Endeavorers in prayer for the conversion of Colonel Ingersoll? A woman writing to a daily paper suggested that the Endeavorers should ask the Supreme Power to make them as noble in character and as useful to the world as the Colonel has shown them how to be; but I do not learn that any of them did so. They were willing to pray for what looked like the impossible, but they had to draw the line somewhere.

A Freethinker living in an Illinois town writes:

One of the leading physicians of this village stated that what made him believe the Bible to be inspired was that there was not a grammatical error in it. We contended that for anything he knew the original manuscript might be full of grammatical errors, but he said he would not be convinced until we furnished proof. Are there grammatical errors in the original manuscripts?

The question might be answered briefly by saying that, in the first place, no manuscript of the Bible known to be the original is in existence; and, in the second place, if such manuscript were at hand we should not know whether its grammar was good or bad, for the reason that we have nothing by which to test its accuracy. Scholars inform us that the Bible as it is in Hebrew is the repository of the Hebrew language. It is therefore the model for writers of that tongue. We should remember that the language must be placed first and the grammar afterwards, as historical events must occur prior to the history which records them. The grammar book is no authority except as it expresses the genius, logic, and usage of the language. If the Hebrew grammar has no other basis than that afforded by the scriptures, then to test those scriptures by any grammatical rules would be idle except as determining the competency of the person who formulated the rules. The manuscripts of which our authorized Bible is a translation are not in the Hebrew. If the original so-called word of God was written in that tongue, we have only a translation of previous translations. The grammatical accuracy of the original manuscripts has no more to do with inspiration than inspiration has to do with the grammatical accuracy of these Observations.

I may say that the authorized version of the Bible contains grammatical errors. "Our father which art in heaven" is one. Matthew xvii, 1, which mentions "an high mountain," contains another, and it is frequently repeated in the New Testament. "Lest the cross of Christ should be made of none effect" (1 Cor. i, 17) is wrong, as the same location is when elsewhere employed. Nevertheless the authorized version is regarded as a model of English on account of its age and general excellence—qualities not due to inspiration, but to the lapse of time and the literary ability of the translators. An English man of letters, always grammatical himself, was asked if a certain published statement was untrue, and he replied that it was worse: it was badly written. On a similar principle the leading physician mentioned by the correspondent may deem grammatical accuracy a better test of inspiration than probability of statement; but I do not know of anyone who agrees with him.

A young Englishwoman, Miss Edith Lanchester, was recently adjudged insane because she contemplated social suicide. Miss Lanchester loved a young man, but, regarding marriage as servitude, announced her intention to become his wife only anatomically, not legally. That was deemed sufficient evidence of the unsound state of her mind, and her conservativ family had no difficulty in procuring her commitment to the asylum. Her young man found out where she was, effected her release, took her to his bed and board—and the sun still shines.

The English press and public have been vocal over the affair for the past month. They are indignant, not at Miss Lanchester, as we should have to be here in order to divert suspicion from ourselves, but at her family and the physician who certified to her insanity. The matter has given them a chance to discuss the question whether social suicide is a sin, and they seem to have determined that it is not a mortal one. Mr. G. W. Foote, editor of the London Freethinker, writes an excellent article in which, without condemning Miss Lanchester, he argues that those who reject the guarantees of society "are bound to consider the consequences; they have to think, not only of themselves, but of other persons; and when the principal third persons are children, whose introduction to the world is a matter in which they have not been consulted, it seems to us both wise and just for 'advanced' lovers to respect marriage while agitating for its reform." Of course, that is reasonable. I took the same view when I contracted matrimony. Now, if we can ascertain what proportion of children born of such unions as that into which Miss Lanchester has entered ever become a charge upon society, and then compare that proportion with the proportion established under legal marriage, we shall have a basis of fact upon which to rest our conclusion that such unions as hers are not to be tolerated.

Henry Frank added something to the totality of thought on religious progress when he said at the Liberal Club the other night that Christianity had successively based its claims upon the miracles of Christ, upon the resurrection of Christ, and finally upon the personality of Christ—the first two positions being now untenable and the third one shaky. He might have added that Christianity has already sought a fourth refuge, namely, the civil law, especially such as enforces the observance of "holy time." When it was so that anybody who doubted the miracles, the resurrection, or the personality of Jesus could be drawn and quartered, burned, or hanged until he was dead, strict Sunday observance was not required, although it was provided for by the statutes which protected from denial those other articles of faith. Now that we are permitted to question with impunity the exploded dogmas of past ages, the political church takes its stand on the "Sabbath," which it purloined from paganism, and for which it is now fighting with the fierceness of pirates defending stolen goods and knowing that the salvation of their necks depends upon successful resistance to justice. It is the last resort, and by some is called patriotism.

Brethren, let us be of good cheer. Our public men are experiencing an access of light. Mr. Reed, the speaker of the House of Representatives, has discovered that the duty of the present Congress is to avoid tariff tinkering and let the business interests of the country have a chance to take care of themselves. He is indubitably right; for the natural risks of business enterprise are sufficient, without any artificial ones sprung upon the community by fool legislation. And Mr. Cleveland also has thought out something. He has found that when an obligation is met it should be canceled; that rehypothecation of government notes is a failure, and that with paper and gold at a parity the redemption of ten dollars of paper with one dollar of gold is impracticable. As he remarks, "the government is in the situation of owing to the holders of its notes debts payable in gold on demand which can neither be retired by receiving such notes in discharge of obligations due the government nor canceled by actual payment in gold. It is forced to redeem without redemption, and to pay without acquittance." Now, if Congress will take a hint from Mr. Reed as to the absence of any urgent necessity for constructiv legislation; if it will see that the tax is removed from banking and all the restrictions taken off the issue of money in any form desired; if it will allow the medium of exchange, like vehicles of transportation, to be manufactured to meet the necessities of trade; if, to be brief, it will let the financial interests of the country take care of themselves, as they are bound to do when not interfered with, the people will enjoy exactly that degree of prosperity to which their efforts entitle them.

News and Notes.

The fires of Freethought have not altogether gone out on Cape Cod. The beacon lights glow here and there. Cape Cod is not really a favorable locality for tyranny and superstition. There is too much ocean about it. The sunshine is more brilliant than in Boston; and even in winter shining landscapes appear. The glory of Cape Cod is not simply in summer; but even at this season it presents an attractive appearance when the golden time of autumn flows into the white days and keen nights of winter's effulgence. It is generally from ten to fifteen degrees warmer on the cape than in other parts of Massachusetts in the cold season, while in warm weather the cooling breezes of ocean moderate the atmosphere. As an all-round year's residence Cape Cod has many inducements.

It was a beautiful day when I arrived at East Dennis, one of the most beautiful days of the glorious autumn weather. There is something wonderfully charming in these golden autumn days, so soft, so luminous, so suggestive of departing summer and approaching winter, a mean between the two—a burial and a prophecy; for beyond the gloom of winter we catch the glories of the spring-time. These are days of quiet, when you feel like floating aways in dreams. The "sweet, strange mystery" of the poet's brain haunts the scene, the glittering splendor of the sky so mingles and contrasts with the desolation of the fields and woods.

I am met at the station Saturday noon by Mr. Joshua Crowell, and enjoy the hospitality of his New England home, where the memories of the past mingle with the life and hopes of to-day; for Cape Cod still retains the ancient flavor. The families here can generally trace their descent back to the early settlers and the Pilgrim Fathers. The lines of succession are unbroken. There is but little intrusion of a foreign element, and we seem to touch elbows with the generations gone by. East Dennis is an entirely country place, and all the inhabitants pursue the "even tenor of their way" without the hum and bustle of metropolitan industry. It is an agreeable change for the oft-traveling Pilgrim. In the afternoon Mr. Crowell gives me a drive over the several villages of this wide-spread township. On one side the mighty ocean rolls and sparkles away, and finds no shore upon which to break towards the orient save that of Europe. Landward stretch the gentle hills, clothed mostly with diminutive evergreens, while the fields and valleys are darkly embossed with cranberry patches, whence the wealth of the Cape at present proceeds. The houses are old-fashioned, some going back two hundred years or more, and only now and then are the streets of the village disturbed by foot of pedestrian or roll of carriage. Hardly any business is transacted; and the country-store has only an occasional visitor. The meeting-house is still the meeting-house of the olden time, and reverberates with Puritan theology. As the meeting-house in the early days was the fort and refuge of the settlement in times of peril, it stands upon a hill in melancholy prominence, surrounded by the dwellings of the dead. Here and there are modern buildings amidst the picturesque landscape and fine school-houses. The school-house grows if the church does not, and indicates that Cape Cod is not confined to the ancient landmarks in its pursuit of knowledge. It was quite a delightful afternoon's journey through these variable prospects, sea and land mingling in ever-shifting panorama; and the golden sunset flooded all with an ineffable halo.

Sunday was a different day in this uncertain season. It dawned with a flash of splendid sunrise, then grew dark and threatening, and now and then it just ventured to rain. But notwithstanding the recalcitrant weather I had two good audiences, afternoon and evening. There is a very sturdy element of Freethought in this place, which has been developed from the loins of Puritanism, and has its elements of strength. Freethought is an evolution on Cape Cod. Its seeds were floated over on the Mayflower. They possess a vitality which springs from the very soil itself.

I have thus enjoyed my Cape Cod experience. There is something original and unique in this part of the country, and I am greeted with genuine New England warmth and sympathy. It is an invigorating episode.

Milford, Mass., is my next lecturing point, and here we gather together for a real old-fashioned Thanksgiving dinner, with thanksgiving, however, to the cook, and to our own genial friends, with no prayers, but a jolly good appetite. Mr. and Mrs. Buxton are always ready to welcome the Secular Pilgrim. Mrs. M. Florence Johnson and her three daughters are present—Pearl, Bertha, and Olive; Miss Pearl Buxton, and Miss Benson, of Chicago; Miss Louise Minchen, of Iowa, a student of Emerson College of Oratory, is a guest of the occasion. Mr. C. C. Johnson, Mr. Lilly, and others, are in our ranks, and it was quite a Freethought festival without any regard to the governor's proclamation. After dinner the time sped by with music, recitations, etc., each one of the party contributing something to the eclat of the occasion. This is a Thanksgiving long to be remembered, radiating in the heart of New England.

Friday is a beautiful day, and we wander over Bear's Hill, one of the memorable places in the history of Milford, where the bears used to congregate, and the Indians likewise. From this eminence are extensive prospects in every direction. Milford has now a population of about ten thousand. It is a handsome town with an air of prosperity. There is a latent Freethought element in it which has not been developed. The churches are prominent, but the spirit of Liberalism prevails within them, and hell-fire is about forgotten.

I lecture in the evening and the hall is respectably filled. Enough are present to encourage future effort. I was glad to meet with new friends and to make a beginning. Not since the time of Professor Denton have any distinctly Freethought lectures been given here, and it now seems as if something might be done.

Mr. C. C. Johnson is one of the old citizens of the place. He has been a Freethinker, I guess, for over half a century. He was built that way. He has traveled extensively, and with his eyes open, and from many a source has gathered the materials of his Freethought philosophy.

Mr. Lilly, who presided at our meeting, has been through the same struggle as myself. For many years he was an earnest Christian, popular in church work, the Bible class, etc., and even when his heresy became known the church was loth to give him up. He was too thoroughly in earnest and would not compromise. He found it impossible to do so, even though the church is of a Liberal spirit. The creed is still there, and he was compelled to reject it, root and branch. He has taken his place under the colors of Freethought.

Mr. Clinton B. Fisk, T. N. Sherman, and others, are TRUTH SEEKER subscribers and pioneers of our cause. Mr. Buxton takes in both worlds, but as long as this world lasts he is in favor of doing the best he can for truth here and now.

Mrs. M. Florence Johnson was present at the New York Congress, and her eloquent recitations are remembered by all. Her daughters are gifted with the genius of music and will, no doubt, in days to come, thrill our advancing ranks with Freethought melodies.

Milford is a pleasant field of labor. The campfires burn brightly. Youth and age are in the work, and art and poetry cheer the footsteps of the pioneer.

Nashua, N. H., is next on the list. I believe this is the first time I have given a Freethought lecture in New Hampshire, my native state. I have preached orthodox and Unitarian sermons there, delivered speeches and essays in academy and college, and made Fourth of July addresses long ago, but not until Sunday, December 1st, did I ever put forth in this staid and puritanic commonwealth my radical convictions. I was glad of the opportunity, and it would rejoice my heart above anything else to go all over this state and help demolish the grim theology that flung its awful shadow over my youth and made my life such a struggle, useless and barren in many respects. Those who have not been brought up in orthodoxy fail to realize what a curse it is; how it saps the heart of youth, takes away hope, and withers the faculties. I hate orthodoxy with every fiber of my being, for I have felt its fangs through many years of toil.

This effort at Nashua has been started and encouraged by Mr. W. B. Wellman, who has long been a resident of Nashua, and who is well-known for his courage, honesty, and persistency in attacking any wrong when he meets it. He has a large faith in the spiritual philosophy, but that does not blind him to the present issues. He is ready to do the work at hand. Mr. E. H. Everett and a few others join with him. The campaign is no easy one, and will require plenty of patience and bravery, but Mr. Wellman and his comrades are not the ones to surrender.

Mr. Steiner gave the first lecture of the course, and it was quite successful and created a good deal of agitation and interest. I gave the second lecture, and there was an increase of attendance. There is a Unitarian and Universalist church at Nashua, besides a large number of other churches. As we occupy the pioneer position, and easy-going Liberals like to keep with the crowd, and so avail themselves of the Unitarian or Universalist society, it is evident that we must be in the minority and, to a certain extent, accept unpopularity and ostracism.

I have no doubt there is a large Freethought element in Nashua, notwithstanding the fashion and wealth of the churches. I think a good beginning has been made. My soldier comrade, J. P. Guild, was present and recited some of his stirring poems.

Nashua has a population of about 20,000. It is a manufacturing city, and has quite a foreign element, especially French. It is greatly changed since I was here about twenty-three years ago. It is evidently on the increase. In a place so active and growing as this there certainly ought to be a Freethought organization. I guess my friend, Mr. Wellman, will see to this.

This ends my New England campaign and now, for the time being, I turn to the West. I must keep on the go. I expect, however, to return to Boston in January to aid in the New England Convention and Paine Celebration to be held here January 26th. This is an important occasion, and I hope that New England Freethinkers will be present in large numbers. I hope the anniversary of Thomas Paine will be utilized throughout the country for Freethought celebrations. From Boston to San Francisco the beacon lights should glow.

The Abominable Comstock.

The arrest and arraignment at the instance of Mr. Anthony Comstock of an established and respectable bookseller as a dealer in obscene literature, which evidently he is not, brings up once more the question whether the powers of inquisition devolved upon or assumed by Mr. Comstock can safely be reposed in any individual, and especially whether they can safely be reposed in a person like Mr. Comstock, who is a specialist, so to speak, in pornography. It is a curious fact that a man can not devote himself to such specialties without losing his mental balance and overdoing his business. In the case of a man who assumes the special functions which Mr. Comstock has taken upon himself the fallibility of the specialist is increased, because, in order to render a fair judgment upon the question whether a work of art or of literature is obscene, one needs a very wide acquaintance with literature and with art. It is of course not at all the question whether a passage or a picture might not appeal to a particularly prurient mind. Shakspeare and the Bible abound in such passages. The question is whether the intention of the author of the work, and its necessary tendency, are of an inflammatory or brutalizing character. In this "the hand of little employment hath the daintier sense." A casual citizen of equal knowledge would be a much better judge than an agent for the Society for the Suppression of Vice. And Mr. Comstock has sufficiently shown that if any man can be trusted to decide off hand what is obscene literature or obscene art, he is not the man. A man who thought it his duty, in the interest of morality, to suppress "Tom Jones," is a man to whom no discretion can in such matters be confided. Such a suppression is a conclusiv proof of the incapacity of the censor.

In the present case it is maintained by Comstock that the question has already been adjudicated and the book pronounced indecent. But this plea requires much qualification. It is asserted that the adjudication came about as follows: Comstock called at the shop of a French bookseller and demanded the work in question, which he thereupon proceeded to mutilate with a penknife for the purpose of extracting exhibits, thus destroying a work valued at $50 and inflicting a fine of that amount in advance of any judicial proceedings whatever. The bookseller, being arraigned, being imperfectly acquainted with English and under great apprehension, pleaded guilty of an offense which nobody really believes that he had willfully committed. It is the acceptance of this plea of guilty, it is said, that constitutes the adjudication in this case. It is true that no owner of a library would like to submit to a common jury the question whether he was not the possessor of obscene literature, but imperfect as such an adjudication would be, it seems that it is more than was had in this case. Mr. Comstock's victim has very properly demanded a trial by jury. If he is acquitted, it will clearly appear both that his arrest was an outrage and that the arrest of the French bookseller was an outrage, and the injury of his property a wrong for which he is entitled to redress.—New York Times.

Our Missionary Work.

Several of our good friends have written us that in their opinion the work, "Self Contradictions of the Bible," should go along with Paine's "Age of Reason" as a missionary pamphlet. Mr. J. R. Perry puts it thus: "As a missionary document the 144 Self Contradictions will go hand in hand with the 'Age of Reason.' I think any person getting the one will get the other. It is the grubbing process, clearing out the roots and stones, necessary to preparing the soil for good seeds of common sense." And as it is our delight to furnish the implements for this sort of agricultural operations, we are willing to do our part and will send the "Self Contradictions of the Bible" to those who will distribute it among their Christian friends, FOR A DOLLAR A DOZEN. Or we will send twelve copies to as many different addresses for one dollar.

Now let the friends of Freethought turn to and circulate "Self Contradictions" as well as the "Age of Reason." Send both books out by the thousand and watch the result. Flood the country with them, and let the Christians know what their holy paper fetich, the Bible, is like and why it is worthless as a guide to any good.

THE TRUTH SEEKER's offer to send eight copies of Paine's "Age of Reason" to eight different addresses for $1, to be used for missionary purposes, is still open. The best results are reported from this method of reaching intelligent believers and giving a new direction to their thoughts.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

In an old Bible I read many years ago were several apocryphal books and with them the song of the three holy children which occurs in the third chapter of Daniel; also the history of Bel and the dragon cut off from the end of Daniel. I venture to ask you, through THE TRUTH SEEKER, by what authority those parts of Daniel were thrown out? Have you any book which gives a history of the time, place, and by whom the Bible was canonized?

Respectfully yours, GEORGE BROWN.

Persecution Makes Friends.

WINONA, MINN., Nov. 26, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Theocracy has its disciples in Minnesota as well as in the East, and they are busy perfecting organizations, by means of which their ideas of government will be engrafted in and enforced through civil laws.

In the city of Minneapolis, and in my own city, the good ministers have been actively engaged perfecting "Christian Citizenship Leagues," etc., whose objects are the enforcement of all laws and especially Sunday laws, and the promotion of "Christian citizenship."

The people of Minnesota certainly need some of the wise men to look after their officers and legislators (so the clergy think); but they will find opposition all along.

I will subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER in a few days, even if it is deprived of the use of the mails of the United States by those whom it displeases.

Rome.

WYNNIE, NEB., Nov. 25, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The recent celebration of the anniversary of the occupation of Rome by the Italian troops in 1870 called out the indignation of all Catholic Christendom. Among other foolishness uttered on that occasion, this appeared in the Waisenfrennd, a red-hot Catholic sheet: "For these and other reasons we protest against the present occupation of Rome by the Piedmontese [not Italians]. We always shall protest, and our children and theirs shall do the same. The Piedmontese shall find no rest from such protests and declarations, coming from all parts of the world, demanding that Rome shall be restituted to the pope. We demand and insist that the head of the church, as ordained by God, be made again king of Rome. The time will come when some powerful personage will listen to our prayer [why does not their God do that?] and will drive out the invaders and will give the holy city back to the pope. The pope will not always remain a prisoner in the Vatican; but the Rome of Constantine [the murderer], Charles the Great [the great converter and land-robber], and of the holy Leo; the Rome of the councils and canonizations will be restored, sooner or later, in the one way or other, but come it will, as the history of the church shows, and the shaking throne of the Piedmontese will be either removed or collapse, while the successor of Petri will be free and independent in the capital of Christendom."

Rome was taken from other nations and given to the pope by Charlemagne, one of the greatest butchers who ever lived.

The Futility of Prayer Demonstrated.

EL RENO, OKLA., Nov. 20, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I am an old soldier; served in the late rebellion, and was in hell eighteen months in Andersonville. Florence, Danville, and Castle Thunder, Richmond. I have seen one thousand men in rags and starving and sick all down on their knees praying to God to release them, asking him in the name of Christ for water and to let them live to see their mothers and fathers, brothers and sisters, their dear wives and little babes once more; praying for God to soften the rebels' hearts, and praying to God to strengthen our armies, so that they could be released from prison, relieved from the terrible punishment they were receiving. If ever there was faith shown in God it must have been in those prisons.

No doubt that millions of people have heard of the great providential spring that broke out in Andersonville stockade. I was there and saw for myself. In the spring of 1864, I think, there was a freshet in the creek that ran through the prison. There was a very heavy rainfall that caused the creek to take a sudden rise and the water came down in a great torrent and washed out about fifty feet of the stockade on both sides. Well, the "rebs" went to work and put in new logs; set them down five feet deep in the ground and tamped the ditch with clay around the logs to keep them in their places. Now the soil there was a sandy loam about two feet deep; then came the red clay, and by resetting the stockade it dammed up the creek. Then the water forced its way between the clay and the sandy loam and broke out inside of the dead line, and that was the great providential spring. I was an eye-witness of all this. If God caused this spring he ought to have caused another to break out and furnish ham and eggs and bread for the poor starving inmates of the Andersonville hell. I there lost all faith in prayer; you may pray to God to give bread, but will have to work for it or starve.

I read the Bible to understand it and found the third day's work was a fraud; how could the trees and vegetables yield up their fruit if the sun and moon and stars were not made till the fourth day? I would like to have some minister tell me which was the best of the beings, God or the devil. God killed millions of ancient people, if the Bible is true, and the devil never killed one that I could find any account of in the Bible. I believe he tried at one time to get Christ to kill himself by jumping off some pinnacle or mountain; though I think he (the devil) was fooling him or trying to.

I believe the Bible is nothing but the laws and history of the Jews, and is a conglomerated botch at that.

I wish you good success and will send you some new subscribers.

Moody a Good Hypnotizer.

ATLANTA, GA., Nov. 24, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The exposition is progressing nicely under a full head of steam (energy) and is now graced by the presence of your fellow-townsmen of New York and Brooklyn. A day was dedicated to each delegation, and I trust that the ceremonies instituted by the Atlanteans were befitting the occasion. Those from the city of churches may note while here that Atlanta is in the same line, if in the rear of Brooklyn. There are sixty-one churches in Atlanta, besides the big tabernacle recently built for Mr. Moody, who is now here preaching. An old citizen here, a Methodist, remarked to me, "Mr. Moody has great magnetic influence;" and this is the secret of his success. As a hypnotizer he would be as successful and draw as good houses at fifty cents a head as some professionals that I have seen perform in the theaters. His style is most simple, but his manner of relating such old stories as that of Noah's ark and the prodigal son, embellished with numerous surmises of his own (he "has no doubt," etc.), plays on the sensibilities of those who have emulated from babyhood the characteristics of that silly, and comparatively worthless, domestic animal, the sheep, until they are worked up into such an emotional state of mind that they will believe anything Mr. Moody then tells them—like a dozen subjects I once saw who believed that their coats were on wrong side out when told so by the hypnotist. Mr. Moody outdraws all the side-shows. True, he does a great deal of advertising. Numerous agents go all about the city distributing his handbills; numerous notices appear in the papers, and the adjournment of most of the churches at certain times for his benefit tend to bring him large audiences. I will not deny that he may do some good in individual cases, but it is for those who have no higher ambition than to be sheepish and let some one else do their thinking. And this method I consider more detrimental to the welfare and development of the human race at large than anything else.

I spent to-day (Sunday) in a typical Christian way. I went to Trinity (Methodist) church on Trinity avenue and heard a sermon on the text, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." I had to take a rear seat where I could hear but little of the discourse, hence I was not irritated by the doctrines; so I listened to the choir, which was a good one, and dozed peacefully through the sermon like a stanch deacon. The assistant minister, who did some praying, is an old-time friend, whom I met here again recently. He is a Methodist, and preached on the circuit where I lived in the year 1860. I was then a small boy living in the country, surrounded by wealth in abundance. The rich planters owned extensive estates and slaves by the score and hundred. Nearly all were Christians in those times. They had texts in the Bible that justified slavery. Established by the law of the land and sanctioned by the Bible, the Southron considered it as proper to own slaves as horses. But now all is changed. All know that slavery was a great wrong and are glad that it is swept away forever from our shores. It was a long step upward in progress. And so free thought and free speech will carry us onward and upward until mental slavery is swept away forever. S. S. BRYAN.

Infidel Discourses in a Christian Church.

MARTINSVILLE, ILL., Nov. 11, E.M. 295.

MR. EDITOR: I esteem it my duty to report the sad event of the death of Dr. Martin Flenner, a pioneer of Freethought in this community; a man endowed with the characteristic of doubt to such a degree that a logical exercise of his senses and faculties forced him from one conclusion to another until he anchored his hopes and conclusions upon the advanced and scientific principles of the eternity of matter, and rounded up his life at the 85th milestone on this mundane sphere.

He was a man born and raised in the United Brethren church, which eliminated him on account of a growth of mind which orthodoxy cannot tolerate and survive, and by an exercise of the mind and what means his environments presented he evolved to the position of an Agnostic, which position he maintained and advocated until the spark of life expired in a calm and placid death.

Through our social converse over a year before his death, he determined to write out some of the conclusions he had reached through his observations and experiences while in an active and conscious state, and have such conclusions read at his funeral to forestall such falsehoods as are apt to be circulated by adverse minds. This wise provision proved very advantageous and useful in disposing of the falsehoods which the pious were so energetic in setting afloat, three weeks before his death, to the effect that he recanted and had accepted Christianity. The reading of his discourse refuted everything they had circulated, and the statement I made on the occasion showed conclusively that he died as he had lived, in full confidence that science is more reliable than any creed or Bible. I shall herewith send you Dr. Flenner's discourse; also what I composed by copying and quoting from the sentiments and facts gleaned by the reading of THE TRUTH SEEKER and Independent Pulpit and their publications, and you can use these documents as you think best. It is my opinion we should make an effort to discard the prevailing customs of Christianity, especially the custom of holding religious incantations over our Liberal friends, and this can be done most effectually by encouraging all Liberals to put their best thoughts on paper. If any lack the literary ability to do this well it will be easy to find others who can help those thus deficient. This would strengthen them and give us an opportunity to penetrate minds we can reach in no other place or manner than at funerals.

Herein you will find 75 cents, for which send THE TRUTH SEEKER to Wm. Conley. I remain, as ever, an enthusiastic admirer of your glorious and powerful paper.

Seeking the Light.

CARTERVILLE, ILL., Nov. 12, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I received a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER a few days ago, and I will try to write a few words, mainly for my own instruction. Although born and nurtured under a Methodist roof, I have always been a Freethinker, but not an Infidel. I always believed in a God, but not a Bible God. I also believe that nature demands one day's rest in seven, but don't think there should be any compulsion about it. This is my conviction in a nutshell. If the after-life is a theory, what a grand and sublime thought to possess a belief so fixed that one may see with the eye of faith the heavenly tableau that awaits the coming of the soul. This savors a little of orthodoxy, but it is a fond hope to cherish, and I trust it will be realized. What a sad old earth this is to live on if there is no hope beyond the grave! Of course the writings of the Old Testament, as well as of the New, so far as narration of events and the nature of the people are concerned, sound like an unreasonable tale to Freethinking people. For instance, the "fish tale," albeit if this were of a novelistic order, with Jonah for the hero of the tale, it might suit those who delight in romance; but that is not an orthodox interpretation—we are asked to believe with all our heart from Genesis to Revelation without consulting reason or exercising thought; let it be fish tale, apple tale, salt tale, or fox tail, we are commanded to regard it as the word of God. I have studied the Bible conscientiously, and I must confess that it contains some good moral lessons, and great examples of perseverance. Again, there are some incidents recorded which are not moral, and which are too ridiculous and crude for belief.

In such an age of obscurity as that in which these tales were written some of our American historical events would be chronicled as miracles. For instance, Capt. John Smith, while on an expedition up the rugged Chickahominy river, was captured by the Indians, and when the club was raised, we are told, one Pocahontas fell in love with him, and through her intercession his life was spared. But even this has been discredited, that is, the love part, because such intercession was a matter of Indian usage. However, it is a grand cornerstone on which to build a house of superstition and cover it with a miracle. In the light of historical research superstition is fast dying out, and with it must go supernatural religion. So many people believe the Bible because so few read it. It is a matter of fact that the majority of Christians allow the preachers of their respective denominations to do their thinking. As there is very little said in the Bible about music, art, science, or other achievements of this kind, I have concluded that people are farther advanced in this direction than they would be if the fact were otherwise. Still, I have heard this argued in the negative by learned Christians, who pointed to the pyramids of Egypt and the temple of Solomon as proof. They further say that Lot's wife—the pillar of salt—is standing to this day where her transformation took place. For authority they cite Dr. Livingston as an eye-witness. Through the courtesy of the Editor I will ask if this is true. It has not been my intention to argue Infidelity or Christianity, but rather to seek information.

Some Religious Meditations.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., NOV. 25, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Looking down through the ages by the aid of history, we find that religion has always been the most intolerant thing in the world; and that damnable trait seems as strong and deathless to-day as ever. Religions of all kinds are afflicted with it; but none to so great an extent as our pet superstition, Christianity. This cruel and bloody religion, with a record that throws in the shade the doings of the unspeakable Turk and the Apache Indian, has always sanctioned physical force and sought the aid of statute laws in extending its power and influence. It has never been satisfied with the moral forces found in persuasion and argument, but has insisted on being aided by the state in every possible manner. It has demanded and obtained Sunday and blasphemy laws, and its influence has been seen and felt in the enactment of others which had for their object the restriction of human rights. It never could, and cannot now, tolerate the idea of free thought and the right of every man to express his honest opinions; and when it has power to act, it will not permit freedom of thought and speech. It has done nothing in the past it would not do in the present, if not restrained by outside influences; for Christianity, without such restraints, is pure fanaticism with no respect for rights or reason. Both branches of this hellish religion, Protestant and Catholic, are the foes of intellectual liberty, and the mind of man must have its limits and restrictions where they have power to establish them. The circular method of thinking is the only one they tolerate, and that is to start with their assumed premises and swing around to conclusions that jibe with the starting-point. To strike a tangent and follow an idea that does not thus return is heresy; and heresy must be stamped out and discouraged by the iron hand of secular governments, if Christianity can insure the action of such forces.

Its only hope lies in so doing; for unless free thought and free speech—which can be suppressed in no other manner—are destroyed, intelligence will continue to dissipate the doctrines of original sin, vicarious atonement, and a red-hot hell. Truly the condition of Christianity is desperate, for its waning power carries with it a prediction of ultimate destruction; to prevent which, intelligence must, by fair means or foul, be suppressed.

The prohibition of THE TRUTH SEEKER in the Canadian mails, and the bigoted and asinine demands of two prominent organs of Christianity in this country, should rouse to action the defenders of liberty everywhere, for the attempt to muzzle the press and deny the right of free speech strikes at the root of all our liberties. From Canada, that paradise of priestcraft and abode of mental slavery, we expect little in defense of human rights; but here, in the United States, where intelligence is greater and more general; where so many marks of progress are seen in our advancement as a nation, there is reason to suppose the encroachments of religious tyranny will be met by successful resistance. But just think for a moment of the sublime gall which those Christian fanatics possess, who are crying for the suppression of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Here we are under a government that recognizes no religion, with a Constitution which guarantees free speech and a free press, and yet because those rights are exercised in a manner not pleasing to the preachers, they want the gag applied. It is evident that, in their opinion, Christians alone have those rights which the Constitution insures to all; but let them insist on the repression by law of their opponents, whom they can not answer or meet successfully in argument, and see how they come out. We have passed that period in the world's history where the church was superior to the state, and though some laws yet exist that disgrace our statute books because of their discriminating character in behalf of religion, it is not at all likely that any more will be enacted to give bigots and fanatics power to muzzle their opponents. [But they are being enacted every year.—Ed. T. S.] Without special privileges which Christianity has always had, it would decay so rapidly that its devotees would be paralyzed with astonishment. In a fair field with no favor, the triumph of Freethought would be insured beyond a doubt; for with all the great efforts to corral the children and stamp upon their plastic minds the fables of Christianity; with prayers and Bibles in many public schools, and a public press that favors in every way this absurd superstition, Freethought still gains and Christianity loses in numbers. The zenith of Christianity was long ago passed, and though it still retains its fighting characteristics and its rabid intolerance, its days of domination have fled to reappear no more. Destiny does not decree a theocracy for the future of this country, and no matter how much religious fanatics may desire it, they will never see it. A nice conflict is now on between the two great sects of Christianity, and no possibility exists of their ever uniting for warfare on Freethought. The A. P. A. movement is of great importance in widening the separation of these dual sects, and they should be encouraged in every possible manner to continue their manifestations of mutual hatred, for the more time they devote to each other, the less they will have for interference with the rights and the works of the Freethinker. Christian discord from Luther's day to ours has been a great blessing to humanity, and the bitterness with which these two classes of Christians assail each other is productive of much satisfaction. Show me a nation with one religion, said Voltaire, and I will show you a despotism; but present indications do not point to one in this country, and it is well for us they do not. While they fight among themselves Freethought is, indirectly, benefited. So let the good work proceed with vigor and persistency.

Secular Sunday-Schools.

FREMONT, WASH., NOV. 25, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The Secular Sunday school is of more importance than all else in the advancement of our cause.

Wherever there are five Liberals and five children obtainable as pupils a Secular Sunday-school can and should be started and maintained. If rightly conducted it will in every instance prove a power for good.

In organizing Secular Sunday-schools the first requisite is a self-sacrificing worker, one who loves children, one who cannot be discouraged by opposition or indifference on the part of those from whom was expected the most hearty assistance and encouragement, one content to know the good being accomplished is well worthy of all the effort made, one willing to toil and endure, confident of the grand result that at last is sure to reward every effort and sacrifice made. With such a one to act as superintendent, and with such teachers as such a true worker will inspire, the success of the school is certain, its growth and power only a question of a short time. Aim to make the exercises of the school of such interest—alike to old and young—that each and all will really want to attend, and feel sorry if, for any cause, they are unable to be present. Do not despise the day of small things. The Tacoma, Wash., Secular Sunday-school commenced with a few children and half a dozen adults, all that then could be induced to take the least interest. The Portland, Or., Secular Sunday-school, in the great city of Portland, had to be held at first in Mr. Charles Hagner's private house—seven all told. To-day there is an average attendance of sixty-five children and twenty-five adults.

The children need to be divided into classes; do not be discouraged if there is but one child in a class; make it so enjoyable to that one that it will talk of the school and the good time there, and thus induce others to attend. Provide the kindergarten class—children from 2 to 7 years old—with perforated cardboard (so that the little ones can easily put needle and bright colored worsted through) in simple outlines of cups, cats, caps, sunbonnets, pail, horse, box, dog, etc. The little ones will be delighted to do such work and be proud of its accomplishment. Procure a number of strips of bright colored pasteboard to be plaited in various forms. Five cents' worth of seed-peas—soaked over night—and a handful of toothpicks afford opportunity for development of the children's constructiveness, in making bedsteads, tables, stools, houses, fences, etc.

Class A are children from 7 to 11. Here are taken baby steps in science lesson leaves containing interesting little stories by which the children are induced to think and become familiar with the science of everyday things. Class B are children from 11 to 16. Lessons in natural philosophy are given. The Lesson Leaves are in form of question and answer, simple as possible, making very plain every difficult or unfamiliar term; inciting to thought, study, and more careful observation and investigation.

The Adult Class studies the same subject as Class B—natural philosophy. Let the chief effort be directed to making the lesson if possible more interesting and the explanations more simple and telling. From this class must come the teachers. Draw out hints and suggestions for more effectively carrying on the work of the school.

Have the opening song, class-poem, and closing song pasted on cardboards to be preserved. Keep a supply, so as to hand one to each in attendance. Always open school promptly on time. Call to order, distribute cards, and commence with the opening song (encourage all present to join in the singing), reading of minutes of preceding meeting by the secretary (giving number in each class, subject of lesson, number of visitors, and all items of interest). Then recitation in concert of the class poem by all present. Form classes (see that every one present, especially any new comers, are made welcome and properly located). Teachers at their posts; in cases of absence their places supplied. Lesson in classes twenty minutes; then all assemble together for review of the lesson by superintendent. Call for volunteers to recite "Gem of Thought," or "Thought to be Remembered," from previous lessons. In every lesson the "Gem of Thought" should be expressive of some moral truth, thus impressing on all the importance of striving to attain to better, purer, more useful, and consequently happier lives.

After review of lesson, form for calisthenic drill; let the motions be made to music if possible, and induce all, old and young, to take part. Follow with march and flag drill. March to seats, depositing flags and receiving presents, giving the children orange, apple, nuts, candy, or a glass of lemonade. It costs but a trifle, but pays well in increase of attendance.

Members, teachers, and friends should be frequently reminded to supply the superintendent with songs, duets, choruses, short poems, and recitations, copied or out from books, papers, periodicals, and magazines, so that the superintendent can furnish each pupil with just what is most suitable and the child can best do justice to; on Saturday afternoon give instructions in elocution and the proper delivery of the recitations, and drill in songs, duets, choruses, etc. One Sunday evening of each month give a musical and literary entertainment by the Sunday-school pupils. All the parents will be interested, and induce others to accompany them, and thus others will be interested in our work. Charge a small admission fee.

The one field on which the orthodox church now concentrates all its power and energy is the social; she realizes the human craving for sociability, the passion to assemble in numbers for amusement and enjoyment. Alas! how many children of Liberals have been seduced into the church by its sociability, and our neglect to provide any place of assembly or amusement. If we fail to provide Secular Sunday-schools and Secular churches our young folks are very liable to go to those provided by Christians, and form attachments prejudicial to their best interests. So long as the church can hold the keys of social life and control the religious training of the children, we may expose the fallacies of her teachings, but her influence will be undiminished. Strive to make your Secular Sunday-school the most enjoyable and the happiest place possible; be sure that in every respect, alike social and educational, it shall be far superior to any orthodox Sunday-school.

Experience has demonstrated that it is in every case an advantage to call the society a "Secular church;" by so doing much of prejudice is overcome and many privileges secured. "A rose by any other name would smell as sweet." Why permit prejudice against a name to prevent our using it, when by so doing we are greatly advantaged and no one injured?

If, among members of the Secular church and Sunday-school, there is any musical ability—vocal or instrumental—cultivate it to the utmost. There should be rehearsals one night in each week, and all who possess any musical ability be persuaded to attend, and at every such rehearsal make special efforts that every one present has a really enjoyable, jolly, social time. If there is any dramatic talent it should be carefully developed. Form an amateur dramatic club as auxiliary to the church. Establish the "Women's Auxiliary" to which women not members of the church or Sunday-school should be invited, for the discussion of the "Topics of the Times," and to unite their efforts in practical charity and benevolence, and in devising ways and means to help the Sunday-school. The monthly musical and literary entertainment should consist of music, songs, duets, choruses, recitations, and, when practical, a good farce, followed by a dance.

On the walls of the room or hall have appropriate mottoes, and pictures of distinguished scientists and Liberals; this will often lead visitors to converse on our aims and objects, serve to awaken interest and a spirit of inquiry. Have conveniently within reach sample copies of our Liberal papers and periodicals and small pamphlets to give—in extreme cases—but it is generally much better to loan than to give. Loan under most urgent entreaty to take great care of and return by specified day. The more highly they think you prize the reading matter loaned, the more interested they will be in reading it.

In summer excursions and picnics carefully planned can be made a source of revenue, as well as increasing membership both of church and Sunday-school.

There can be no more noble, glorious work than educating the children out of superstition into knowledge of science; training them to think for themselves; freeing them from the bonds of error and superstition, and helping them to become natural philosophers, that is, genuine truth seekers.

Any further help or information required will be promptly afforded by writing to Miss Nettie A. Olds, McMinnville, Or., or to myself, at Fremont, King Co., Wash.

I will furnish opening and closing songs, class poems, and first month's Lesson Leaves free to any who desire to make a real earnest effort to start schools.

There should be a Secular Sunday-school in every public school district. Surely it is worth making the effort; don't wait for some one more competent, but go to work, make a start, and help will come to you. C. B. REYNOLDS, Sec. Wash. Sec. Union, Fremont, Wash.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Wynken, Blynken, and Nod.

[No less an authority than Andrew Lang has pronounced Eugene Field's poem, "Wynken, Blynken, and Nod," one of the best, if not the very best, child poem in the English language. It is as follows:]

Wynken, Blynken, and Nod one night
Sailed off in a wooden shoe—
Sailed on a river of crystal light
Into a sea of dew.
'Where are you going and what do you wish?'
The old man asked the three.
'We have come to fish for the herring fish
That live in the beautiful sea;
Nets of silver and gold have we,'
Said Wynken,
Blynken,
And Nod.

The old moon laughed and sang a song
As they rocked in the wooden shoe,
And the wind that sped them all night long
Ruffled the waves of dew.
The little stars were the herring fish
That lived in that beautiful sea.
'Now cast your net wherever you wish—Never afeared are we.'
So cried the stars to the fishermen three—Wynken,
Blynken,
And Nod.

All night long their nets they threw
To the stars in twinkling foam.
Then down from the skies came the wooden shoe
And the voyagers were home.
Twas all so pretty a sail it seemed
As if it could not be,
And some folks thought 'twas a dream they'd dreamed
Of sailing that beautiful sea.
But I shall name you the fishermen three;
Wynken,
Blynken,
And Nod.

Wynken and Blynken are two little eyes,
And Nod is a little head,
And the wooden shoe that sailed the skies
Is a wee one's trundle bed.
So shut your eyes while mother sings
Of wonderful sights that be,
And you shall see the beautiful things
As you rock in the misty sea
Where the old shoe rocked the fishermen three—Wynken,
Blynken,
And Nod.

More About Snakes.

Having read those snake stories in the Children's Corner, I thought I would tell my snake story, which is true. We do not have many snakes on Galveston Island, and those are usually of a harmless kind, commonly called chicken and garter snakes. Chicken snakes are supposed to make their meals of both eggs and young chickens. I do not know what they exist on when the supply gives out. Last July, in my garden, I came across two young snakes which I killed. I did not know the species; they were of a uniform mottled brown color. I keep a cow and have a feed box which contains meal and bran. Rats like meal, and my cat, which is a first-class mouser and rather, could not make a showing in the decrease of the rats, which would clamber over each other in their haste to get out of sight when we went to feed the cow. I also have a honeysuckle vine on the east-end of my front gallery, where sparrows have just reveled and multiplied unmolested, and took chances with the chickens in getting the most wheat. Such was the condition of affairs around home when last July I left for Comfort, Texas, to be gone a month; a glorious month I had getting acquainted with bigger snakes (bull and water moccasins six and eight feet long), fishing for trout in the famous Guadalupe river, and hunting petrified oyster and clamshells on the mountain tops, fifteen hundred feet above the level of the sea, not forgetting the Indian arrow-heads on the hills adjoining the river. September came around, and I am home again. I visit my cow, but what has happened? The stillness of death in my feed house; no meal sack out open; I go up to my gallery—no welcome chatter of sparrows; I felt lonely. Why they had deserted me I could not think. The problem solved itself in this way: One evening we had some friends to visit us, and were sitting on our lower gallery, when a snake dropped from the upper gallery and fell half its length on the top step, but wriggled off in the darkness. An old Texan sitting by said it was a female rattler. Two days later, I lifted the ivy from the upper gallery, and his snakeship was there basking himself in the sun. I had it killed, but woe is me! I killed my best friend, for on opening him a full grown rat was found inside. Since then the sparrows have come back, and rats are on the increase. The snake was about four feet long, light-brown in color, with dark-brown stripes on his back. Could some reader inform me how non-poisonous snakes catch their game, and do female rattlesnakes have rattles or not?

Very sincerely yours,
Galveston, Tex. SARAH E. WILEY.

"Right Living" Among the Comrades of the G. A. R.

"Right Living" created quite a sensation in camp on its arrival. I got my book at noon on Monday, the 18th. You kindly put in one of your lectures with the book, so as soon as I undid the package I handed the lecture to a comrade to read. On Tuesday morning he came to me and asked: "Does the same lady who delivers this lecture write the book?"

"Yes," I told him; "same one."
"Then I am going to have it," he said, "for this is one of the most sensible lectures I ever read."

I wrote you at once to send me another book. During the forenoon I was reading to several comrades about Lincoln and the Illinois railroad, and about the old lady advising the minister which road to take. Another said: "I believe, Mr. Berry, I will take one; for I have a daughter down in Dayton who likes good reading." So I immediately wrote you to send me two books. Then, in the evening, another comrade said to me that he would take one. He also said that he had a family in Dayton, and when he read the book he would give it to them. So you see by that means the book will likely be introduced where it was never heard of before, and may be the means of selling more. How easy it is for anyone to do a kindness when they do not know or think at the time that they are really doing it!

I think that I shall be able to sell two or three more books, for every one who has looked at it so far has been favorably impressed.
JOEL M. BERRY.

National Mil. Home, O.

[The above was not written for publication, but it speaks so well for the right impulse of the human heart, that we desire to give it to our readers. We thank our friend Mr. Berry and the comrades of the G. A. R. for their interest and patronage of "Right Living." There are no braver men in this world than they who periled life and limb to preserve the liberties of this fair land. Equally as brave are those who stand ready to battle for mental liberty, for the preservation of the Constitution, and for all that makes life valuable and desirable.—ED. C. C.]

Correspondence.

ORILLIA, ONT., Nov. 23, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: To-day I received a Christian paper from Chicago, and took it to my father to see what he thought about it. He said, "It is a goodly-goody paper." I opened it and the first story was called, "How Katie Was Found Out." Oh, it was sickening. She had taken her grandfather's watch and looked at it. Her grandpa said God saw her take it, and He told him about it. Now, how could God tell him she took it? I hope this will be in print, though I cannot see it, because I am a Canadian girl. I wish some girl who has written to THE TRUTH SEEKER would write to me.
ELMA A. MOFFATT.

[We are happy to know that our girls and boys of the Corner have the ability to reason and to see how ridiculous some things are. They cannot be caught with chaff. Our religious friends keep the editor of the Corner well supplied with copies of the New York Weekly Witness, Young Crusader, and other similar papers, besides numerous tracts, and specially marked passages. We are obliged for their courtesy, but there is very little, if anything, of value in these papers. When we apply the touch of common sense, they do not stand. Our friends should learn to exercise reason and judgment.—ED. C. C.]

Health and Happiness.

VI.—FIRST CARES OF THE NEWLY-BORN.

When the child is born the attendants must not content themselves with merely wiping it. Let it be plunged into a basin of tepid water, and dried with a soft, fine piece of linen. The body is frequently covered with a fatty substance, in which case first rub the skin with olive oil, and then wash and clean it completely in the bath. Have old, clean linen, well warmed, to wipe and dry it. After the child has been washed inspect the little body to see whether there are any marks or malformations about the mouth, gums, tongue, back, arms, head, etc. Shaping or molding the head is not customary among us, though it is occasionally practiced by midwives. It was once the custom on the continent, and is still in many districts in Europe. The head should be neither pressed nor molded, though there are those who believe that by doing so they give it a more agreeable shape. These manipulations are not only useless, but for the most part dangerous. When the fontanels are large or membranous, or the sides of the head not completely developed (ossified), let the head be covered with a very light muslin cap to protect it against the curious or meddling fingers. Envelop the umbilical cord in a small compress of fine linen, and place it on the left side of the abdomen; or, better, take a small piece of linen, burn a hole in the center, and pass the umbilical cord through it. We thereby get an antiseptic action of the charred margins. Over this compress of burnt cloth lay another compress made of a few folds of linen and put a woolen bandage around the body. Let the bandage be about four fingers wide, drawn moderately tight, and tied by means of strings. The compress ought to be changed every day until the cord falls off. If the navel is red, angry looking, or inflamed, place the powder of a burnt cork on the inflamed part. When the cord has fallen off entirely, put over the navel a little compress of fine linen, of the size and form of a domino, and about the thickness, to be held in position by a bandage as above described. This is an excellent means of avoiding umbilical hernia.

In order to make the arms of the infant pass easily into the sleeves of its chemise, surround the hand with a piece of paper in the form of an old fashioned candle extinguisher without so much point (call it, if you will, "a baby manchette"); that prevents the thumb from extending and getting in the way when the child is dressing.

The infant being dressed in its little chemise, or swaddling, either the one or the other ought to be provided with strings behind, avoiding the use of pins. Some put a bandage over that, about two fingers in width, below the armpits, wrapping it round the body without tightening it too much. The lower part of the bandage ought not to be drawn so tight; it should be arranged in such a manner that the child may be able to move its limbs. Never inclose the arms of the newly-born in the bandage. As soon as the infant is dressed, it is recommended by some to give it a teaspoonful or two of sugar-water; then put it in its cradle, on its right side. The right side is preferable during the first few days of its life. The mother, or nurse, ought not to have the infant sleep with her in the same bed, for the reason, as previously stated, that it is likely to be inadvertently smothered.

Form and Composition of the Cradle.—The cradle generally in use at the present day combines pretty nearly all the qualities desirable—that is, comfort, hygiene, and solidity. Whether of iron, wood, or wickerwork, they should always be somewhat elevated from the floor, supported by feet. Cradles not raised in this manner, but simply resting on the floor, should not, under any circumstance, be used, as they expose the infant to humidity, draught, etc., and leave them within easy reach of domestic animals. In recent years cradles are so constructed as to close entirely; that is to say, the upper portion is so fashioned that it can be lifted up by a string into a sort of hood—resembling the hood of a carriage—or kind of cradle-parachute, so that the nursing is in perfect security. One or two mattresses of straw or hay, or a little mattress of horsehair, or of varec, composes the bed and forms the base of the cradle, the mattress being covered with a suitable woolen blanket and sheet. The sheeting, or cotton cloth, out of which the sack is made which contains the hay or straw, should have a longitudinal slit in it, so as to permit the stirring up and airing of the contents. In case it becomes moist or wet, it is best to expose it to the sun or a current of air. The pillows should always be made of horsehair, varec, or hay. Feathers, oilcloth, caoutchouc, sheepskin, old clothes, that are frequently placed under children, should by no means be used on account of the heat, bad odor, humidity, etc., which they maintain in the cradle. If there are curtains to the cradle, they should be of light material that will not intercept the passage of air. Care should be taken not to cover the infant too heavily. The little ones are generally in a state of perspiration, which not only enfeebles them, but makes them susceptible to cold the moment they are taken out of their beds.

Occasionally it will be found necessary to warm the nursing in its cradle during winter. For this purpose use a rubber bag, a bottle of either lead or stone filled with warm water, well secured and wrapped in a piece of flannel, placed at the foot of the cradle. This produces a gentle and agreeable heat and the infant need not be overloaded with covering. Never place a heated brick or an iron in the cradle. The material in which it is wrapped is inflammable and may set the cradle on fire. Such accidents have occurred, and nurslings have perished through such imprudence.

When the infant grows sleepy it should not be taken in the arms of the nurse, or placed on the knees, as is frequently done. Put it into its cradle; it is much better off there than elsewhere. Thus the child becomes habituated to sleep in its bed, which is the earliest kind of training or discipline it receives. In proportion as the child grows, the less sleep it requires. The nursing should, however, not rest continually in its cradle; exercise is requisite. This is given by carrying it about on the arm. Promenading diverts its attention and gives it strength. The weather being pleasant and agreeable, every opportunity should be taken to have babies out in the air.

NEW BOOKS

BY

ROBT G. INGERSOLL

Some Reasons Why. Pap., 25c.

A New Lecture never before in print. Contents: Some Reasons Why. Duties to God. Inspiration. God's Experiment With the Jews. Civilized Countries. A Comparison of Books. The New Testament. Christ's Mission. Eternal Pain.

Foundations of Faith. 25 cents.

A Consideration of the Old and New Testaments, and the Doctrines upon which the Christian Religion is founded. A new lecture delivered for the first time in the fall of 1895. Large, handsome pamphlet.

The Field-Ingersoll Discussion. Price, paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

In 1888 the Rev. Dr. Henry M. Field wrote an open letter to Colonel Ingersoll, with the intent to convert him. The letter was published in the North American Review, and was replied to by the person addressed. All our older readers know the value of this discussion. To those who do not remember it we can only say that they should lose no time in procuring a copy if they want a controversial treat.

The Ingersoll-Gladstone Controversy about Christianity. Price, paper, 25 cts; cloth, 50 cts.

When the Field-Ingersoll Controversy closed in the North American Review the Christians felt that their champion had been very badly worsted in argument, and the publishers of the Review engaged the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone to attempt to rehabilitate the Presbyterian creed. He wrote a long letter to Colonel Ingersoll, to which the latter replied at length and, it is generally agreed, completely demolished the greatest controversialist Christianity can produce. These letters are now for the first time available in pamphlet form.

Myth and Miracle. Price, 25c.

This is one of Colonel Ingersoll's best lectures, but never before put into print. Everyone who has heard it will most certainly want it, and those who have not heard it will have a rare treat in its perusal, as something new from the Colonel, which also is something that everybody is looking for.

Which Way? Price, 25 cents.

This lecture is a consideration of the difference between the natural and the supernatural, and some reasons why the former is the best way to go. Perhaps no one of Colonel Ingersoll's orations has won more general applause from enlightened audiences than this. It contains that most magnificent of perceptions, his visions — "This was. This is. This shall be." The lecture was never before printed in pamphlet form. It is splendid. Send for it.

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

OTTO WETTSTEIN,
ROCHELLE, ILL.

Gems of Thought.

INTELLIGENCE forbids us to follow any banner where truth and justice do not lead.—E. Stillman Doubleday.

THE sense of rights, by whose sympathetic excitement men are led to behave justly toward one another, is the same sense of right by which they are prompted to assert their own claims—their own freedom to exercise their faculties—and to resist every encroachment. This impulse brooks no restraint, save that imposed by fellow-feeling.—Herbert Spencer.

I DEAL with human nature, and I am concerned only with the spiritual and mental sides of man. I have no sympathy whatever with the pet schemes of social and political reform—such theories as Henry George's and Edward Bellamy's do not attract me in the least. I aim to influence the mind and thoughts of men, to create characters and individuals. If I can make the people think rightly, then all the rest will follow without legislation, without restriction.—Ibsen, as reported in an Interview.

No ONE blames a man for doubting on the issue of a war, a law suit, a horse race, or other speculation. If the subject be one upon which men can reason, which they can perfectly understand, doubt is quite innocent and proper. It is only in religion and religious mystery that doubt is dubbed immoral and denounced as a damning sin. Where you can understand doubt is permissible and may be a virtue; but in a matter wherein your reason can never play a part doubt is most damnable.—Joseph Symes.

WITH authority, punishment will pass away. This will be a great gain—a gain, in fact, of incalculable value. As one reads history, not in the expurgated editions written for schoolboys and passmen, but in the original authorities of each time—one is absolutely sickened, not by the crimes that the wicked have committed, but by the punishments that the good have inflicted; and a community is infinitely more brutalized by the habitual employment of punishment than it is by the occasional occurrence of crime.—Anon.

WHATEVER men may think about ideal Christianity, Christianity as it existed in Europe up to the seventeenth century was, from any standpoint—moral, intellectual, or economic—the most pronounced failure ever recorded since the pathetic story of man began. The church could save nothing but itself. It did not attempt to save man for this world. Its aim was to smooth his passage to the next. Men were at the mercy of pestilence, famine, and disease. When the sailors of Columbus returned from the West Indies they brought with them a frightful and nameless disease. That disease at once spread over all Europe. No class was exempt. Rich and poor, the clergy and the laity, ruler and beggar, it smote them all. Such was the frightful immorality of the times.—Rev. J. E. Roberts.

So LONG as a Bible is put into the people's hands, professing to be the inspired word of God, and at the same time abounding in contradictions and obscurities, so long will men of different temperaments and different inclinations draw from it opposing doctrines. And as these doctrines are supposed to be beyond the jurisdiction of human reason, they can only be supported or destroyed by an appeal to the very documents from which they are drawn. There is the primary farce of setting up a self-contradictory volume as the oracle of truth, and the secondary farce of trying to reconcile these contradictions from the very volume that produced them. So that there is no hope, in matters of religious controversy, of that ultimate agreement upon a given question, which is an inevitable stage in the development of science.—Wm. Roberts, in Free Review.

VOLTAIRE was the champion of the oppressed and the helpless. He was the Cæsar to whom the victims of church and state appealed. He stood for the intellect and the heart of his time. And yet for a hundred and fifty years those who love their enemies have exhausted the vocabulary of hate, the ingenuity of malice and mendacity, in their efforts to save their stupid creeds from the genius of Voltaire. From a great height he surveyed the world. His horizon was large. He had some vices—these he shared in common with priests—his virtues were his own. He was in favor of universal education—of the development of the brain. The church despised him. He wished to put the knowledge of the whole world within the reach of all. Every priest was his enemy. He wished to drive from the gate of Eden the cherubim of superstition, so that the children of Adam might return and eat of the fruit of the tree of knowledge. The church opposed this because it had the fruit of the tree of ignorance for sale.—Ingersoll.

A PRACTICAL DEMONSTRATION.—Smythe: "I hear that Dr. Fourthly preached against the stage for two mortal hours last Sunday." Tompkins: "Yes; it was a very effective discourse. Every one present has been dead against continuous performances ever since."—Puck.

THE late Dean Stanley used to relate that a gentleman once called to tell him that he had been into the abbey, and had knelt down to pray, when the verger came up to him and told him he must not kneel there. On asking why not, the verger said: "Why, sir, if I was once to allow it, we should have them praying all over the place." This recalls the gentleman visiting a church, and asking the sexton whether people ever used it for private prayer, to which he replied: "I ketch'd two of 'em at it once."—Argonaut.

A WITTY and popular New York clergyman had a laughable experience recently. One Sunday lately, just as he was going up the steps of his church, he was asked by an old lady—who did not know him well enough to recognize him in the street—to help her up the steps. This he did with courtesy grace. On reaching the top the old lady asked who was going to preach that day. "Rev. Mr. Blank," he replied, giving his own name. "Oh, Lord!" exclaimed the old lady, "help me down again. I'd rather listen to a man sharpening a saw. Please help me down again. I reckon I won't go in." The clergyman smilingly complied, remarking as he left her, "I wouldn't go in either were I not paid for it."

WE take pleasure in informing our readers that we have secured as an assistant young Mr. Clarence Hornbeak, who has in the past acted as our regular correspondent at Rocket City, and at the same time contributed some brilliant sensational news items to several of the Kansas City and St. Louis dailies. He is the author of the sensation that was so widely copied in the Eastern papers, which was to the effect that, shortly after the return of John Soeysmith, a penitent prodigal, a violent thunderstorm arose and lightning killed a calf on the farm where John's parents reside, hit the family Bible, opened it at the fifteenth chapter of Luke, and marked the twenty-third verse, which reads as follows: "And bring hither the fatted calf and kill it, and let us eat and be merry." Mr. Hornbeak will make a specialty of acting as society, snake, and pickle-dish editor of this paper, and all social, sensational, and zoological matters of interest will be handled by him in his usual brilliant and masterly style.—Puck.

FATHER O'HALLORAN had a telephone put into the parsonage in connection with the church and the parochial school. Patrick McFee, his reverence's handy man, was instructed in the use of the instrument, and it was only the next day, when Pat, dusting out the church, heard the ringing of the telephone bell. Taking down the receiver, Patrick was pleased to hear Father O'Halloran's familiar voice asking him something or other about his work. In essaying to answer he remembered that his reverence was a long way off, and therefore he shouted into the transmitter at the top of his voice. "I don't understand you, Patrick," said the telephone. Patrick tried again with no better success. On his third trial he came near splitting the telephone, but again came Father O'Halloran's voice, "I can't hear what you're saying, Patrick." Pat had by this time lost something of his patience, and, as he stood gathering his breath for a fourth blast, he couldn't refrain from soliloquizing in a low tone: "Ah, may the devil fly away wid the ould fool!" But Pat dropped the telephone like a hot potato and fell to his knees in dismay when he heard Father O'Halloran's voice once again: "Now I hear you perfectly, Patrick."—Boston Transcript.

HERE is a story that George W. Monroe, who is starring this season in "A Happy Little Home," vouches for: "I attended the dedication of a new Catholic church in Sayville, R. I., the other Sunday," he says. "Father McDermott, a friend of mine, who is the rector there, had worked very long and hard to raise necessary funds for its erection. This, coupled with the fact that among the contributors were three Protestant ministers of different denominations (Presbyterian, Episcopal, and Methodist), who had signified their intention to be present at the ceremonies, served to bring together an extraordinarily large crowd. Just before the services began the three ministers walked in and found there was not a seat to be had. Father McDermott discovered them standing at the back, and calling his sexton, a little Killarney man who rejoices in the name of McGinty, he whispered to him: 'Get three chairs for the Protestants.' 'Do you mane it?' asked McGinty, a look of astonishment spreading over his freckled face.

'Of course I do,' said Father McDermott; 'and be quick about it.' 'All right,' answered McGinty, 'I'll do it if you say so, but the Lord save my soul!' and jumping on the altar he shouted at the top of his voice: 'Ladies and gentlemen, Father McDermott wants ye to giv three cheers for the Protestants—hip, hip, hooroo!'

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

OUR CHAMPION—SET 'EM UP AGAIN, BRETHREN!

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, ; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

SPECIMEN PRESS NOTICES.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

PIANOS, PIANOS!

$225; - $250; - $275.

After years of earnest study and experiments, Mr. Adam Schaaf, of Chicago, one of the oldest and most experienced piano manufacturers of this country, has produced what is believed to be the most perfect Upright Piano ever constructed. The instrument is thus described:

"The volume of tone is fully equal to any of the best Square Grand Pianos, while the quality is of the most exquisite musical character—pure, sympathetic, and in the highest degree pliable. Its durability and its capacity for standing in tune, is unparalleled in the history of piano-making. In a word, this piano is made to stand, not merely as an ornamental piece of furniture (it is finished in the most artistic and handsome style), but as a musical instrument—not for a day, but for a lifetime."

These pianos received the highest honors at the World's Fair; Mr. GEORGE STECK, Judge of Awards, the best living authority on pianos, reporting as follows:

"This exhibit deserves an award for excellent tone quality, sustaining power, well planned scale, and excellent action, with easy, prompt touch. Material and workmanship are superior."

The distinguished Pianist and Composer, SIGNOR FABIANI, of the Paris Conservatory, says:

"I have used the Adam Schaaf Pianos, and have critically studied their merits, compared them with those of the best American and European makers, and I find them unsurpassed for quality and variety of tone, responsiveness of touch, elegance of appearance, and reliability in every way."

Having made special arrangements with the manufacturer, who is our personal friend, to introduce these superb pianos, we are prepared to offer them to TRUTH SEEKER readers at the above marvelously low prices—from $50 to $150 less than dealers ask for inferior instruments. Every piano is warranted for five years, and the purchaser is not required to pay for it until delivered. We will pay the freight to any station within 1,000 miles of Chicago. Full description of instruments sent on application.

If you or any of your friends contemplate buying a piano it will be to your interest to correspond with us.

Fun for His Satanic Majesty.

Salvation by noise is nothing new in religious annals. But on Nov. 23d there was held near Rome, Ga., a rather curious tournament. The chief contestants were not, as the innocent reader might naturally suppose, the spirit of God and the evil one, nor yet the ministers of the Lord and certain blasphemers of the holy word. They were, on the contrary, two bands of women, lovely women, belonging to two rival divisions of the church militant. For a week a debate had been in progress between Rev. Mr. Byrd, of the Christian church, and Rev. Mr. Blalock, of the Missionary Baptists. Every day they had met in the court house, and before large audiences each had praised the creed of his own denomination and mercilessly exposed the deficiencies and evil dogmas of the other shepherd's chart of eternal life. It is said that at the conclusion of the discussion there were enough split hairs lying about to furnish ample filling for a considerable number of mattresses. A dispatch to the Atlanta Constitution says that "toward the last the battle became so obstinate that some exceedingly vigorous language was used." This we can well believe, but it does not appear that any one was pounded to death on this occasion, as sometimes happened in the most Christian Councils which determined by ballot and muscle what books should go into the Bible for succeeding generations of Christians to quarrel about. By Sunday the fever of religious fervor was very high. The Baptist sisters planned to have a great demonstration, "a regular jubilee of prayer and praise." But the scheme was betrayed to the enemy, and the Christian church women called out the reserves—but there was no reserve in the way they shouted! However, we anticipate. At the close of Mr. Blalock's last speech, "at a given signal the leader of the Baptists opened up and the other sisters joined in." Then they were painfully surprised. The Christian women were ready, and at the word they took part in the noise contest. The devil sat upon a window-sill and laughed until his sides ached. The scene is described as one such as those present had never before beheld. But the Christian women carried the day. "Numerically they were the weaker, but in enthusiasm and lung power they made up for the disparity in numbers. The Christian preacher delivered the last speech, and then "Blalock returned to Tennessee and Byrd to Dalton, each claiming that he had vanquished his opponent." As to the number of souls saved by the match game of sound, that matter has been lost sight of in the excitement which "still runs very high among the Murray county folks." But the devil is laughing yet.

Modern Christian Apologetics.

Between the orthodox Christian position that the Bible is the inerrant word of an infinit God and the Rationalist position that it is the imperfect production of finite men, there is irreconcilable contradiction. It follows, then, that if the Christian world admits that the Bible was made by man it surrenders the citadel of revelation, and Christianity, as a system of supernatural religion, goes into bankruptcy. In the light of this truth, what are we to think of the reasoning abilities or the sincerity of Christian apologists who now adduce the fact of the human origin of the Bible as a defense of Christianity, and assert, both inferentially and by direct statement, that Infidels, having accused God of teaching polygamy and murder through the Bible, are now out of court because it is proved that God did not write the Bible? Could self-stultification and absurd misrepresentation of opponents further go?

The Times, of Minneapolis, Minnesota, is one of the ablest and fairest papers in the Northwest, and yet it sometimes has editorials that are simply amazing in their puerility, and that are most unjust in stating the views, or the alleged views, of Freethinkers. In its issue of November 24th it has a long criticism of "Ingersoll and His Methods." It begins with the expression of its admiration of the orator and citizen, and proceeds to denounce the "skeptic, the iconoclast, the eloquent advocate." It describes him as a "prosecuting attorney, with a case against the Almighty, and a mission to destroy the 'Foundations of Faith.'" Does the Times, like the theocratic organs, need to be told that no Freethinker has "a case against the Almighty"; that Freethinkers are fighting, not a god or gods, but the imaginings of men which dreamers call the Will or Word of God? As to the "foundations of faith," if there are such foundations, established by infinit truth and goodness, no Infidel can move them; but so far the alleged "foundations of faith" have been traced to nothing more substantial than the fancies of mystics.

Ingersoll, we are told, has "musical mannerisms"; he is "the greatest phrase-maker of his time"; he constantly plays an "exquisite fugue of domestic love and universal liberty and brotherhood"; "he adds to borrowed reason an artificial sentimentalism"; "he is the apostle of the shallow"; "he bedizens impiety with pretty words"; "he answers an organ tone with a jingle, a poem with a jibe"; "he is a phrase-huckster preaching the gospel of unrest, a moment brawling at eternity," and "he buffets at the form because the essence is beyond him." All of which is mildly amusing in its way, but it does not answer the Freethinker's argument nor dispose of the facts to which he calls the Christian's attention. While we must admit that Mr. Ingersoll, like all other men, is but a moment, and while we might even concede, just to please the Times, that the exhibition of "musical mannerisms" and the playing of an "exquisite fugue" are not out of harmony with "brawling," we must sadly but firmly refuse to recognize as true the assertion that Ingersoll is "brawling at eternity." The fantastic theories of Jewish and Christian creed-makers are not eternity, by any means.

After saying all that we have just quoted, and much more of the same nature, the Times inconse-quentially adds: "And yet no man has done more to injure Christianity." It is passing strange that Christianity, assumed to be the expression of eternal truth, has been so damaged by "a moment brawling at eternity." It is wonderful that God should have permitted his divine religion to be shattered by a mere "phrase-huckster." However, there is doubt in the matter, for less than forty lines farther along the editor forgets this admission and declares that through the changes in Christian beliefs wrought by Ingersoll and his fellow-critics "Christianity has advanced to firmer ground." The apologist neglects to inform us how Mr. Ingersoll could injure Christianity and yet advance it to firmer ground. We cannot escape the suspicion that the Christianity that was so badly injured and the Christianity that now stands on firmer ground are not the same Christianity.

"As for his arguments, they are not new; the basis of his declamatory unbelief is old as human thought. Voltaire sneered before him; Volney philosophized before him; Tom Paine railed and jeered before him. They were hard, logical, analytical, steril. He covers the hardness and sterility with the flowers of rhetoric."

If the great age of the arguments used by Colonel Ingersoll militate against their strength, what must be the weakness of the dogmas which he attacks? If a criticism is old, older must be that which is criticised. The book precedes the review of the book. Older than the searching criticisms of Celsus, and Voltaire, and Paine, and Ingersoll, are the theological notions that they have riddled with the shot of logic and science. Then, again, "Voltaire sneered before him"? Yes; he sneered at fraud and superstition and cruel priests. Is that any reason why Mr. Ingersoll should not sneer at the same? Has fraud become honesty, superstition been transformed into knowledge, and cruelty flowered into mercy with the lapse of years? "Volney philosophized before him"? Yes; and where then there was one Volney there are now thousands who hold to the principles he formulated or reformed, modified only by the greater scientific light of the present. Because Volney exposed the religious sophistries current in his time is no reason why Ingersoll should not expose the religious sophistries current to-day. "'Tom' Paine railed and jeered before him"? Yes; if it pleases you to characterize Paine's common sense arguments as railing and jeering? The epithets will not hurt him—neither will they add to your credit as a Christian apologist. The "Higher Criticism" which you apparently accept has already gone farther along on the way which Paine indicated long ago. With comparatively few exceptions, the men of education in the Protestant Christian church of this age have repudiated about all against which the "Author-Hero" "railed and jeered." Ingersoll has no reason to be ashamed of the company of the great world patriot and pioneer humanitarian. "They were hard"? Perhaps; they lived in a hard age, an age of unvenured Christianity; it required men of iron will and dauntless courage to face a church that hesitated never in the choice of weapons, whose hands were red and whose garments were clotted with the blood of heretics and witches. The hour demanded granite-hard men, not milksops. Voltaire and Volney and Paine were the men for the hour. And yet there have lived no men who had ears more sensitive to the cry of pain, more quick to strike down the sword of the tyrant and wrest away the lash of the slave-driver. They were "logical"? Yes; a deadly offense in the eyes of Christian apologists, medieval and modern. They were "analytical"? Yes; to the cost of the church. "Steril"? Never; rather, so fertile were they that, without the Christian label, you would take the great majority of latter-day Protestant scholars to be their lineal descendants.

Now we are coming to the absurd position indicated in the first paragraph of our article—that is, that as the errors in the Bible are the mistakes of men, Christianity is not affected by proving the Bible to be a human production. Mr. Ingersoll, it is said, has “made havoc with a number of antiquated dogmas which Christianity is well rid of.” It would be just as rational to say that Christianity would be well rid of itself, for the “antiquated dogmas” which it has been forced by outside criticism to slough off include nearly every fundamental tenet of Christianity. The six days’ creation, the fall of man, the Noachian flood, the virgin birth, the bodily resurrection, verbal inspiration (implying an infallible revelation), eternal hell—all have gone or are rapidly going.

“With the practical abandonment of the inspiration theory, and the acceptance of the historical portions of the Bible as history, subject to the errors of fact and opinion which belong to history, to the alterations of time and the progress of humanity, Christianity has advanced to firmer ground. If what men have given as God’s utterances were true, then the old charge, which has traveled down the years and found its latest lodgment in Ingersoll’s mouth, that God teaches polygamy and murder, is true. And not until reason was consulted and those passages in the Old Testament accepted as only the utterances of fallible men, was Christianity in a position to fight back.”

Of course this is simply stupid, but if Freethinkers noticed only such arguments of their opponents as were not stupid they would have very little to criticize. It seems incredible that an educated man should make the assertion that Ingersoll claims that “God” teaches polygamy and murder, or that this “old charge” was made by Freethinkers in centuries past. The merest tyro in discussion ought to know that Rationalists have constantly maintained that the imperfections found in the Bible prove that it was not written by a perfect God, that it is the work of men. Upon these imperfections rests the inductive argument against the inspiration of the scriptures. Freethinkers have ever insisted that the Bible should be judged by the same rules that are applied in estimating the value of any other book. It has been demonstrated a million times that if a god did write the Bible or inspire its writing, then that god is the author of all its false and immoral teachings, is to be debited with all the ignorance, superstition, cruelty, and blood-lust found therein. The Christian has ever been in this dilemma: He must admit either that the Bible was written by men or that the God claimed to have written it was grossly ignorant, vindictively unjust, utterly incompetent, atrociously cruel. Now we are coolly told that the Freethinker says that God teaches various immoral doctrines, when, in fact, it is the Christian who says it when he affirms that the Bible was inspired by an all-powerful and all-wise God. It has been the work of the Freethinker to make the Christian see the absurdity of his own contention, and now that he sees it at last he audaciously asserts that he alone sees it! They were not far out of the way who said that the time would come when the church would accept Ingersoll as one of its brightest lights and vociferously proclaim itself the discoverer of the human origin of the Bible.

For centuries the Rationalist has been consulting reason and trying to make the Christian understand that his fetish was made by men like unto himself, and now that the fact has at last effected a lodgment in his mind the Bibliolater right about faces and smirkingly announces that owing to this remarkable Christian discovery “Christianity is in a position to fight back!” In a position to fight back? But when it is conceded that Christianity is an evolution, what reason is there for fighting back? Then Christianity, as a revealed system of religion, has surrendered, and hereafter its apologists, no longer armed with the “sword of the spirit” and the “Word of God,” must do battle with the purely secular weapons of science and reason.

“Contradictions are taking their proper places, as errors of man.” Exactly; just where the Rationalist has been insisting that they should be ranged. But proving them to be the errors of men does not take them out of the Bible and hence does not strengthen the ridiculous claim that that collection of more or less ancient documents is the Word of God.

The Passing of a Pioneer.

N. D. Goodell, of Sacramento, Cal., in his eighty-second year, has passed away. He was one of the pioneers of California, and emigrated to the Pacific coast from Belchertown, Mass., in 1849. With the Puritan blood in his veins, for more than half a century he has been a pronounced Freethinker. He has occupied a leading position in Sacramento since 1860. An architect by profession, he built some of the finest structures, both public and private, in the capital of California. The funeral was largely attended, and Mr. Goodell was honored by all the people of whatsoever belief. Says the Sacramento Record-Union:

“Mr. Goodell left behind him an enviable reputation for honesty, uprightness, good citizenship, and unostentation. Everybody knew him, and all respected and loved him. He was adored by his family, who deeply feel their loss. Mrs. Goodell and one daughter, Mrs. H. C. Botsford, of San Francisco, survive him.

“Many an old pioneer’s eye grew dim when reference was made to the sterling character and geniality of their comrade, in whose company they had spent so many hours in the long years of their association with him. Hallowed memories were revived of the ‘days of old’ when he and they were beginning life anew in the Golden state.”

N. D. Goodell had been for many years a subscriber of THE TRUTH SEEKER. His hospitable home has always been open to the Liberal worker, and he was a staunch supporter of Freethought while published at San Francisco. Long will he dwell in the memories of his co-workers; his genial and sturdy virtues will shine in the annals of his adopted state, and in the history of Freethought.

S. P. P.

The Treachery and Crimes of Sunday Law Enforcers.

One Sunday recently Gustav Schultz, doing business at 873 Third avenue, this city, had pulled down the curtains at 10 o’clock and was preparing to close at that hour, when in rushed Detective John T. Prunty with an unlighted cigar in his mouth and exclaimed: “I want a box of matches.” Schultz handed the sneak the matches and then found himself under arrest, and passed the night in the station house. Of another sneak, a regular policeman, the Sun of November 25th narrates this disgraceful story:

“Policeman O’Connor, of the McDougal Street station, after putting on plain clothes yesterday, rang the door bell of Louis Bredenstein, who lives over his saloon at 455 West Broadway. When Bredenstein opened the door, O’Connor, who is sickly looking, pretended to be gasping for breath.

“‘What do you want?’ the saloon-keeper asked.

“‘Friend, I’d like to get a drink,’ gasped the policeman.

“‘I can’t give you a drink to-day,’ said Bredenstein. ‘Don’t you know it’s Sunday?’

“‘I know that,’ replied O’Connor, ‘but I’m sick. You can see that for yourself.’

“‘You certainly do look sick,’ said the saloon-keeper sympathizingly, ‘but I can’t break the law.’

“‘For God’s sake, man, don’t turn me away,’ pleaded the apparent invalid. ‘I’m so sick that I must have a drink.’

“‘This was too much for Bredenstein. He invited the spurious sick man into the hall and, unlocking his saloon door, went behind the bar and poured out a big drink of whisky. He brought it back to the shamming policeman, who drank it slowly, and appeared to feel much relieved. The saloon-keeper took the empty glass out into the barroom and washed it. When he returned O’Connor put his hand on his shoulder and said:

“‘I arrest you for violating the excise law.’

“‘What!’ shouted the saloon-keeper, ‘you don’t mean to say that you’re an officer?’

“‘That’s what I am,’ said O’Connor.

“Bredenstein was taken to the McDougal Street station and then to Jefferson Market court. When arraigned before Magistrate Simms he told of the circumstances under which his arrest was made. He denounced his arrest as an outrage, and said that he had tried not to violate the law since it had begun to be enforced.

“‘Is this man’s story true?’ said Magistrate Simms, addressing O’Connor.

“‘Yes,’ replied the policeman, his face turning red.

“‘Officer, I am surprised,’ said the magistrate severely. ‘This man has certainly been guilty of a violation of the law; but a man wearing the uniform of the New York police department that will resort to such a low piece of trickery as to play on the sympathy of a citizen in order to make him violate the law is certainly no honor to the force, and, moreover, will never make a good officer. This man was willing to keep the law, but by your persistence and false representations, you induced him to violate it. I regret that I have to hold him for trial.’

“Bredenstein was later released on bail. He hurried home to his wife, who is ill.”

But the magistrate’s rebuke will do no good while the policeman’s chiefs in Mulberry street wink at his crimes and while the Sunday law, in any form, remains to put clubs into the hands of bullies and skeleton keys into the hands of legalized house-breakers. If any occupation is a crime on Sunday it is a crime on all days, and if it is not a crime on other days it is not a crime on Sunday. The police can properly arrest only for the commission or the imminent commission of crime.

Something for Colonel Ingersoll’s Friends.

We have made a lot of glass paper weights with the photograph of Colonel Ingersoll in them which we can furnish for 50 cents each. The picture is a very good one, the weight is heavy, and every Freethinking business man ought to have two or three on his desk to hold his papers down. The ladies will of course be pleased with so handsome an ornament for center-table or mantel. In the library, too, and wherever there are papers to hold down, it will come handy, as well as being a souvenir of the greatest heretic in the world. Sent by mail or express prepaid for 50 cents.

In the city election at Fall River, Mass., on December 3d the Editor of our Children’s Corner, Miss Susan H. Wixon, was elected school trustee for a term of three years. There were four candidates, and the three receiving the most votes were elected. Miss Wixon stood next to the highest, above the Rev. Mr. Lyman. The vote was as follows: Bennett, 7,292; Wixon, 6,506; Lyman, 6,192; Brady, 4,101. This is a signal triumph for so pronounced a Freethinker as Susan Wixon in so orthodox a city as Fall River. We extend to her the felicitations of the whole Truth Seeker family.

The daily papers report that the state superintendent of schools of Minnesota was recently asked whether it was permissible to open the public schools with the Lord’s Prayer. The question was referred to Attorney-General Childs, who has rendered an opinion in which he holds that such service would be in violation of Section 16 of the state constitution, which prohibits the granting of any privileges to any form of religion. We do not know who sent the inquiry to the superintendent; it may have been the counsel of Mr. S. J. Flecken, although a query coming from him would more likely have had relation to the reading of the Bible in the schools. As the case is reported, the ruling shuts out religious exercises, but the next attorney general may reverse the decision of his predecessor and so give the church the innings. It would have been better, perhaps, if the opinion of Mr. Childs had been favorable to the Christians, thus giving a chance for the Secularists to appeal to the highest court in the state. But possibly the church party will now take the appeal, which will be just as well. We hope to have fuller particulars before our next issue goes to press.

There have been more arrests of Seventh Day Adventists in Ontario for working on Sunday. Among those arrested was the pastor of the Adventist church. He was working on the new church building. The opposition set fire to and burned three thousand feet of lumber put on the premises for the proposed church. Later, the good Christian enemies of the Adventists evidently came to the conclusion that it would be safer to attack their victims under the forms of law. Hence these prosecutions. The spirit that prompted the burning of the lumber was the same that led to the enactment of the Sabbath law. In one case we have illegal violence resorted to for the propagation of the "divine truths" of Christianity, and in the other case we have legal violence. The difference is in the form only; the essence of invasion is the same.

"Bishop Nicholas has been instructed by the Holy Synod of St. Petersburg to build a cathedral in Chicago to cost not less than $500,000." So says a press dispatch. The cathedral must cover an acre of ground; the architecture must follow the established lines of the ecclesiastical forms of Russia, and the priest-house will be the home of the head of the denomination in the Western world. With the land covered, this piece of church property will represent a handsome sum of money exempt from taxation. It is one more concrete reason why the Freethought Federation should be amply sustained in its work for the secularization of the state.

"Laporte, Ind., Nov. 22.—David L. Pearson, living near New Buffalo, has become insane through the belief that the recent earthquake was the beginning of the end of the world. Miss Alice Pearson, aged eighteen, his daughter, was also affected by the strange hallucination and has been adjudged insane."

It was not so very long ago that the belief among Christians that earthquakes and other natural convulsions presaged the end of the world was not regarded as a "strange hallucination" by any means. And "end of the world" meant not merely the destruction of the earth, but the coming of the Great Judgment, when all who were in their graves and the multitudes of the living should be summoned to the bar of God, there to answer for the sins done in the flesh, the righteous to be transported thence to the resplendent heaven of the "saved," and the wicked—an immeasurably greater multitude—to be hurled into the gaping mouth of the bottomless pit, where the worm of agony should never die and the flames of undying death should burn forever. It is more than probable that the "end of the world" which frightened David L. Pearson and his daughter into insanity was this same figment of the theological imagination.

"Ingersoll takes away, but he gives nothing for that which is taken. He would destroy Christianity. But after he has taken reverence from the heart of women, after silence has succeeded prayer on the lips of childhood, after hope of immortality has flown from the tired brain of age, after the crucifix is snatched from the rapt eyes of the dying, what will he substitute that will satisfy reverent souls?"—Minneapolis Times.

How can one drive from the brain of man a falsehood without putting in its place the truth which proved it a falsehood? As to taking "reverence from the heart of women," it might be deemed necessary to know why she any more than man should retain reverence for myths. Then the heart's function is to circulate the blood, not to retain or reject reverence; the brain will attend to that part of the business. There is no good reason why children should be taught falsehoods to unlearn in later life; they must come to know sooner or later that only their fellows, and their own exertions, can answer their prayers. They will respect us all the more and their lot in life will be easier if we do not consciously deceive them. If the human entity is immortal, it is so as a fact in nature, not because we cling to the belief that it is immortal, against all opposing evidence, merely to furnish an anchor of hope for "reverent souls." Not what "reverent souls" fancy ought to be, but what is can be cognized by man. The "rapt eyes of the dying" believer may gaze on the crucifix for all that we shall do to hinder, but to many of us there has come too strong a conviction of certain facts in the universe for us to have any desire to look in the unescapable hour of death upon a symbol of the non-existent. We would rather see the faces of our loved ones than two crossed pieces of wood or ivory held in the hand of a liberty-stabbing priest.

At Oskaloosa, Kansas, it was announced that the meetings at the Gospel tent would be closed Sunday evening by a lecture, entitled, "From the Ballroom to Hell," with an admission fee of twenty-five cents—to the tent, not to hell. That suggests two or three queries: If it is wrong to work and engage in trade on Sunday, how does it become right for the god-spellers to make money by selling seats on Sunday in their tent? If it is legal for them to take twenty-five cents at the door on Sunday evening, why is it not legal for any other performers to do the same? Is it "moral" to announce such a subject—"From the Ballroom to Hell"—a subject which is always handled in a sensational manner by clergymen and which was selected simply because of its broad suggestion of salaciousness? But it was a good business stroke—such an announcement is sure to bring out the deacons and the boys.

Ingersoll Unconverted.

From the New York Sun.

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll found a heavy mail from the Christian Endeavorers who have been praying for him in convention when he returned home from his Western trip, and he said last night to the Sun reporter: "No, I have not been converted by their prayers, I am glad to say, and there is no occasion for taking a 'before and after' picture of me."

"Why glad?" asked the Sun reporter.

"I want to finish my days without the consolation of a hell," said the Colonel, looking very solemn, though there is nothing in his appearance to indicate that his days are likely to be finished for half a century more.

"Did it annoy you to have the Endeavorers take such a public interest in your conversion?"

"Dear me, no," said Colonel Ingersoll. "They meant it kindly and for my good. The only difference of opinion that we have is that I believe that this world is natural and they believe that it is supernatural, something that was constructed by sleight of hand, by some one up in the clouds. That is all." And Colonel Ingersoll settled back comfortably in his chair, as if the difference of opinion were too trifling to discuss.

"But what if you should be converted?" suggested the Sun reporter. An expression of mock terror spread over the Colonel's rosy cheeks as he replied:

"That would be a dreadful misfortune, and I should be unhappy all the rest of my life."

"If you had absolute faith in the Christian religion, would it make you unhappy?"

"It certainly would. How could it be otherwise? A man of intelligence who is a Christian and who has imagination couldn't help but be unhappy. Just think of the hell that it holds out. If he is a Christian he must believe that the people whom he knows and loves on earth are to be separated in death, and some are to go to hell and some are to go to heaven, and they are to stay there forever. It would make me very unhappy to believe that. This is to be for eternity. I have asked many Christian people, 'What are you going to do in heaven?' and they reply that they are going to be happy there. 'But how are you going to be happy?' I ask. Are they just going to do nothing and be happy, or are they going to get their happiness from playing on golden harps all the time? Are they going to be happy knowing that some of those whom they loved here are suffering eternal tortures in hell? I couldn't be happy under those circumstances."

"Admitting the truth of the Christian religion, wouldn't you wish to be converted?"

"Why, if there is some one up in the clouds to whom these people who pray give advice and instruction how things should be run down here, I certainly want to know about it. But, you see, I don't believe that there is. I should very much dislike to accept the Christian religion and all that it holds out even to those who believe it and live by it."

Colonel Ingersoll hadn't time to read all of the hundred or more letters that were waiting for him, and the two or three that he had opened struck him as being very foolish. One writer made a violent attack on the Colonel and another wrote in a kindly, argumentative way. Neither produced any effect, however.

Among the uncanny utterances called out by the Cleveland Christian Endeavorer's prayers for the salvation of R. G. Ingersoll, was the statement of Claude Falls Wright, secretary to the late Madam Blavatsky, who in a lecture at Chickering Hall on "Occult Phenomena," declared that the Endeavorers "are doing a great wrong and are practicing sorcery or black magic." According to the calendar this is the last decade of the Nineteenth century!

To the Friends of the "Ironclad Age."

You are herewith introduced to THE TRUTH SEEKER. While a few, perhaps many of you, have in the past taken both papers, many more have not. It is therefore incumbent upon us to explain to you the cause of this introduction, and at the same time bid you a sad if not a last farewell. Whatever prestige the Ironclad Age had came through the peculiar individualities of its founder, J. R. Monroe, M.D., and his successor, Mrs. Power. For many years before the demise of Dr. Monroe it was his well-known wish that the paper should be perpetuated and that his son, V. H. Monroe, M.D., should occupy the editorial tripod. The son felt that he could not sacrifice a large practice (which his sire had done before him) to give the paper the attention required. It then devolved upon his daughter, Lulie Monroe Power, to take up the work of her lamented father. This she did, and bravely carried it forward, laying it aside only when life ceased. For the sake of the well-known wishes of both Mrs. Power and her father, and for the cause of Freethought—which has all too few champions—we endeavored to form some alliance by which the paper could be continued. Failing in this, together with the accumulation of debt and discouragement, the estate was forced into the hands of an administrator. This made it necessary to sell the plant, which was done at a sacrifice.

It also became our duty to fulfil our obligations to subscribers who had paid in advance. This labor of love THE TRUTH SEEKER has undertaken to do for us; we have placed in its hands the subscription list, and hope we can assure it of the good will of the friends of Mrs. Power and ourselves. THE TRUTH SEEKER will now take the place of the Ironclad Age in making weekly visits to both those who have paid in advance and those who have not; for as we expected the latter to renew for the Ironclad, so shall we still hope that they will renew by sending the amount of their arrearages to THE TRUTH SEEKER, with as much in advance as they conveniently can. We feel sure that this arrangement will please the friends of the Ironclad better than any other we could make except to continue. We have also transferred to the Truth Seeker Company all the books, copyrights, good will, etc., of the former publishing business of the Ironclad Age, and those desiring these books will find them at the Truth Seeker Office. We know from many years' dealing with them that our successors will do everything they can to continue the pleasant relations which have existed between the Ironclad and its subscribers and friends, who will find prompt and generous people to deal with, and we solicit our friends to send them as prompt and generous orders. We ask every subscriber to renew his Ironclad subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER at once. As there is now one less Freethought journal claiming your loyalty and support, let our friends be as determined that others shall continue to exist.

Thanking our friends for many past favors, and trusting the new acquaintance will prove mutually agreeable, we are, fraternally,

R. H. POWER AND DAUGHTER PEARL.

The foregoing leaves little for us to add, as it explains the whole reason why the subscribers to the late Ironclad Age are now receiving THE TRUTH SEEKER.

We have assumed the obligation to send THE TRUTH SEEKER to those who have paid in advance for the Age. This will cost us a good deal. There is one of our new friends paid to 1910. We are glad to know so generous a friend, and shall take great pleasure in honoring the obligation we have assumed. On the other hand, the accounts due the Age for subscriptions have been transferred to us. We hope these will be promptly paid, so that the two accounts may balance. And we ask these friends also to renew their subscriptions as soon as they have read a few numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER and become satisfied that it is what they want, which we think will not take them long to do, for our artist and contributors make the paper one of the most interesting publications to be found in this country, for all whose minds are free from superstition. Those whose subscriptions to the Age were paid in advance will get THE TRUTH SEEKER for the same length of time they would have received the Age, though the price of THE TRUTH SEEKER is a little higher, as the paper is larger, and in exchange for this courtesy we hope they will promptly renew when that time is reached.

With these few words of explanation, we submit our paper to the kind consideration of our new friends, hoping that the acquaintance may be as long as we feel sure it will be agreeable.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Faith and Superstition.

The leaders of the Christian church who know a thing or two are warily dodging the Christian Endeavorers' Ingersoll prayer test. They know it won't succeed, and they are preparing to evade the logical consequence. If Ingersoll is not converted after ten thousand prayers of faith, or more, of what value is prayer? Fair-minded people will see this. If Christianity is true, why should not Ingersoll be converted? There is a no more honest inquirer than Ingersoll. He is perfectly willing to change his mind, give him sufficient evidence. All that Ingersoll asks is evidence—this and nothing more. These prayers do not ask God to do an impossibility; they ask him to do a comparatively easy thing, to furnish to a sincere mind sufficient testimony to the truth of the Christian religion.

Now God either can't or won't convert Ingersoll, and these prayers either show the unkindness of God or the weakness of God. If God can't convert Ingersoll, of course the deity is limited; and a very great limitation it is. God must be very weak in logic, in knowledge, in wisdom, if he cannot prove the truth of a religion he himself originated. Think of an infinit God in such straits as this. It practically dethrones him and leaves him at the mercy of the devil.

If God won't convert Ingersoll, what can we think of him as a God of love? Ingersoll is one of the brightest intellects of the human race; yet God won't convert him when he has the opportunity. The Christian Advocate intimates that Ingersoll has committed the sin against the Holy Ghost, and therefore is outside the pale of mercy. It also says that there are some who are not to be prayed for. They are "past feeling, and their consciences are seared as with a hot iron." Again, declares the Advocate, "Jesus gave instruction to his apostles not to make special efforts to secure the conversion of a certain class by personal appeals. 'Give not that which is holy unto the dogs; neither cast your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under their feet and turn again and rend you.'"

Such is the subterfuge of the Christian Advocate. Ingersoll is beyond redemption. Like Pharaoh, his heart is hardened. He has committed the unpardonable crime, and prayers are useless.

The Christian Advocate draws a distinction between faith and superstition, and of course intimates that the Christian Endeavorers are engaged in a superstitious performance, in which we all agree. "Faith," it says, "believes that if two persons, or even one, shall ask anything 'according to God's will,' he will grant it whether the prayer is offered at one time or another. Superstition fancies that if there be a concentration at a moment by a large number something will be done by God that otherwise might not be done."

The Christian Advocate reminds one of the aphorism of Hobbes's, that faith is superstition in fashion, and superstition is faith out of fashion.

The definition which the Advocate gives to superstition is the time-honored definition of faith itself. Jesus and the apostles teach that same superstition. Prayer changes the will of God or it does not. If it does not it is useless. What is meant by "effectual, fervent prayer"? What is meant by the woman who entreates the judge until he changes his mind and grants her request? The whole teaching of the New Testament declares that prayer does affect the counsels of the Almighty; that it does influence his will. There never was any other conception of prayer until modern science compelled its abandonment.

What is the use of prayer if nothing is accomplished? If the prayer does not reach the throne of grace and produce an effect, why pray? Have not the words of Jesus ever been the hope and consolation of the Christian on his knees? "If two of you agree on earth as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my father which is in heaven." Here it is distinctly affirmed that the Christian prayer is an originating cause; that it produces an effect on God's mind, and "something is done by God that otherwise might not be done."

Prayer is vital to the Christian's belief. Take away his faith in prayer and you take away the heart of his religion. If you make prayer merely an exercise of the human mind, with no effect on God, the soul of prayer disappears, and it is an empty formality.

Faith, as the Christian Advocate defines it, is simply logic—for of course if you ask "according to God's will" the prayer will be granted. But if no prayers were uttered at all it would be just the same. Whatever is according to God's will happens. It is not faith to believe this, but logic. It requires no more faith to believe this than that two and two make four, or that a whole is greater than a part. But faith transcends logic. As Tertullian says, "It believes the impossible; and it believes because it is impossible." Faith does believe that prayer is answered—that it does act upon the will of God, and does move it and change its operation, both in the physical and spiritual world. There is no avoiding this conclusion. The Advocate's definition of faith destroys the very substance of faith. If all the Christians in the world were certain that God had foreordained that Ingersoll should go to hell, would they pray for him? Of course not. Why do Christians pray for Ingersoll? Because they believe that their prayers will help save him. They believe that their prayers are a force in the universe that will produce an event that otherwise would not be. The Advocate gives a verbatim report of one of these prayers and proves what is here affirmed. It is an old-fashioned, orthodox Christian New Testament prayer, just the kind of prayer that Jesus tells his disciples to offer:

O Lord, we have an arch enemy who is traveling over the country. He is working against Thee. He is working against us. He is endeavoring to injure the cause. We have all faith in Thee. We believe that Thou canst do this thing. Thou hast answered our prayers before, and we believe that Thou wilt do it now. O Lord, Thou hast everything and canst do everything. Save this enemy. Make a friend, a co-worker of him. O God, Thou art all-powerful and holdest everything in thy hands. Answer this our prayer.

As the Advocate admits, this prayer throws the responsibility upon God. The Christians have done their part; what will God do? Simply nothing, of course. But what does it prove? It proves the uselessness of prayer.

It is no wonder that keen-witted Christians dread the test. They see the result. It will destroy both faith and superstition. It will be evidence of the falsity of Christianity. It will show the weakness or the heartlessness of God. It was a foolish move on the part of the Christians. It will be a boomerang. There never was a better opportunity to answer prayer; there never was a better chance to pour the divine light of Christianity over this land. Ingersoll is the shining mark. The heart of Christendom has gone out to him in ten thousand petitions. Will not God do something? Will he refuse these prayers? Will he make no sign? Will he be dumb as a wooden idol, and thus prove himself to be no better than a creation of the human fancy?

This is the logic of the situation. The Christian Advocate sees it. It does not propose to butt its head against a stone wall. It hastens, therefore, to dub the whole performance a superstition. It washes its hands of the affair. It takes the safe position of the old minister. When asked to pray for rain, he said he would "when the wind was in the right direction."

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Light on the Armenian Question.

"I've just returned from Constantinople," said Mr. F. Hopkinson Smith, the author and artist, to a Boston Herald representative in New York, two or three days ago. "While there, I had an opportunity, through talks with Minister Terrell and two of the Sultan's aides, to learn all the inside facts about the Armenian atrocities. The whole matter has been grossly misunderstood, if not misrepresented, in this country. The root of the trouble lies in the missionaries sent out to Armenia from England and America. Instead of trying to help the people, they teach them that they are ill-treated, and sow the seeds of discontent and rebellion. They have started all the difficulty, and when the blame is properly placed it will rest upon their heads."

"We hear a great deal in this country about 'the barbarous Turk.' Now, I have traveled and painted all over the globe, and know pretty well the inhabitants of all countries; and let me tell you that I never met a more civilized, humane, intelligent, cleanly, pious, and chaste man than the typical Turk. He is quiet and respectable; he is pre-eminently kind and good to his family; and his religion enters into every part of his life. On my former visit to Constantinople, four years ago, I met a good many Moslems; and during my recent visit I came to know many more Turks of the best classes; and I make that statement without hesitation."

"For instance, I spent several days painting in the streets of Constantinople. The sultan would not give a permit to do this, because he had refused such a privilege to divers Englishmen, and he did not wish to establish a dangerous precedent. He sent an official to accompany me on my trips, and every day that man left me three times and went into the mosque to say his prayers. Just think of the power of a religion which makes every man of a whole nation lay aside his business three times every day and prostrate himself toward Mecca in prayer!

"Go out here in Wall street and try to persuade the people to go to church three times a day. You couldn't club them into it. The best of them only attend service once or twice a week. What are we, as a religious nation, that we should attempt to force our religion upon every other nation on earth? We might as well start out to make silk hats for the world, and club every head into the right shape to fit them."

"See how humane the Turks are to animals. I don't know how many hundred thousand dogs there are in Constantinople, but probably there are fifty to each block. Every few minutes, if you are watching what goes on around you, you will see a Turk go over to a bake shop, buy a bit of bread, or something else that the dogs will eat, and feed them. Nobody owns these creatures. They have been common property for a thousand years, I suppose; yet, ugly and mangy as they are, they never go hungry. Nor do they ever suffer violence. Striking a dog in the streets of Constantinople means imprisonment for a year. Why, I've seen a team come along one of those narrow streets when a dog was lying in the way, and the driver would stop his donkeys and lift the dog out of the way, rather than run the risk of hurting him. I never saw any one beat or kick a donkey in Turkey. The people recognize that these creatures are their faithful servants, and treat them kindly. The love existing between the Turk or the Arabian and his horse is proverbial."

"What have we in the way of religion to teach these people? Nothing. It's pure bumpstuousness for us to try to 'convert' them. They neither want nor need our religion. They've got a better one of their own. Better for them, I mean, not for us. They are already more religious, as a people, than we are."

"Another point. What order of men are they whom the English and the American religious bodies send out as missionaries? If you have ever noted closely the students in our training schools for the ministry you must have discovered that as a class they are far from representing the best, or even a very good, type of American manhood. Many of them are young men from country towns and villages who could not make a decent living in any other calling. They go to these schools, in many instances, because they can get their education at half price, or free. Of course their poverty is no disgrace; but they are poor in every sense of the word. They hear a sermon by some returned missionary who wishes to arouse interest in the country in which he has lived, and straightway they are called to labor in the same field. Such sermons are apt to take hold of the less intelligent and more impressionable men; and it is often the men who are not fitted to take the high rank among the ministry in their own country who feel themselves drawn to work in a foreign land. The result is that we send out the most incapable specimens of our rural population—men of uncouth manners, who have learned a little Latin and Hebrew—the representatives of half a dozen religious sects, which are at constant war with each other about their creeds—to convert a cultured, courteous, pious, humane, temperate race, whose unified religion enters as much into the life of its members as does their business."

"Now and then we hear of some girl in a country town who thinks she has a mission to do good to the heathen. She had far better go down to the factory in her own village and minister there; but no, there is no glamour about that. Imagining that she is a new Joan of Arc, our hysterical friend tells some missionary body all about it, and they send her over to Turkey. You can picture to yourself the amazement and disgust with which the Turks regard such missionaries. Superb specimens of physique, they look upon these little wizened, dried-up, spectacled women with infinit contempt; just as they scoff at the idea of adopting a religion on which the various schools cannot agree."

"Well, colonies of such bores and cranks go over to Armenia, or somewhere else, and found schools. The children come to be taught, and eventually they join some one or another Christian church. They are pariahs as long as they live—marked boys and girls, branded men and women, who have lost caste among their fellows. What have they gained? 'Christianity,' you may say. Very true; but if they would lead pure and noble lives under the religion of Mohammed, how are they better off? We surely cannot believe that heathen who lead good lives according to their lights do not go to heaven."

"Pretty soon some one comes along and hits an Armenian over the head. The missionaries keep telling their converts and the poor people that the Turk did it. They tell them that they are abused, and stir them up to rebellion. The result is bloodshed, as you have seen. Here on my desk is a letter just received from Mr. Terrell, with whom I had many conversations when in Constantinople. He says: 'We have certain information that 10,000 have been killed within a month.' That official statement, of course, includes those slain on both sides.

"He adds another statement, equally significant, to the effect that so far as can be learned, not one American missionary has been injured. The Turks like the Americans who come to Constantinople far better than the Englishmen, and they like America better than England, partly because as a nation we do not meddle with their affairs. When I have been painting in the streets I have never been subjected to discourtesies from the crowd which always assembled to watch me, except two or three times; and on those occasions they supposed that I was an Englishman. When they learned that I was an American they ceased to annoy me, and even apologized for their rudeness. And they carry this esteem for Americans to the point of sparing our missionaries, even when the latter have sown the seeds of discontent in the hearts of their subjects.

"The English talk of forcing the sultan to abdicate. They can do it, of course; but it would cost thousands of lives—in fact, it would necessitate a war of extermination, as I can show you very shortly.

"The sultan did not desire this bloodshed. He knew very little about it. But, like every other ruler, he is surrounded by numbers of men who are trying to gain favors or permits at his hands, and some of these men obtained commissions to slaughter the infidel. When the sultan gives an order to kill the infidel, the Moslems say, 'Thou art the son of Mohammed. Thy command is Allah's will.' England threatens to depose the sultan unless the massacres are stopped. Then the Turks say, 'They are going to depose our sultan for carrying out the will of Allah,' and every man of them will fight to the last drop of his blood to prevent it. Indeed, we would despise them if they did not.

"The sultan himself has known very little of the massacres which have resulted from his permits, because the facts have been kept from him; but Mr. Terrell has told him a good many plain statements about this and other matters, and the sultan likes him for it.

"However, the sultan has ordered investigations which will result in laying the facts before him, and he intends to enforce his reform scheme. And, by the way, when he told the English ambassador to read to that mass-meeting his communication in which he said that he intended to prosecute these investigations, it was one of the wisest diplomatic moves of recent history.

"The United States is very fortunate to be represented at the sultan's court in this crisis by so able a man as Minister Terrell. Why he accepted the post I cannot imagine, for he was a prominent man of affairs in this country. I suppose he thought it would mean a pleasant change and an outing on the Bosphorus. He went over there and landed in the midst of this turmoil, and he has worked day and night till he is fagged out. Mr. Short is another man of the same sort—clear-headed and able.

"One day I called on the American consulate and found several people considerably excited. A man had just landed from America and had been set upon by the Turks. Mr. Terrell had rescued him, and found out that he was an Armenian who had gone over to America, stayed there four years, and taken passage back to his own country the very next day after taking out his naturalization papers. He had landed in Armenia with $3,000 and a portmanteau full of revolutionary tracts. He claimed protection as an American citizen, and Mr. Terrell managed to save his neck and sent him on to Athens.

But our missionaries and those sent out by the English can, if they will, do immense good. They can teach the races among which they make their homes to plow, to harrow, to make and use tools, and innumerable other things in which they are far behind us. There is very little use to carry our knowledge of medicine to the Turks, because the latter are never sick. They are temperate in all things; they drink no wine (their religion forbids it); and they eat very little meat. Above all, they are the cleanest people on the globe. Your orthodox Turk bathes three times a day. When you enter a restaurant in Constantinople, the first thing they bring you is a bowl of hot water and some fresh tow to wipe your hands on. Then they bring you cold water and a fresh towel. Now, disease is bred by dirt and intemperance, and in the absence of these there is health.

"But, although Turkey is not one of the countries to which we can with advantage send missionaries with a knowledge of medicine, we can really benefit the Turk and the Armenians by teaching them mechanic arts and agriculture. And in that direction lies our rightful activities in their behalf; not in the way of religion. For a people whom you can hardly induce to go to church once a week, save to hear a sensational sermon, to teach religion to a race who go gladly and enthusiastically to worship Jehovah whom they believe to be behind the blank wall on the Meccaward end of their mosques, is the most arrogant bumpstuousness."

The Subservient Press of Maryland.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: The National Reform Association (God-in-the-Constitution party) having called a convention to be held in Baltimore, Dec. 12th and 13th, the following article was taken by your correspondent to the office of the Baltimore American and submitted for publication. The proprietor of that paper, Gen. Felix Agnus, read the article in my presence, expressed his unqualified approval of it, and unhesitatingly agreed that it should be published. But it did not appear, being shortly returned with the statement that it could not be used at present.

We have not a free press in Maryland. Our journals lead in nothing. They appear to be under a censorship and too cowardly to admit the expression of views on questions affecting the liberties of the people. Draw your own conclusion after reading this rejected communication.

E. L.

Baltimore, Md.

Editor Baltimore American: The purpose of the National Reform Association, whose convention is to be held in this city December 12th and 13th, is thoroughly revolutionary, as the call for the convention shows; its purpose being to change entirely the character of our Constitution.

The Constitution of the United States was wisely framed by the fathers of this Republic. Are we wiser than the authors of that noble instrument? The name of God was omitted because they wished to establish religious liberty, and a purely secular form of government. Church and state were to be "forever separate." It was declared that "Congress should make no laws for the establishment of any religion." Religion, as Madison declares, was not within the "purview of government," and Washington affirmed, in the Treaty with Tripoli, "that in no sense whatever is this government founded on the Christian religion." Thomas Jefferson said that our government was founded upon "reason and freedom of opinion." These are the foundation principles of our government. The question arises, Is it policy to change its form and inaugurate a new scheme; to make this a religious government, to put God, Christ, and the Bible into the Constitution, and radically reform its spirit and purpose? Does not this proposed reform of our Constitution lower it from its present attitude of universal justice? Is it not retrogression?

After all the wars instigated throughout the world by fanatical religionists, have the American people come to the conclusion that a union of church and state is desirable, and that Washington, Franklin, Madison, and others who gave us our Constitution were mistaken? We appeal to the American people to take no backward step on this question, to not diverge to the path of tyranny and wrong, but to preserve the liberties given to us by the fathers of this nation. Religious persecution, tyranny, and despotism would be the inevitable result of a compulsory religion, no matter how good that religion would be in itself. If Christianity is true, it needs no support from the state; if true, it must appeal in this day of enlightenment to the individual reason and conscience. It must triumph through reason and not through force. The state, as Washington said, "is not persuasion, but force." Therefore religion (the church) and state, as President Grant held, "must be forever separate." Religion, to be of any possible value to man, must be accepted freely and through reason and evidence.

The National Reform Association is therefore engaged in a dangerous undertaking—dangerous to the state and dangerous to "pure and undefiled religion." These "reformers" are endeavoring to make Christianity a tyranny and by so doing to destroy whatever good qualities it may possess. They are also endeavoring in their zeal to revolutionize our government—to entirely alter its fundamental principles—to change it from a secular government to a theological government. We hope the people will understand this question and be satisfied with a Constitution that guarantees equal rights and impartial liberty to all its citizens irrespective of belief, and whether secularists or religionists.

Justice.

Everyone recognizes more or less definitely the beneficial results of Justice as the foundation for a social system. Whatever his circumstances or surroundings, every individual comprehends the necessity and has a desire for the establishment of just means to a just end. In the wilds of Africa, on the heights of India, or in the midst of our present civilization; whether he be semi-civilized, savage, or barbarian; whether he has but the fewest minute details of the commonest form of education, or whether his mind be stored with the product of the highest educational facilities, there will always be present to his consciousness some understanding of Justice.

Man clings to the preference for that which is just rather than unjust, though there are no absolute tests by which the two may be distinguished; for as diverse as are the circumstances that encompass mankind in life on this earth, just so variable are the different aspects and views of the course which it should follow.

We are generally agreed that the groundwork of life is utility; that whatever we may determine is useful, good, or beneficial is what we should endeavor to accomplish or acquire. It is useful for us to have some occupation that affords us remuneration for our labors; it is useful for us to prosecute our researches and arrive at new scientific facts in nature. It is good for us to lead wholesome lives, to live in comfortable homes, to possess the necessities and some of the luxuries. It is beneficial to us if we can surround ourselves and others with joy and happiness. Our personal liberty, the right to own and dispose of property, etc., are all recognized as the necessary corollaries of just laws and just government, and they are demanded by every human being for himself if not always for his fellows.

But Justice can hardly be said to have any natural source or standard. Different communities are at variance with one another; and for that reason, if for no other, Justice must be considered as a human product, the result of the association of man with man and the recognition of the necessity for some established rule of conduct providing for equality and equity. Hence governments and legal enactments; and every government that is worthy of support must be erected on that foundation.

Liberty of mind and body is the sure result of Justice, and never for one moment should a law exist that tends to defeat this end. For from the heights of freedom must flow all that can raise mankind to the noblest understanding of our relations one to another. There is nothing in this world that will bring about a proper amalgamation of the pure crystals of human life, that will clear the channels of progress from the shoals and bars that rise from the lower depths, so surely and completely as true Justice.

Misdirected Missionary Zeal.

Inspired by a holy zeal to save
His fellowkind from Death's eternal sting,
The father, like a soldier true and brave,
Forsook his pleading child to serve his King.

Through bitter storms he labored at his post,
Tho' oft despairing of the promised goal,
Until, amid the untamed pagan host,
He gained for God a single willing soul.

To heaven's gate he brought the savage wild,
And counted then his mission done full well;
When, hasting to regain his absent child,
He found him scoffing on the brink of hell.

Three thousand Christian Endeavorers are to pray at the same hour for the conversion of Col. Robt. G. Ingersoll. To the extent that these people are sincere we admire them, but we have not one whit of faith in their influence either upon Jehovah or Ingersoll. A widow's tear or a baby's smile would penetrate the colonel's heart more deeply than the prayers of the twenty million Christians of the republic. In ethics, which is broader than religion, Colonel Ingersoll is a model man. He can not intellectually accept the dogmas of Christianity, nor can he accept what his heart most earnestly yearns for—the declaration of immortality. What will you do with such a man? What will these Christian Endeavorers do with Colonel Ingersoll, who, in all respects, save that of belief in certain dogmas, is a tender, honest, brave, and noble man? Will they damn him? They cannot get the people of the Western world to vote with them on this question. The time is past when damnation can be meted out to a man because of his intellectual beliefs.—Progressive Age.

Have you ordered your holiday books? If not, see the list offered on page 813.

Observations.

The unconversion of Ingersoll fails to prove that God does not always answer prayer. We are informed by a no less distinguished theologian than the Rev. Dr. Ward, editor of the Independent, that when God omits to grant our petitions, it shows that he has chosen to respond in the negative! Nobody can deny this, because it is equally true of great wooden gods, medium-sized brass gods, and little tin gods on wheels.

As a Thanksgiving Supplement the Coast Seamen's Journal, of San Francisco, Cal., issues the "Red Record," which is "a brief resume of some of the cruelties perpetrated upon American seamen of the present time." Sixty-four cases of buckoism (a sailor term for brutality of a ship's officer) are cited in this work, and forty of them were recorded at the port of San Francisco. The details of assaults upon seamen strain the credulity of one living under the benevolent police rule of New York, where his legs may peradventure come to the rescue of his head. According to the testimony quoted in the "Red Record," men who accidentally or unavoidably dropped a quid or a clew on deck while aloft have been knocked down, jumped upon, and more or less of the life beaten out of them by captains and mates. Flogging on board vessels of commerce is abolished by act of Congress, but the rope's-end and the cat have been adequately replaced by pump-brakes, boathooks, handspikes, belaying-pins, marlinspikes, brass knuckles, chunks of holystone, and also by bottles after their contents have been transferred to the interior of the officer wielding them. In the group of offenses for which these and worse instruments of discipline are applied are: Talking while at work; omitting the word "sir" when addressing a superior creature; expostulating against being called the son of a female dog; cutting down a shipmate triced up and in agony; accidentally dropping dirt in a boat alongside; growling about the food; mistakes in reeving, and so forth. Probably there are two sides to the question, for sailors are a rough-and-ready class of men and hard to curry; but what other class would take their job with the knowledge that if they make any of the breaks above enumerated they are liable to the penalties described? There are, however, masters of ships who have no difficulty with their men; they do not underman their vessels, nor overwork and underfeed the crew—circumstances which lie very close to the seat of trouble, and are possibly induced by those tariff laws which prevent vessels from profitably loading both ways. As a landsman I can only offer my sympathy to all concerned, and express the hope that the "Red Record" may lead to an amelioration of the hardships of seafaring men; at the same time congratulating them that they have in the nation's Congress so able a champion as the Hon. James G. Maguire. Mr. Maguire is opposed to clubs, whether applied to citizens who neglect to attend church, or to sailors who do not rush aft any faster than circumstances will permit.

Certain members of the London school board want to introduce flogging into the industrial schools for the reformation of girls. The members who favor this benevolent scheme are the same individuals who a short time ago were considering the advisability of turning out teachers who did not agree with their theories about religious instruction. Religion, Rawhides, and Reform, substituted for the conventional three r's, ought to convince the wayward maidens of London that, as Mr. John Peck has remarked, Jesus Christ was not crucified for fun.

Attendants on recent meetings of the Manhattan Liberal Club have listened without profit to divers querulous speakers who complain about the character of the literature and meeting-places of Freethinkers. Of course the complaints are groundless. Freethought publications compare favorably in outward style, and more than favorably in intrinsic worth, with any other; while the meeting-place of the club is in the most staid and respectable, if not the most fashionable, quarter of the city. Of a truth, and to be sure, there is an orthodox church next door, and a Quaker meeting-house across the street; also Dr. Rainsford's church within range of a boy's sling, and a half-dozen other similar temples near at hand; but the neighborhood is good enough for Hamilton Fish's people, for Senator William M. Evarts, for the Stuyvesants, and for other old families; and the German Masonic Temple is a handsome building exteriorly and snug and cheerful inside. A thing to be noted in connection with the contemnors of the cheaper Freethought literature is that they are not known as purchasers of works issued in the highest style of the printer's art; and that when the Freethinkers of New York and vicinity recently met in convention on Fifth avenue and Nineteenth street, they were not among the enthusiastic attendants. They do not now pass the fashionable locality of these meetings to the credit of the Freethinkers, nor did they contribute to the hall rent. Nothing remains to be said to them but Good-bye.

An article by Police Commissioner Roosevelt, I grieve to see, is copied from the Forum into the Investigator. I should regret to see the same in any paper published to do good. This Mr. Roosevelt is at the head of a band of legalized brigands who seize upon persons and hold them for ransom. The ransom may be called a fine or bail, but that does not alter its nature. He justifies the spoliation on the ground that he is enforcing the law. But he does not have to enforce the law. He could avoid it by resigning his office and going back to the peaceful walks of life. The way he uses the law reminds me of the fate of a man I once knew—"Jim" Anderson of Returning Board notoriety. Anderson was in Virginia City, Nev., if my memory does not mislead me. There was bad blood between him and another man, and it was understood that open hostilities would be inaugurated at their first meeting. While walking with a friend Anderson met his enemy, who seized the friend, using him as a shield, and, firing over his shoulder, pumped Anderson full of lead. James would not shoot for fear of killing his mate, and so he died.

Roosevelt is practicing the system employed by Anderson's enemy. He is shielding himself behind the Sunday law and blazing away right and left. If the law, which citizens have confused with those statutes found to be their friends, were not between them and Roosevelt, he and his band, like other breakers and enterers, inflictors of battery, oppression, and duress, would have to preserve the peace or get what they deserve.

Ingersoll spoke the true word in regard to this when he said that bad laws should not be enforced but repealed, and that if they could not be repealed they should be ignored. We are under no obligation to take every mean advantage of our fellows that invidious legislation permits.

The Baptist church (colored) at Lakewood, N. J., on a recent Sunday wore a placard bearing this inscription: "There will be no service in our church to-day, as our most beloved pastor has been suddenly called away." Pastor White had indeed been called thence, and it was the voice of the constable which he heard. The fact is, the Rev. Mr. White stole coal from a neighboring yard to warm his church. When arraigned in court he pleaded that it was no sin to take the coal, as it was going to a place where good was to be done. The coal dealer said he would let him go if he would promise to steal no more, and Parson White not only promised this, but in addition volunteered to solicit orders for coal.

It is worth something to know that the Christian Advocate has the moral stamina to condemn the course of Brother White, as it does in these words: "He was a poor, ignorant African, but his conscience seems to be in the state of that of many persons who can neither plead ignorance nor anything else as an excuse. The damnation of them who say, 'Let us do evil, that good may come,' is just, and affirms the word of God, which this man professed to expound." But there is a parallel, which the editor of the Advocate has failed to draw, between the act of the ignorant African who appropriated coal for the warming of his church and the course of the better educated Christians who appropriate money not theirs—that is, public money—to the support of the churches in general. These latter know that their act is evil, and justify it exactly as Dominie White justified his—"it is going to a place where good is to be done." And further, exactly as he did, they offer to become the agents of the parties robbed, though unlike him they have not yet promised to steal no more. If his damnation is just, so is theirs. To tell the truth, taxpayers whose rates are increased by the exemption of churches and parsonages have often damned them in my presence and with my approval.

I am forced to oppose Mr. John P. Guild in his advocacy of independent secular schools to take the place of public educational institutions. The Secularists of this country are now paying their share of the salaries of approximately 375,000 school teachers, and for the construction and maintenance of the buildings in which these are employed. In the Constitution of the nation and of a majority of the states, Freethinkers have their warrant for insisting that public schools shall be wholly secular. With one quarter of a million schools and ten thousand colleges and universities, which are just cramming our youth with information, and which we must pay for whether we want to or not, our obligation to provide more of them does not appear to be binding. The persistence of Freethinkers within my recollection has led to the secularizing of many schools, and secularizing an established school is as good as establishing a secular one at the same date.

Rector Ahlwardt, the Jew-baiter who has come from Germany to agitate for radical legislation against Hebrew citizens, is superfluous in this country. We are a religious nation, and don't need him. Under the bondage of their own superstition the compatriots of Christ have to loaf on the seventh day of the week, and under the pressure of Christian bigotry they are obliged also to keep the first day. They thus obey, according to two different interpretations, the Precept of Idleness which the Fourth Commandment contains, and now we are asked to so outlaw and boycott them that they shall not be able to obey the precept of industry which enjoins them to work the rest of the week. Weg da, Herr Ahlwardt! Go to Armenia. Go to Germany—to the devil—go anywhere. Get out. As you are a baiter, abate yourself.

Geo. E. Macdonald.

The National Reform Convention.

FIRST DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

It was somewhat incongruous that in the Immanuel Baptist church—the inheritor of the glory of Roger Williams—should be held a convention, the entire purpose of which is the establishment of a religious tyranny. Generally, up to date, the Baptist church has been in favor of religious freedom, but it is turning back on its excellent traditions and uniting with the "Scarlet Woman," whom once it so bitterly opposed.

It was in this church that the National Reform Convention opened its session this morning, December 12th. It was opened with prayer, of course, which prayer offered a great deal of advice to a patient deity. He was informed of his duty in regard to national reform. The meeting began with just twenty-nine persons present, and this included myself, the janitor, and the reporter. So it seems that this extreme wing of the Christian church cannot summon so many as our Freethought conventions. About twenty more drifted in before the close of the session. In the afternoon about sixty were present; and in the evening there were less than one hundred, although the mayor of Baltimore was on hand to welcome the members of the association.

How it is that so small a body can exercise so tremendous an influence is somewhat of a puzzler. I can only lay it to the ignorance and cowardice of the politicians. If it were not that the ordinary politician is a fool, the God-in-the-Constitution party would have no force at all.

The first paper read was entitled, "Loyalty to Christ the Saving Principle of All Social and Civil Obligation." It simply reiterated the statement that Christ must be king of the nation. The next on the program was an address by E. K. Hart, editor of the Philadelphia Evening Telegraph. Subject, "Public Enterprises and the Sabbath." I can hardly understand why an editor, who is supposed to be a man of the world, could be quite so narrow in his views as Mr. Hart. He may be under the tuition of John Wanamaker. He was opposed to everything on the Sabbath, except going to church. No public enterprise of any kind on that day. He wanted a grand revival of Puritanism. The Sabbath was the keystone of American liberty, etc.

After this came a furious onslaught on the Sunday newspaper by Rev. Dr. J. Addison Smith, of Baltimore, who declared that the Sunday newspaper debauched the intellect, the heart, the conscience, the creative imagination. It was bad from beginning to end. It was opposed to religion and morality. It was a hotch-potch of all infernal things. Out of four hundred columns of reading matter in the New York Sunday papers only three and a half columns were given to religion. It was a crime to publish a Sunday paper. It should be prohibited by law. It ought to be wiped out, demolished by a cyclone. The reverend gentleman then went on to denounce Sunday mails and Sunday railroad trains. He said that in one state in the Union there was more traffic on Sunday than on any other day of the week. This is good news indeed. Another thing was awful to contemplate, said the speaker. There are seven hundred daily newspapers in the land and not one of them is a Christian journal. This also made me happy. The gentleman's facts were much better than his arguments. He was followed by one or two others in the same strain, and then Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts took the platform. His theme was "The Sabbath and Constitutional Law." He proved conclusively, to his own mind, that the Constitution was a Christian instrument because it contained the two words "Sunday excepted." He rolled these two words like a sweet morsel under his tongue. They seemed to give him great satisfaction, although later on he said that he used the word Sunday always in a bad sense—the continental sense, while the good word was "Sabbath." He did not explain why the bad word Sunday was used in the Constitution, instead of the good word, Sabbath. Now, Mr. Crafts knows that Sunday is not a Christian word, but a pagan word, and if the use of that word commits the Constitution to any religion, it commits it to the pagan religion of Rome, with which the word Sunday is connected. Mr. Crafts admits that Sunday in the Constitution means only a "day of rest," and not "a day of worship." How, then, is it possible to make a Sabbath law out of it? It enjoins nothing. It does not tell the president what to do. It only gives him a chance to go fishing if he wants to. There is no obligation about it.

Out of this root, "Sundays excepted," have come two Supreme Court decisions affirming this to be a Christian nation; five executive acts of the presidents in Thanksgiving and Fast day proclamations by Washington, Jackson, Lincoln, Harrison, and Cleveland, and orders issued by the two latter for Sabbath observance in the army. Besides these acts of the presidents, are legislative acts—one forbidding the manufacture of whisky on Sunday—a beautiful recognition of Christianity indeed; another act that forbids the shooting of birds on Sunday; the World's Fair closing act, etc. Mr. Crafts indeed demonstrated the usurping tendency of the Christian church, in that it will take the two innocent and secular words "Sunday excepted" to enforce upon this people a union of church and state. A resolution of censure of General Miles was passed for allowing the great bicycle race to open on Sunday. Think of these twenty-six white-neck-tied reformers undertaking to run the army of the United States, the president, the general, and horse, foot, and artillery.

In the afternoon, with an audience, as I before remarked, of about sixty, the marriage question was discussed. Here is another opportunity for church despotism. These reformers want an amendment to the Constitution by which they can control the marriage institution. They purpose to make it a sacrament instead of a civil contract. The church must have a hand in it always. If the church can control birth, marriage, death, and the Sunday, it has indeed a tremendous lever for the subjugation of humanity. So there is not only to be a theological amendment to the Constitution, but also a divorce amendment by which there shall be divorce for one reason only, and that is adultery. A more cruel, inhuman, immoral, and detestable law cannot be imagined, and yet that is what these reformers are after. They must make laws of divorce according to the scripture, and according to scripture there is only one cause for divorce, and only the man can avail himself of that cause. The woman cannot. A man may be a drunkard, a criminal; he may beat his wife, desert her, refuse to support her, and yet according to these Christian reformers she cannot be free. "What God has joined together let not man put asunder," is the cry of these pious politicians. It is all of a piece, theological tyranny and marriage tyranny. Put God in the Constitution and there is no more liberty. The living must be tied to the dead whatever may happen. It does not stop with "God in the Constitution." It means that the whole of human life, birth, love, marriage, business, home, and burial, and the grave itself, must all be under the supreme control of the church. The tremendous far-reaching and disastrous nature of this "national reform" is thus understood.

The Christian Amendment came next in order of discussion. The Rev. J. M. Foster, of Boston, took the bull by the horns, and there was trouble. He declared that the Constitution was not a Christian Constitution. It was anti-Christian—it was disloyal to the king of kings—it dishonored the son—and therefore the true Christian could have nothing to do with it. He must not exercise his political privileges. He must withdraw. He was a traitor to Christ if he voted under the Constitution. It was a league with the devil and a covenant with hell. I must confess I liked the bold logic of Reverend Foster. He was really right according to the old Scotch Covenanters. The prospect of these pugnacious Christians withdrawing from political action was indeed delightful. The Christian reformers have advised Infidels to go to "some wild, desolate land and build a government of their own," and now they propose to do the same thing themselves voluntarily. What a happy solution of the question! But, alas! there was a kick at once. It was not unanimous. One man said if the Constitution of the United States was a wild horse, don't let it run away, but catch it, bridle it, and make it run on the Christian track. The Rev. Mr. Fulton said, "I have been appointed chairman for this evening, but I can't preside if these are the sentiments of the convention." There was an instant denial of this; it was an individual opinion, it ought not to have been dragged in, etc., and so the matter was smoothed over. But this small squad of half a hundred reformers are not united among themselves. There is a radical difference of method, a rift in the lute, and sometime there will be a discordant sound. The old Scotch Covenanters will fling their bugle-cry, "Withdraw from the unholy alliance." I am glad of it. The more they quarrel among themselves the better for liberty. It will give us a chance to knock them both out and preserve the Constitution.

In the evening less than one hundred were present. The mayor of Baltimore gave an address of welcome. He is a "Reform" mayor, I understand, and is popular and welcomes all parties. He was careful not to commit himself to "National Reform." He merely pointed out the beauties of the city, and invited the delegates to its hospitality. He said he would as readily welcome other organizations whose objects might even be opposed to the principles of this association. The "National Reformer" didn't really like the mayor's speech. It was too broad and Liberal. I don't know whether the mayor would welcome a Freethought convention. According to his own confession, he ought to do so. At any rate he was scolded by the chairman for giving a greeting to some organization that was at odds with the "God-party." On the whole, the mayor did his part well.

Over the platform swung the motto, "God's sovereignty is over all, the nation, the church, the family, the individual." This formed the keynote of the evening meeting. It was enlivened by the return of Rev. Mr. George from Washington, where he had gone to push the "God-Amendment." This was ready and would be introduced on Monday in the House by Representative Morse and in the Senate by Senator Frye. So the fight is on, and we must prepare to do our level best. If we don't, the "Reformers" will get the better of Freethought and the American republic. We have a foe whose zeal is simply intolerant, and will never surrender. Let Freethinkers be on the lookout for this amendment. Write to your Congressman about it. We must be on the move. We must not let these Christians win through our indifference. They are raising money for the fight. They represent the logic of eighteen centuries of church rule. It won't do to say they cannot succeed because they are a mere handful in convention. If it were a matter of art, of literature, of science, of universal society, we might afford to laugh at the insignificance of our foe; but we are dealing with politics, and because these "reformers" do represent the faith, the prejudice, the ignorance of the past, therefore must we the more fear them, for politicians are of the same sort. We must educate our politicians and enlighten them. We must contest this thing in the halls of Congress. The Christians are jubilant over their anticipations of victory. They are going to work. These men mean what they say and are in dead earnest.

The resolutions of this convention must be carefully read; they will reveal a widespread plan for a revolution in this Republic.

I was pleased to meet with Mr. Moon, who represents the Seventh Day Adventists. He is on hand, like myself. As I left the church I found our ever-watchful allies distributing tracts. I had a good notion to place some TRUTH SEEKERS in the pews of the church. Our friends, however, tried it with the American Sentinel, but every copy was picked up immediately and destroyed. Hence it would be a waste of labor to distribute THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The labor problem was also discussed, but no solution was given, except faith in Christ and the Lord's prayer. I don't think this will satisfy the level-headed working man.

I have thus given a glimpse of the first day's proceedings of the "National Reform Party." I shall have some interesting matter, no doubt, for next week. I came here to study the situation, and I have learned something. They wanted my name, not knowing me, on the roll of delegates, but I said no. They want all the names they can get. Of course, in the eyes of the world, this will be a big convention. But as a matter of fact it is a jesuitical skeleton, playing upon the fears and superstitions of the people.

Our Missionary Work.

Several of our good friends have written us that in their opinion the work, "Self-Contradictions of the Bible," should go along with Paine's "Age of Reason" as a missionary pamphlet. Mr. J. R. Perry puts it thus: "As a missionary document the 144 Self-Contradictions will go hand in hand with the 'Age of Reason.' I think any person getting the one will get the other. It is the grubbing process, clearing out the roots and stones, necessary to preparing the soil for good seeds of common sense." And as it is our delight to furnish the implements for this sort of agricultural operations, we are willing to do our part and will send the "Self-Contradictions of the Bible" to those who will distribute it among their Christian friends, FOR A DOLLAR A DOZEN. Or we will send twelve copies to as many different addresses for one dollar.

Now let the friends of Freethought turn to and circulate "Self-Contradictions" as well as the "Age of Reason." Send both books out by the thousand and watch the result. Flood the country with them, and let the Christians know what their holy paper fetish, the Bible, is like and why it is worthless as a guide to any good.

THE TRUTH SEEKER's offer to send eight copies of Paine's "Age of Reason" to eight different addresses for $1, to be used for missionary purposes, is still open. The best results are reported from this method of reaching intelligent believers and giving a new direction to their thoughts.

The Freethinkers of to-day owe to posterity every effort in their power to preserve the Constitution and liberty for which Jefferson, Madison, Washington, and Paine so earnestly and assiduously fought. Year after year religious laws are enacted, and year after year priestcraft is gaining control of our country.

"Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

European church history seems to be repeating itself in the United States, and it behooves the people of this country to be on their guard or liberty will be only a name. I wish your paper every success and that through its influence Freethought will spread throughout our country, perpetrating liberty for man, woman, and child.

He Has Received Some Good Books.

TELLURIDE, COL., Nov. 26, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $10, for which please send me for one year your valuable paper. For the balance, $7, you can send me recent Freethought literature, including Mr. Ingersoll's late lectures.

To Turn Christians to the Light.

NAUGATUCK, CONN., Dec. 5, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2, for which send me "Prose-Poems and Selections," by Robert G. Ingersoll, in the $1.50 edition, and also a cabinet photograph of Colonel Ingersoll.

I receive THE TRUTH SEEKER every week. It is a great paper. I wish it had the circulation of the New York World. I read it entirely through, and then hand it to some Christian friend, hoping it may be the means of turning him from his sinful ways and that he may see the light.

With best wishes, CLARENCE CURRIER.

A Hard Struggle for Life.

LAKE SHORE, UTAH, Nov. 20, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: After so very long I inclose the small amount of $2 to apply to my subscription. I have taken THE TRUTH SEEKER since the year 1882. I have never got tired of it as yet, and I think it is doing more good for the masses of the people than any other paper in this country; but, Friend Macdonald, I have been so badly pressed financially the last three years—being now on the eve of losing my home at the age of sixty-two, after twenty years of incessant labor upon it, by foreclosure of mortgage—that I should have stopped my TRUTH SEEKER two years since, but it seemed as though I could not part with it; it has become second nature to me to look for it every week, and then I love the society it keeps; but I despise to be in arrears with my subscription, and I feel that I will be obliged to stop it at least for the present. I have tried very hard to get the whole I owe you to send with this.

I wish the grand old TRUTH SEEKER and Heston every success. H. S. BROOKS.

Thinks Flatteringly of Jesus.

NEW YORK, Dec. 6, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I had no idea that I owed you $4.75. I send you $5—twenty five cents for interest on the back account. I do not agree with you in your estimate of the character of Jesus Christ. I think it is the corruptions of his professing advocates and especially those who follow the advice of St. Paul the apostle to the Romans, wherein he is quoted as saying, "Yea, let God be true, but every man a liar, as it is written, that thou mayest be justified in thy sayings and mightest overcome when thou art judged. For if the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory, why yet am I also judged as a sinner?" But if St. Paul had known more of the effect of his doctrine on the Corinthian church, he would not have been the Jesuit or Calvinist he was, for he allows that they were guilty of crimes not so much as named amongst the Gentiles, and at last, as we read in the Revelations, all liars were condemned to hell with the cowards, for cowards are always liars. And according to the parable of the garden of Eden, it was not the stealing of the fruit of the tree of knowledge by Eve, but the lies of Satan that induced her to steal; and yet St. Paul taught some of the greatest truths ever promulgated. But as to some men

So much they scorn the throng
That if the mob by chance go right,
They purposely go wrong.

I have something more to say, but have not time to spare at present.

Respectfully, CLINTON ROOSEVELT.

Conversion of "Bob Ingersoll."

SOLDIERS' HOME, NOROTON, CONN.,
Dec. 5, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Your paper is just to my liking, especially the editorials and Observations. I have wondered for a long time why Christians did not try to suppress it. I suppose it is because you were a law-abiding citizen, and so they could not get you by the hair as they wished without special legislation, which would have to be very tyrannical before you would break the law.

So the goody-goody Christian Endeavorers and Church Leaguers have been calling on their Big Joss to convert Colonel Ingersoll to Christianity! Well, that is better than an appeal to the city to arrest him for blasphemy. I guess that the colonel is willing that they should waste their breath in prayer for him. It was only the week before last that I fell in with another cripple, who told me that "Bob Ingersoll" had renounced his unbelief in the Christian religion, and said that he had always believed in it. I tried to make a reply and bring proof that he, the cripple, was mistaken if he thought so. But it was of no use; he would not hear a word in reply and used all of the time making affirmations, with no proof, and I could not get in a word edgewise.

He seemed to think that affirmation was proof and denial was refutation when made by himself; and so, because I did not reply to him, that was proof that he was right. I knew "conceit was as good as consumption if one died of the effects;" and I thought if ignorance were bliss, how foolish it would be for me to enlighten him, if such a thing were possible? So I gave up the attempt, and each of us was more confirmed in our opinions—he, because of my silence, and I because of his frothy vaporings.

Thanksgiving.

LEXINGTON, KY., Nov. 16, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: What is the glory of the nineteenth century, the grand culmination of nature's forces, the highest point, also, of man's achievement? What is the outcome of evolutionary power, in the progress or upward tendency of events? A Thanksgiving proclamation! Think of Julius Caesar, Socrates, or Bonaparte, composing anything so childish, so absurd, so fatal to the dignity of the nation! Bonaparte was, at least, religious; he was sincere. But a man, high in office, kneeling to a fancied creator, in so servile a way in the presence of the people, is a sight disgusting in the extreme.

A gentle reminder would have been sufficient, and not have alienated so many free, high-toned hearts and reasonable minds. "Lay aside your business and prostrate yourself before a trio of heathenish gods, whose existence is doubtful, and whose acts have reflected no credit on themselves or their worshippers."

How many great men have wished to see this day dawn full of realized promise. But behold the result of the deep investigations of many ages, the scientific toil of giant minds, which one would think were able to influence the general mind of the people. Instead of trained thinkers, we have artful money lovers. Instead of a heroic spirit, eager to obtain jewels of thought, the ideas of the nation are attenuated, dissipated, the silly act of devotion being the most absorbing occupation, the surest way of obtaining all that is prized or sought.

Our president has stooped too low to secure to a frivolous nation a day when the sanctified recital of gloomy prayers will usher in a feast of turkeys and other things obtained by the unthinking crowd from every quarter of the known world.

Respectfully, ALHAZA.

Talks with Voice and Money.

OMEMEE, N. D., Dec. 2, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: At last I am able to renew my subscription. I cannot express my gratitude to you for patience, for defense of equal rights, for the maintaining of liberty, for watchfulness and the unveiling of the moves of the narrow-minded, for cautioning and instructing those on whose shoulders rests our liberty, for defending those who are slandered, for driving away the shadows of superstition, and last, but not least, for keeping before the people an instructive editorial department from which shines forth a humanitarian light, a brotherly love, a feeling for social union between man and man, between country and country, nation and nation. I like to be with you, love to read your thoughts, endorse your actions, and would, if able, stand with you to push the shadows away. Our George is the right man in the right place, and I don't see how we could get along without the Observations. Putnam is our enlightener. Then we have a Steiner. Kate Kehm Smith is gone, but we have a Susan H. Wixon. Otto Wettstein is on hand now and then, and John Peck never lets the sound die. But "them pictures!" Can Watson Heston think to pass off such an old thing for Jesus Christ, dressing him up in nineteenth century clothes, to make him presentable, to occupy a place with Uncle Sam? That Canadian authorities did not like to see him thus civilized is no wonder. But I guess Heston is right; if he had not made a suit of clothes for him, he would never have had any.

Those who think that liberty is in no danger can not be in connection with their Christian neighbors. I have heard a number of preachers, and all say that religion that can't go into politics is no religion. They advise political action for the enforcing of Sunday laws, for the building up of the Christian religion, for Christian schools and the training of the young for Christian rights, and I cannot think of all else. They point out with pride that this is a Christian nation, and praise the Puritans for establishing the same. Their patience is gone; they cannot bear to be spoken against. They must have a god and a day to tell the people all about him. They cannot live without the illusion of a first cause, the preaching of the same, and an imaginary heaven to go to when they die. They must also have the degrading story of a hell, a bottomless pit. (Pshaw! don't they know that the bottom is out?) I fancy the man whose mind from childhood is polluted with such idle tales is a slave to himself, and dies in fear of being condemned for some little mistake he committed in life's beautiful days.

You will find $5 inclosed herein.

Wants Plain Language.

CURACOA, DUTCH W. I., Oct. 11, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I received "No Beginning" and the tracts you mailed with the parcel. Inclosed you will find one dollar greenback. It is not very easy to find a greenback or banknote here. Please send me "Myth and Miracle" and "Which Way," by Ingersoll, and I will look for another dollar greenback. Excuse my penuriousness; I am not a man of money. Being a Freethinker, I sympathize with THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I admire your constancy in editing a paper whose income, as I believe, can't afford you more than a moderate livelihood. THE TRUTH SEEKER is ahead of its time, but never mind; you work for the future generations. I am also a victim of the church power; but nevertheless I still try to show her up through the press here. The power of the Christian church consists in the stupidity of the people. Popularize the sciences, and you thereby destroy the ignorance of the church. Christianity is a great lie which has taken root in the mind. It was a form of progress, and had its time of culture; but it is now demoralizing mankind. Try to ridicule in a corner of THE TRUTH SEEKER every week the faith, the dogmas, and every article of this stupid creed. Ingersoll has done vastly more harm to Christianity than Voltaire, because of his plainness of language, his simple and clear arguments. Most men do not write plainly, therefore are not convincing. Ingersoll has surpassed Voltaire. Voltaire was sarcastic and powerful in his reasoning, but he was somewhat of a believer. Ingersoll is truthful, an unbeliever, mild, and, what is more desirable, is plain in all his sayings. The ridiculousness of Christianity must be exposed; that is the way to meet it, to vanquish it. We do not care so much for philosophy, because philosophy helps theology and brings confusion. Buchner, Vogt, Spencer, Huxley, Haeckel, are our men, not Kant, Hegel, et al. I try now and then to write plain language (Dutch) for the people about soul, immortality, etc.

I hope that THE TRUTH SEEKER will make its way, and my best wishes are for your success.

Texas Freethought Fragments.

DALLAS, TEX., Dec. 3, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The Dallas Association of Freethinkers still lives and is still skimming over the surface of thought, stopping once in a while to drop a large boulder of truth into the "orthodox" quagmire. Since our celebrated prayer-test with Mrs. Sweeney we have not had much of a sensational character except one instance, as follows: Rev. W. A. Jarrel came into my office one day, and said he wished to accept our challenge to debate, but subsequent events showed that he wanted to make a counter challenge requiring us to produce "a representative man outside of Texas" to debate with him. He utterly refused to debate with a woman, saying that a woman naturally had the sympathies of an audience. I had him put his proposals in writing and duly presented them to the society, which instructed me to inform Rev. Mr. Jarrel that we had talent in Texas fully able to meet him or any other Christian. He came out in an article in the paper in which he showed his modesty by speaking of himself as "being internationally known as a voluminous book author," and as "the most noted debater in the South among the Baptists." The same day I received a postal card addressed to "Dr. Lincoln, M.D." This, of course, showed his scholarly ability. We offered to produce a man to debate with him, but we refused to send elsewhere for one.

Let me give other societies a word of advice. Do not try to raise money to keep a lecturer on hand, because half the money invested in Freethought pamphlets will do more effective work, and because any lecturer becomes monotonous, and the audience loses interest. We have found that home talent, free discussion, and an occasional lecture by some Freethought pilgrim is the best way to promote our cause. I am all the time urging our members to read THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal papers. No man can keep up with the times unless he does. Our cause is growing here and we have many friends. Our firm opposition to the American Protective Association and the way that we ventilated their methods and principles gained us many friends.

With best wishes for the old TRUTH SEEKER, which shows its good work by the enemies it makes, such as Caron and other bigots, and crusaders' papers, I remain, most sincerely, your friend,

G. S. LINCOLN.

Logic.

TYNGSBORO, MASS., Nov. 11, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I think that Mr. S. P. Putnam's address on "Rome or Reason" before the Secular Convention is the most logical of all his logical efforts, and the clearest concise exposition of the situation that has been made. "The Roman Catholic church," illogically so-called, has indeed, as he says, fostered logic, but after its own fashion and for its own benefit, so no thanks are due it for that, but rather blame, for it first condemned Aristotle and all his works, but when it found that, owing to the Saracens and the Jews, he was as lively as Banquo's ghost for all the damning, it made a sort of scientific god of him, sanctified both his paganism and his blunders, not only stealing his wisdom, but damning all those who presumed to know or dared to guess anything which he had not written.

But all high learning in Catholic schools has been for the priesthood for the sake of the "machine"—all for power to rule instead of to educate the people for self-government. But this, like all false schemes, is working out its own undoing, as some of its wise-men acknowledged. The Western Watchman (Catholic), in comparing the Christian Endeavor convention with that of the young Catholics, says that the latter suffers by the contrast, for, whereas most of the Endeavor leaders and many of their followers are graduates of colleges and universities, and thus well qualified for an offensive and defensive intellectual warfare, the young Catholic League is almost wholly destitute of such equipments, and though in advance of the priests in ideas, yet they have to depend upon the clergy in carrying out their projects.

It strikes me as though too many of those who boast of being "Freethinkers" are in a like boat, and much, if not all, their cogitation is but the rattle of the "wheels in their head"—reasoning in circles—and repetition of other men's sayings without sense of the premises or trace of the chain of argument. It is notoriously true that a large part of what is said against religious dogmas consists of sneers and ridicule, and though much of this is warranted by the ridiculousness of the subject, much of it also is misplaced, unfounded or indefensible, owing to the bad logic and worse information of the assailant. Indeed, the last resort of the church advocates, both Catholic and Protestant, is "if it were not for the churches, where would be the colleges?"—and they listen for the echo to answer—"Where?" But echo always has the last word and says—"Colleges." Yes, there would be colleges, and better ones, without than with the churches, without than with the fictions of religion and the authority of priesthood, because all that is best in the colleges, science and philosophy, such as they have, first suffered persecution by these same churches and priests, and then got in because they could not be kept out. Thus verily, "the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence and the violent take it by force."

But in this day and land of boasted independence, with a secular government, a secular society, and a Freethought federation (the last two fused together), there ought to be an independent secular school, or some sort of institution standing upon its own merits as an expounder of nature and exponent of the untrammelled and untrammeling mind of man. A school fit to train soldiers of the secular army, to save men from ignorance and superstition—from immorality now, not from its punishment hereafter. But, first of all, let us have logic, the chain of truth, and therefore the science of sciences and the art of arts; a science unknown in the public schools, an art not practiced by the common people, a word often named by those who cannot give it even a definition, and are unaware that there are books on the subject. A science which our most popular spokesman says "cannot be taught," because it is "the child of a clear brain and pure heart." As well might he say that arithmetic, grammar, music, law, etc., cannot be taught for the same reasons. These are the reasons, and the sole reasons, why any good things can be taught, because they are reasonable and pure, and the only reason why anything should be taught. Hence those who rail and jeer at logic most the most need to learn its principles.

The part I have taken, both privately and publicly, by tongue and pen, by conversation and correspondence, by sermon, lecture, and debate, long ago convinced me, by the responses received, that most of the effort was labor lost on those addressed. I found that only those who had studied logic as a science could follow me unless I turned my discourse into story, and those who were acquainted with that science sometimes volunteered the compliment that my discourse was all logic, and not infrequently did me the greater honor of accepting and avowing my conclusions, though contrary to their previous opinions.

Pursuant to all this I have labored hard for the past two years, in addition to what I had previously studied and taught, to understand the principles and methods of logic and prepare a small text-book on the subject, which I have named "How to Think," for use in grammar and high schools, and for the benefit of those who care to think well but who have passed their school time. The plan of my book excludes metaphysical wrangling and theological dogmatism; it translates the turgid technicalities, which have encumbered the science, into common English, and, whilst retaining all that is essential of "dialectic forms" in common use, excludes the mass of rebus-like "modes and figures," which rather weary than instruct the student. Thus the work has been brought within two hundred pages, but yet awaits the means of publication. I hope those who know something of my ideas and style will give me some practical encouragement. Meantime, I seek to give lectures and establish classes where I can, for the dispensing of the knowledge of this science, believing that the result will prove that where logic abounds common sense will much more abound. JOHN P. GUILD.

A Christian Well Answered.

JUNCTION CITY, KAN., Nov. 20, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: A contract was made at Dallas, Texas, June 4th, between Mrs. Sweeney, Evangelist of the Women's Christian Temperance Union at that place, and John R. Charlesworth and Mr. Paget, that the lady was to pray three months to convince them that there was a God, and in case of failure of the lady's prayers she was to admit that God did not exist and that there was no efficacy in prayer. I put the press dispatch out of the Kansas City Star and kept it until the time was up, and then attached the clipping to a letter to Mrs. Sweeney, which I wrote September 8th, inquiring the result of the test, and adding that if she could give me any evidence of there being a personal God, I would be pleased to have her do so, as I was a conscientious infidel and doubted the existence of a God, and was honestly in search of light on the subject. I also asked Mrs. Sweeney for her permission to publish our correspondence upon the subject, in answer to which she says in her reply attached hereto, dated October 2d, that I can "use it as I see fit."

I send the lady's letter for you to publish, and I will make reply to her through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER and mail her a copy of the paper.

OFFICE EVANGELISTIC SUPERINTENDENT,
DALLAS, TEX., Oct. 2, 1895.
MR. J. BARNES, Junction City, Kansas,

Dear Sir: I have just returned home and find your favor of the 8th in waiting. The article you refer to is correct down to Mr. Paget's stipulation; that is a mistake that I corrected in the next day's paper. After an experience of forty-six years I could not have made such a contract, and the fact that prayer was not efficacious in behalf of those two men when, not only I, but thousands of Christians all over the country, were praying for them, only proved to me that it is possible for the holy spirit (as the Bible teaches) to take its everlasting flight from the hearts of men who make a mockery of God and his power. You say you are an infidel, but a conscientious one, and in search of light on this subject. Oh, my brother, if you seek knowledge in the right way your doubts will soon be things of the past. But you say, "I do not believe in the Bible, and I have no evidence that there is a God." Then there is only one way by which your mind can be at rest on this question. If you are honest, go into your room (say nothing to any one) and, for once, kneel by your bedside each day with the Bible that you don't believe in unopened before you, and say, "O God, if thou art an all-wise being and can see down into my heart, then thou knowest that I doubt thy existence, but being an honest seeker after light am willing, and do now bring my heart to thee with all its doubts, unbeliefs, and sin, and ask thee to lead me out of this darkness into perfect light;" then open the book and read one chapter. But you say, "I don't believe that book." I am not asking you to believe. I am asking you to be honest with yourself, and God's word for it, ere long you will realize the wonderful blessing that will come to your heart and life. That is what we all want, happiness; you never heard of anyone regretting at death that they had lived a Christian. So if I am mistaken it will not harm me at that day, for it gives the greatest happiness here; but if infidelity is a mistake, then there is no repentance beyond the grave. I close by asking you one question. Did your mother teach you this doctrine? I have nothing but the kindest feelings for honest men seeking after the truth, and have ever been treated very kindly by your society, and have a standing invitation from their president, Dr. Lincoln, to address them at any time, but I so dislike the publicity it gives, so have thus far declined. The Freethinkers say that the God of the Bible is a cruel, revengeful God. Well, suppose he is, will unbelieving in him make him less so? Yes, the Bible does teach that God, out of Christ, is a consuming fire, but in and through Christ he is a pardoning God, and Christ is a loving, sympathizing savior, one who saves us from our sins and brings such a joy and peace into our hearts that we would not exchange it for the wealth of the world.

May the God whom I love to honor bring you unto himself, is the prayer of your unknown correspondent. Let me hear from you again, if you like.

S. J. SWEENEY, W.C.T.U. Evangelist.

REPLY.

JUNCTION CITY, KAN., Nov. 25, 1895.

Mrs. S. J. SWEENEY, W. C. T. U. Evangelist, Dallas, Tex., Respected Madam: Yours of October 2d received and contents carefully noted, and as you have given your permission that I may use your letter as I see fit, I take the liberty to reply through THE TRUTH SEEKER, and will mail you a copy, which you will kindly consider the same as my having written direct to you, and I would be pleased to hear from you at any time.

I am bound to accept your statement that the stipulation referred to in the newspaper article I sent you—that you were, in case of failure to have your prayers answered, to publicly admit that "God does not exist and that there is no efficacy in prayer"—was a mistake on the part of the reporter. You say that, after an experience of forty-six years, you could not have made such a contract. Indeed, I should think that length of time sufficient to test any theory. It did not take me nearly so long to arrive at the conclusion that prayers were not answered, and since arriving at that conclusion I have never learned of an instance of their being answered.

It is absurd to pray to an unchangeable God and ask him to change something. You represent him as being unchangeable, do you not? You represent him as infinite in knowledge, do you not? Then why be continually asking him to change this or that to please you? Why tell him what he should do, if he has infinite knowledge? Why pray to him to make himself known to Mr. Charlesworth and Mr. Paget? Did not he know that they were infidels and doubted his existence, just as well before you and the thousands you speak of had prayed three months that he make himself known to them? Why did he not answer those prayers and convert two men when it was so easy for him to do so, and such a good opportunity to prove his existence to the thousands who were watching the case? There is not the least particle of an excuse for his not answering those prayers.

You say that the Bible teaches that the "holy spirit" will take its everlasting flight from the hearts of men who make a mockery of God and his powers. The Bible also teaches, "Ask and ye shall receive." Please tell me something it does not teach, and also tell me anything that it does teach, and I will show you something from the same book contradicting that teaching. The idea of a God to whom you can turn in time of trouble for assistance, is a very beautiful idea, but the question is, is this God a fact—does he hear prayer and answer it? Reason and experience answer No. Then why not accept the inevitable, and get up from our knees, stand erect, and depend upon ourselves and humanity only in our struggle for existence? If there were a personal God, innocence should be a perfect shield, and justice would always prevail, but such is not the case. Mrs. Sweeney, I will agree that, for every fact you will cite to me going to show that there is a personal God, I will call your attention to two facts in nature showing that there is none.

I was brought up to believe in a God, and also to believe that a rainbow was a sign that the world would not again be drowned. The phenomenon of the rainbow is now easily explained by school children, and consequently it is quite generally accepted that the writer of that myth in the Bible was mistaken about the cause of the rainbow, and I think now that those who taught me that there is a God who hears and answers prayers, and who is displeased if I work or play on Sunday, or do not believe the Bible to be his work, or that the world was made out of nothing (or his omnipotence, as Talmage explains it) in six days, were just mistaken; they were honest about it, may be, but were certainly mistaken. You ask me if "my mother taught me my present beliefs." No, she did not; she died when I was nine years of age, and my uncle was appointed my guardian, and was very strict with me in religious matters always. I have been through all the experiences common to Christians, and I thought that I was in the straight and narrow (how very narrow) path, and had only to go along believing and studying the Bible and saying my prayers, and I would be sure to get to heaven. The main thing I was taught was the necessity of belief. I finally began to doubt, then to read the other side, which had always been carefully kept from me, and, in fact, I didn't suppose there was any "other side" until I commenced to investigate for myself, and now I find that it is possible for one to be happy and enjoy life, and be just as honest, and a great deal more considerate of the rights and happiness of others, without fearing any God, or devil, or hell.

If there is a just God, he cannot deal harshly with a man who tries to do as near right as possible; earns an honest living for himself and those dependent upon him; pays his debts, and does not interfere with others having the same rights he claims for himself. "One world at a time," is a good motto. We find ourselves here; we may not be able to satisfactorily explain how we came here, but it doesn't matter. It is of far more importance that we each try to make this life as pleasant as possible, than it is to speculate about some other life of which we know nothing.

If immortality is a fact, then there is not the least doubt that we will find ourselves adapted to its conditions.

Now, Mrs. Sweeney, I have not followed your instructions in the matter of daily prayer, as given in your letter, just because I know it would fail. I know it from experience—the best of teachers. However, I sincerely thank you for the advice, which I think came from a desire on your part to help me.

How can a believer claim with consistency that she "knows God," when the Bible says that he is incomprehensible and past finding out (Job xxxvii, 23; Rom. xi, 33)? Yours respectfully,

J. J. BARNES.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Laugh in Church.

She sat on the sliding cushion,
The dear, wee woman of four;
Her feet, in their shiny slippers,
Hung dangling over the floor,
She meant to be good; she had promised;
And so, with her big, brown eyes,
She stared at the meeting-house windows,
And counted the crawling flies.

She looked far up at the preacher,
But she thought of the honey bees
Droning away in the blossoms
That whitened the cheery trees.
She thought of a broken basket,
Where, curled in a dusky heap,
Three sleek, round puppies, with fringing ears,
Lay snuggled and fast asleep.

Such soft, warm bodies to cuddle,
Such queer little hearts to beat,
Such swift, round tongues to kiss,
Such sprawling, cushiony feet.
She could feel in her clasping fingers
The touch of the satiny skin,
And a cold, wet nose exploring
The dimples under her chin.

Then a sudden ripple of laughter
Ran over the parted lips
So quick that she could not catch it
With her rosy finger tips.
The people whispered, "Bless the child,"
As each one waked from a nap,
But the dear, wee woman hid her face
For shame in her mother's lap.

On Snakes.

EDITOR OF THE CHILDREN'S CORNER: In the case of the prairie-dogs, owls, and snakes which your correspondents are discussing, the most testimony seems to be in favor of the side taken by "H. G." Mrs. Jones, of Wyoming, you notice, says that the snakes and owls prey on the puppies of the prairie-dog, which would account for their entering the dog-holes. We always find animals looking for their customary food in the places where they are most likely to find it. Then Mrs. Wiley, who lives in Texas, tells us that rattlesnakes swallow rats, as you would think they ought to from their name; and if rats, why not young prairie-dogs? Owls appear to have about as good an appetite as the ostrich; they will swallow other birds whole, and in a little while spit out the feathers rolled up in a globular wad; so it is said.

The question why the rattlesnake rattles before biting, has been asked. Religious people say that it is a providential warning to prevent injury to innocent animals and man; but a providence kind enough to make such an arrangement as that, would not have made poisonous snakes in the first place. Probably the rattlesnake shakes his tail for the same reason that other animals do when disturbed; and perhaps it is for the same reason that a man gesticulates violently when excited. Such motions help to work off a surplus of nervous energy that has no other means of escape.

It is now denied that (as I was taught when a boy) you can tell a rattler's age by the number of rings on his rattle—one for each year. Old and large snakes are found with only one ring, and on others new rings grow in the course of three or four months.

About the "charming" power of snakes there ought not to be much debate. Since careful study has been made of the subject, naturalists no longer believe that snakes charm their prey. Dr. Leonard Stejneger, who has charge of the department of Reptiles and Batrachians (frogs and animals like them being batrachians) of the United States National Museum at Washington, D. C., says that reliable observation shows belief in it to be a delusion. Of course it has a basis of fact, but, like other things not fully understood, much that is said and written about the matter is the result of imagination or of guessing. Snakes do not try to "charm" mice or birds put in their cages for food. They just "corner" them as any other animal designing to eat them would do.

The basis of fact spoken of is not the power of charming in the snake, but that faculty in the victim which the men of science call "Attention." It is easy to believe that a bird may have its attention fixed on the snake, which either frightens it so it does not fly at once, or arouses its curiosity, when it stops to take a second look and gets struck. The bird flying into the snake's mouth makes an interesting addition to the story, but that part is probably thought out by the witness afterwards. Stories of remarkable happenings always grow by accretion—that is, by being added to—and people generally prefer a marvelous explanation to any other.

So, too, we often hear of animals and persons "paralyzed by fear." In the woods I have come upon rabbits suddenly, and though they are the timidiest of animals, they let me approach to within a few feet, when, recovering the power of locomotion, they skipped; and they always ran from me—never towards me. As soon as there was motion the spell broke. I once saw a girl so frightened when a cow looked at her that she couldn't move—though the cow had quite a pleasant countenance—and her mouth dropped open. Sometimes a cat will get her attention fixed on a rat-hole and you may make considerable disturbance without distracting it. Again, when you are interested in what a speaker is saying you sit still, and may not know it if you are lightly touched (by a pick-pocket maybe). You say the speaker "charms" you, but, if you were to move, his influence would be temporarily lost. To be jostled or spoken to at such a moment is almost as unpleasant as being called to get up in the morning right in the interesting part of a dream. This is Attention, and you are not "mesmerized."

I think that if our Editor of the Corner would write to Dr. Stejneger he would send her his work on snakes. As she is also a school teacher, a school director, and a commissioner besides, he ought to be glad to put his work in her hands where it would do so much good. She could then give us the latest word on this interesting topic, and Comrades Gohran and Berry could make a note of it.

EDITOR CHILDREN'S CORNER: The contribution of Mrs. Jones to the discussion on snakes, prairie dogs, and owls was timely and valuable so far as it goes. My thirty-eight years' familiarity with the prairie dogs, owls, and rattlesnakes confirms everything the lady avers, and this much more: Poisonous snakes never strike their prey with their poison fangs. So far as the rattlers are concerned, they never strike or use their fangs except in self-defense or when they are very angry. The use of the deadly fangs is either very painful or dangerous to the snake itself. He catches his prey and swallows it whole, just as non-poisonous snakes do. The rattlesnake sometimes will swallow small animals that he finds dead. I have several times found the serpent dead with poisoned picketpins in his stomach. Whenever strychnine is extensively used to exterminate prairie dogs, squirrels, mice, etc., rattlesnakes soon disappear. There is absolutely no truth in the notion that snakes charm their prey, unless the paralyzing effects of fear is "charming." That bald-headed apocrypha has been dead fifty years or more, so far as intelligent observers are concerned.

Teach children verified truth as far as possible, and don't cram their minds with stuff to unlearn.

T. R. STEVENSON.

Glens Ferry, Idaho.

NOTE.—A Picketpin is an animal that lives in the mountain regions of Idaho, resembling the prairie dog, but smaller. He gets his name from his habit of standing on his hind legs looking for his enemies. When in such position, he looks like a stake driven into the ground to tie a horse or other animal to.

Adam's Nurse.

A Sunday-school superintendent at the close of an address on the creation, which he was sure he had kept within the comprehension of the least intelligent of the pupils, smilingly invited questions.

A tiny boy, with a white, eager face and large brow, at once held up his hand.

"Please, sir, why was Adam never a baby?"

The superintendent coughed in some doubt as to what answer to give, but a little girl of nine, the oldest of seven brothers and sisters, promptly came to his aid.

"Please, sir," she said smartly, "there was nobody to nurse him."

A Popular Game.

The game proceeds after this fashion: A map is held by the judge, usually a grown person, or an older child; then, two children are chosen, and placed in separate corners.

Says the judge: "Now, Carrie, you represent New York in that corner, and Richard, you are in Moscow, imprisoned; you want to get away and reach home by Thanksgiving Day. You have got from behind the walls—but what is your directest route home?"

Then Richard has to tell each sea, country, and ocean he crosses to get home for the turkey and cranberry sauce. If he can't do it successfully he must remain right on the spot on the floor where he stopped until he thinks out his escape.

Other members of the game are placed in prison at various parts of the country. The favorite jails are now located in China and Japan on account of the interest in the war. A leading question is, "If you were put in a Yokohama prison, how would you get back to Pekin?"

Soon the room becomes filled with prisoners, all trying to get home; half of them are "stalled" in the center trying to think of the boundary line which brings freedom, others are just leaving the prison walls.

When the game has been played frequently, those who join in it get very familiar with the junction of countries, and learn many straight lines and clever jumps that had not appeared feasible before. For those who are not quite conversant with geography, easy tasks are given; for instance, to be placed in a Paris prison and find their way home to Boston.

Correspondence.

NATIONAL MILITARY HOME, O.,
Nov. 16, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I have just been reading the correspondence in the Corner. What nice, sensible letters are those of Miss Estelle Boyd and Nellie J. Held. Evidently they have had the right kind of training, and good parents to teach them the truth and what was right from the beginning. Then they have had a kind Miss Wixon to write them nice books and teach them how to live and be ladies. We hope to hear more from them, and only wish there was enough of the same kind to fill the Corner every week. I had no such kind teaching as that when I was young. My parents taught me, of course, what they thought was right and what to believe; but as soon as I came to years of maturity I had it all to learn over again. I found that they had not, in many respects, taught me correctly. We had no TRUTH SEEKERS or Miss Wixons then to teach us the right way. We had to take it as it came, let it be true or false, and in case any objection was raised on our part, it only made it the worse for us. I was taught to believe in and love Jesus and put all my trust in him. I have just read in the morning paper where a man by the name of Aaron Thomas, at Chagrin Falls, O., a worthy and most respected citizen, and "prominently connected with church and Sunday-school work," has confessed to breaking into the post-office and store at that place and committing a great robbery. What did he do with his love for Jesus and Sunday-school work while he was committing that great crime? The paper says that it has created a great sensation among the people of the place. They don't know what to think. For our part, we see nothing strange about it. It is only one of the results of false teaching and believing. He has allowed his religion and hypocrisy to run away with his reason and morality. The foundations of his faith, like all the rest, had nothing to rest on. So when it came to the test they had to give away and let all fall in the ditch together.

Health and Happiness.

VII.—CRADLING.

When an infant cries in its cradle, it is better not to take it up at every cry, and carry it about in order to quiet it, and thus uselessly fatigue its mother. Take care, however, to ascertain whether the baby is wet, or disturbed with some other discomfort; if everything is not found all right, it must be made so. If deemed advisable, communicate a few gentle movements to the cradle, which ordinarily is sufficient to lull the babe to sleep. These movements have in themselves no inconvenience, but violent motion, such as is sometimes imparted by means of a cord, should be avoided. During sleep the babe has need of pure air; never, therefore, place the cradle in some hidden recess or corner.

Diet or Regimen in Nursing.—The mother, having reposed from three to six hours after confinement, should then nurse the little one every two and a half or three hours. At night, nurse it about 11 o'clock; in the morning, about five. The remainder of the night the little one ought to sleep. The regulation of an infant's feeding time is important. Let the babe get its meals at certain hours, and at fixed intervals. This is as necessary to the health of the infant as to that of the mother. An infant that suckles continuously has no time to digest that which it takes into the stomach. Furthermore, in order that the milk may be in a condition to nourish the babe, it requires a certain length of time to gather and undergo necessary changes in the maternal fount.

Nothing is more important than that the mother's milk should be in quantity and quality such as is most likely to conduce to the health of the child as well as her own. In the case of a perfectly healthy mother but little attention to regimen is required, nothing further being necessary than that she should avoid any imprudence in diet, while in other respects she should make no change in ordinary habits. The pregnant state, however, and the subsequent exhaustion which attends parturition, very generally leaves her in a condition manifestly requiring generous treatment, in order that the health may be re-established, while provision is made for the special drain on the system which the function of lactation imposes. Among the wealthier classes, where luxurious habits tend to the diminution of constitutional vigor, and among the inhabitants of towns, the necessity for treatment is much more urgent than in country districts, where a life of physical exertion, spent, to a great extent, in the open air, implies hygienic conditions which are the very opposite of those which obtain in the other case. Ordinarily, however, the necessity for a liberal dietary is so universally recognized that there is danger of falling into a routine practice in this respect, the result of which will undoubtedly, in some cases, be the reverse of beneficial.

As the result of some experience and close observation, we are convinced that indiscriminate overfeeding and stimulating of nursing women is a more frequent cause of the disorders of early infancy than is usually supposed. Nurses and mothers can readily understand how a thin and watery milk should fail to nourish the child, but it is by no means so easy to convince them that a specimen rich in nutritive elements may possibly be, from its very richness, the cause why an infant does not thrive. We have again and again seen obstinate cases of diarrhoea, with or without vomiting, and other symptoms of gastro-intestinal derangements, which could be attributed only to this cause. Drugs are of no avail. The appearance of the mother may be such as to prevent even a suspicion of any fault on her side, and yet strict inquiry as to what she eats and drinks often points clearly to the simple and proper treatment. It is to the use of stimulants that the attention should in these cases be more particularly directed; for we often find that women are encouraged, without any reference whatever to their general health, or the state of the milk, to take considerable quantities of beer, ale, stout, gin or whisky, or of the stronger wines, laboring under the impression, as many do, that alcoholic beverages in general are a very serviceable element in the production of good milk. This is a grave error, for the contrary is the fact. Diminishing the quantity of these stimulants, and in some cases absolutely forbidding their use, will certainly be followed by a marked and immediate amelioration in the symptoms. But even when stimulants are not admitted into the dietary, the cause may still be discovered in the habitual use of food which is too stimulating in its character, or which is taken in too great quantity.

An interesting series of observations have been made directly bearing on this subject, with a view of ascertaining the nutritive value of the lacteal secretion at various periods. From analysis it would appear that the longer the milk remains in the breast, the thinner and more aqueous it becomes. It has been clearly established, further, that the milk which first flows—this being the portion soonest secreted—is comparatively watery, and that the quality of the milk becomes richer as the gland is progressively emptied. Hence a very obvious indication of treatment. When, for example, the child seems to be suffering from too rich milk, and there is reason to suppose that it is fed too frequently, and before the gland has time to fill, it may suffice to extend the period between meals, which, by giving the gland time to fill, also insures that the child will obtain milk less rich, and more suited to its digestive capabilities. And we believe that the same facts may possibly be turned to account in the treatment of the opposite class of cases, where the secretion is too watery, and yet abundant, by partially emptying the breast before the child is put to it, so that, the more watery portion of the milk being removed, the child obtains the more nutritious residue.

"Right. Now tell me what a Scribe was?"
Dismay of class. "Ah, you, Tommy?"
Tommy: "Please, sir, a—typewriter."

A WORTHY clergyman having been presented to an important living, preached his first sermon from the words: "All that ever came before me are thieves and robbers." He was surprised and distressed when the churchwardens afterwards hinted to him that, though such words might be very charitable when used by a divine tongue, his predecessors in the incumbency would think his use of them rather unjustifiable.

AN English paper recently said: "If the reader will peruse the advertising columns of the daily papers to-morrow he will find that in his desire to worship God he can take his choice of sermons with the following titles: 'Are there Rats in Heaven?' 'The Cancerous Clutch of the Courtesan's Claw;' 'Should Women Over Eighty Years of Age Wear Bloomers?' 'The Boot-leg of Beer and the Disciple's Down-fall;' 'Beelzebub's Vision of the Fearful Flames of Futurity;' 'The Milk and Honey of Paradise, with Cream, Curds, and Whey, and other Lacteals on the Side.' The clergy can always depend on having a little free advertising in these columns during hard times."

THANKSGIVING IN THE ROCKIES.

In a camp among th' "Rockies," in th' fall uv '68,
Which wuz all composed uv fellers seekin'
fortune's shiftn' fate,
We decided on Thankgivin' day t' hev a kind uv feast,
Ez 'ud bring uv recollections uv the days
we spent "Down East."
'Nd upon th' day arrivin' thar wuz gathered at th' inn
Uv our enterprisin' caterer, by name uv
"Texas Sin," Ev'ry miner in th' camp thet hed the "rocks" t' pay his way,
For th' proper celebratin' uv a grand Thankgivin' day.

Thar wuz turkeys, quail, 'nd prairie chickens, venison 'nd b'ar,
With accompanin' fixins; sich a sight, I must declar',
Ez hed never blurred th' optics uv th' patrons uv that feast,
Since they spent their last Thankgivin' with their fam'lies in th' East.
'Nd when ev'ry one wuz seated 'round thet most invitin' spread,
Our most genial host he entered 'nd he doffed his hat 'nd said:
"It may strike you, friends, ez ludicrous,
er kinder out uv place,
But I motion that we draw th' lots fer some one t' say 'grace.'"

Wa-al, a s'priseder lot uv miners never gathered in th' place,
'Nd you oughter seen th' agonizing looks on ev'ry face;
Fer, though handy with some Bible words,
th' boys, I must confess,
Wuzn't up on prayers or preachin', 'nd
a-sayin' "grace" much less.
But they wouldn't spoil th' program, so we all agreed t' draw—
Each a-shakin' in his boots fer fear he'd git
th' shortest straw.
'Nd the feller we elected for the uninvitin' job
Wuz the toughest critter in th' camp, 'nd known ez "Fightin' Bob."

But the feller he wuz game 'way through;
'nd barin' uv his head,
'N arisin' side th' table, then he shet his eyes an' said:
"Good Lord, with most sincerest thanks
we'll polish off our share
Uv the viands thet's included in this gorgeous bill of fare.
'Nd ez 'tisn't customary fer t' thank 'nd pay fer too
Any article in this here camp, we're more obliged t' you.
'Nd assumin' you're responsible fer all these blessin's lent,
Then the host on this occasion ain't entitled to a cent."

'Nd th' enterprisin' landlord thet proposed a sayin' "grace,"
Is his turn nowhed an agonizin' look upon his face.
But he riz aside th' table an' with ill-affected glee
Said: "My friends an' feller-citizens, this feed'll be on me."
'Nd "Fightin' Bob" wuz toasted ez he'd never been that day,
'Nd th' landlord wouldn't 'low a single feller thar t' pay;
But on followin' occasions when we feasted
in the place,
Thar wuz never no more drawin' fer a

INGERSOLL AND JESUS. Showing how the two agree. A poem by Samuel P Putnam.

THE LIMITATIONS OF TOLERATION.
A discussion between Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, Hon. Frederic R. Conder, Ex-Gov. Stewart L.
Woodford, before the Nineteenth Century Club of New York. "Each man has the same right to express to the whole world his ideas that the rest of the world have to express their thoughts to him." Colonel Ingersoll maintains this, the others deny it. Mr. Con-der is a Roman Catholic. Mr. Woodford a Protestant.

THE NEW GOD. "It is an open secret that man has always made his Gods. They exist in and through him, as the image exists in and through the mirror. Take away man and you take away God—the image vanishes."
This pamphlet, therefore, is a consideration of what kind of a God man should make.

He held

His fist to the nose of St. Patrick, and yelled

"Let go of that tail and that horn—
I insist!"

"Will ye moind yer own business?"
said Patrick. The fist

Drew back and returned with the sickening crash

Of a battering ram on the jaw of the rash

And unhappy St. Patrick, who, dropping the horn

And the tail, by the terrible impulse was borne

Full forty feet off, where, unconscious, he lay

Along with three others who stood in the way.

Liberty for Man,

Gems of Thought.

"KNOW THYSELF" was written over the portal of the antique world. Over the portal of the new world, "Be thyself" shall be written.—Anon.

AFTER maturity is reached benefit must vary directly as worth—worth being measured by fitness to the conditions of existence. The ill-fitted must suffer the evils of unfitness, and the well-fitted profit by their fitness.—Herbert Spencer.

I BELIEVE that the man [killed by lightning] and the gnat [killed by a swallow] are in the same predicament. If the death of neither man nor gnat is designed, I see no good reason to believe that their first birth or production should be necessarily designed.—Darwin.

CHURCHES set forth the love of God to parishes in which the passports of life are in the currency of spoliation. The frequenters of churches are the owners of tenements, the monopolizers of land, the accumulators of unearned increments.—Horace L. Traubel.

WHAT is man born for but to be a reformer—a remaker of what man has made, a renouncer of falsehood, a restorer of truth and good; imitating the great nature which embosoms us all, and which sleeps no moment on an old past, but every hour repairs herself, yielding us every morning a new day, and with every pulsation a new life.—Emerson.

Most church attendants now are women. They go to see and be seen, to get out once a week, and to keep up with the latest styles of dress-fitting. The married men go occasionally to please their wives, and the young man to see the girls; while possibly a few old fogies go because they think that God will damn them if they don't.—Independent Pulpit.

WHAT humanity needs is not people who lead unsocial and wicked lives, and are very sorry when about to die; when, by the nature of the case, they can do no more harm nor good; but people who, at an early period, begin to render valuable service to the good cause, and continue rendering more valuable services as they advance in years.—J. Cotter Morison.

THE teachers, it would seem, have need to be taught, the custodians of moral principle to be supervised. Many of their lapses, it may be, are to be set down as concessions to the weak. But while concession to the weak is always a better thing than concession to Philistinism and wealth, it is none the less dangerous. We hear much of the harm of specially helping the weak to survive; but there is much more need to guard against the evil of letting their opinions rule. We want a new intellectual ethic at least as much as a new social ethic.—John M. Robertson, in Free Review.

INDEED it is unsafe to judge of mankind and its relation to actual and possible progress when the whole world is considered only as it exists during the lifetime of the individual. Decades are dots of time to him who sees man through the ever widening and ever lengthening corridors of the past. Centuries, marshaled with their bursting epochs, may be used with care in constructing a basis or a pedestal from which the operation of great principles may be viewed. Less than these may permit a man to be entertaining, even powerful for a period, but the grasp of eternal principles he does not possess, and to that extent is unreliable if not dangerous.—Progressive Age.

HE [Voltaire] was an abolitionist—the enemy of slavery in all its forms. He did not think that the color of one man gave him the right to steal from another man on account of that man's color. He was the friend of serf and peasant, and did what he could to protect animals, wives, and children from the fury of those who loved their neighbors as themselves. It was Voltaire who sowed the seeds of liberty in the heart and brain of Franklin, of Jefferson, and of Thomas Paine. Puttendorf had taken the ground that slavery was, in part, founded on contract. Voltaire said: "Show me the contract, and if it is signed by the party to be the slave, I may believe you."—Ingersoll.

In England . . . the great thinkers have all been rebels—Locke, Hume, Mill, Darwin—and now Bain and Spencer. They are the enemies of society. It is true that the makers of civilization may become honored after their death, and that by dint of the irresistible logic of facts society is gradually forced to conform to their directions; but to each during his lifetime it has been his lot to find his work assailed with furious abuse and venomous bitterness, none the less dangerous and obstructive because arising from ignorance and prejudice and enforced by the most pitiable arguments. The philosopher finds himself in the eyes of society not honored for his intellect, but degraded and ostracized even for the efforts of his thought.—Arthur Lynch, in the Free Review.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

EVERY Woman Ought to Read It. Every LIBERAL Woman and Man Will Want It.

WOMAN, CHURCH, AND STATE.

By Matilda Joselyn Gage.

This is Mrs. Gage's latest and crowning work. It is THE book to show how the church has enslaved woman and kept and keeps her in an inferior position. A glance at its contents will show this:

The first chapter—the Matriarchate—shows that under the old civilizations woman had great freedom, but that the tendency of Christianity from the first was to restrict her liberty. In this chapter Mrs. Gage claims that to the Matriarchate—or Mother-rule—the world is indebted for its first conception of inherent rights.

Chapter II deals with the theological dogmas of original sin and celibacy. Woman, by the church, was not regarded as a human being; marriage was looked upon as vile; wives were sold as slaves; women driven to suicide; the influence of the church was unfavorable to virtue. The celibacy of the clergy produced degrading sensuality, and woman was the victim of these brutes.

Chapter III is on the Canon Law, showing how the church controlled woman by making the legitimacy of marriage depend upon its own control of the ceremony. Ancient civilization gave place to Christian barbarism, the clergy became a distinct body—at once a "holy" and an unholy caste. Learning was prohibited to women, husbands prohibited from leaving them more than one-third of their property; daughters could be disinherited, sons could not. The Reformation effected no change.

Chapter IV—Marquette—is on Feudalism and its degradation of women, the rights of "lords spiritual," the immorality of the heads of the church, baptism of nude women in the early Christian church. It also deals with some of the later-day abuses of females, like our Northwestern pines, the English debarcherias, governmental crime-makers, etc.

Chapter V—Witchcraft. In the days of this phase of religious insanity Mrs. Gage shows how the possession of even a little learning was sufficient cause to suspect a woman of witchcraft, that to keep a pet was dangerous, so rabid were the clergy not to suffer a witch to live. This persecution for witchcraft was a continuance of the church's policy for obtaining universal dominion over mankind. Women physicians of the Middle Ages were persecuted, and the "Pilgrim Fathers" continued it in America. The first synod convened in America was to try a woman for heresy, and others were stripped and whipped for not agreeing with the clergy.

The chapter on "Wives" shows how the disruption of the Roman empire was unfavorable to the personal and proprietary rights of woman—that the sale of daughters was practiced in England seven hundred years after it was Christianized—that the practice of buying wives was regulated by law—that women were not permitted to read the Bible—that they were not admitted as witnesses—that civil marriage is opposed by the church.

In Chapter VII is shown how polygamy was sustained by the Christian church, that the first synod of the Reformation convened to sanction this institution, that Luther and the other "principal reformers" favored it, as well as the American Board of Foreign Missions. The Mormon theocracy is shown to be similar to that of other Christian sects.

In the last three chapters Mrs. Gage treats of the opposition of the church to the amelioration of woman's sufferings as interference with her "curse," of woman's degradation by the church to labor unfit for slaves, of woman's "inferiority," as taught by the church to-day, and of how little value Christianity has been and is to civilization.

The work is a burning protest against the tremendous wrong done woman by the church, which controlled the state. It is also extremely valuable as history. No woman, it seems to us, can read it and remain a supporter of the religious institution which has crushed her individuality, her mentality, and degraded her person. To the woman's cause it opens an Age of Reason. It ought to be widely read for the good it will do.

"PEACE ON EARTH, GOOD WILL TOWARD MEN"—WHEN?

"The blood of thirty millions of our fellow-men cries out against the nature-hating fanatic who inculcated the belief in the sinfulness of our natural instincts, the guilt of scepticism, and the possibility of Satanic incarnations! Christianity has turned whole nations of freedom-loving men into slaves and flunkies — The worst tyranny that has ever oppressed the children of this earth was perpetrated in the name of the Christian God!" (OSWALD.)

2,000,000 butchered in the wars against the pagan Saxons, Sarmatians, and Scandinavians. 1,000,000 in the wars against the Arian heretics. 5,000,000 in the Crusades. The extermination of the Spanish Saracens. 1,000,000 in the man-hunt against the Albigenses, Huguenots, Waldenses, the Netherlands insurgents and the Thirty Years' War. 1,000,000 by the Holy Inquisition. 9,000,000 for witchcraft. 12,000,000 natives of the New World, all slaughtered through the fiendish fanaticism and hellish hate of the pious bigots who wielded the Sword of Christ!

"Think not that I am come to send peace on earth: I came not to send peace, BUT A SWORD!"

(Matt. X. 34.)

"And frantic priests waved the ill-omened cross o'er the unhappy earth. I've marked His slaves, with tongues whose lies are venomous, beguile the insensate mob, and whilst one hand was red with murder, feign to stretch the other out for brotherhood and peace. And that they now babble of love and mercy, whilst their deeds are marked with all the nar-

"If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple!"

(J.C. in Luke, XIV. 26.)

rowness and crime, that Freedom's young arm dares not yet chastize" (Shelley.)

The joyous festival of the nature-loving pagans, who celebrated the 25th of Dec.

as the return of the Sun, or birth of the new year, has been stolen, perverted and prostituted to the use of a host of ignorant myth-worshippers, as the natal day of one whose religion has turned millions of acres of fertile lands into a desert, retarded learning, opposed science, imprisoned philosophers, debauched women, tortured the helpless, slaughtered the innocent, and drenched the earth with human blood, and today the Christian world stands with murderous weapons ready to cut each other's throats!

A CHRISTMAS SERMON.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, ; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

SPECIMEN PRESS NOTICES.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

Send us a new subscriber and get the book free of all expense to you. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us $3 and get the book and the paper for one year.

PIANOS, PIANOS!

$225; - $250; - $275.

After years of earnest study and experiments, Mr. Adam Schaaf, of Chicago, one of the oldest and most experienced piano manufacturers of this country, has produced what is believed to be the most perfect Upright Piano ever constructed. The instrument is thus described:

"The volume of tone is fully equal to any of the best Square Grand Pianos, while the quality is of the most exquisite musical character—pure, sympathetic, and in the highest degree pliable. Its durability and its capacity for standing in tune, is unparalleled in the history of piano-making. In a word, this piano is made to stand, not merely as an ornamental piece of furniture (it is finished in the most artistic and handsome style), but as a musical instrument—not for a day, but for a lifetime."

These pianos received the highest honors at the World's Fair; Mr. GEORGE STECK, Judge of Awards, the best living authority on pianos, reporting as follows:

"This exhibit deserves an award for excellent tone quality, sustaining power, well planned scale, and excellent action, with easy, prompt touch. Material and workmanship are superior."

The distinguished Pianist and Composer, SIGNOR FABIANI, of the Paris Conservatory, says:

"I have used the Adam Schaaf Pianos, and have critically studied their merits, compared them with those of the best American and European makers, and I find them unsurpassed for quality and variety of tone, responsiveness of touch, elegance of appearance, and reliability in every way."

Having made special arrangements with the manufacturer, who is our personal friend, to introduce these superb pianos, we are prepared to offer them to TRUTH SEEKER readers at the above marvelously low prices—from $50 to $150 less than dealers ask for inferior instruments. Every piano is warranted for five years, and the purchaser is not required to pay for it until delivered. We will pay the freight to any station within 1,000 miles of Chicago. Full description of instruments sent on application.

If you or any of your friends contemplate buying a piano it will be to your interest to correspond with us.

A Fight for Justice.

The movement to bring about the taxation of church property in the state of Missouri is reported to be assuming commanding proportions. It seems that, so far as the city of St. Louis is concerned, the matter is in charge of a clergyman, the Rev. W. W. Hopkins, described as secretary of the Agitation Committee. Mr. Hopkins says that "church property in St. Louis, with a market valuation of over $48,000,000, is now untaxed. Fully half of this property is not directly used for church purposes, and a large part of it is held for speculation. In some instances secular occupation of church lands and buildings yields a revenue in rental to churches, but no tax is assessed. It is our purpose to secure an amendment to the constitution of the state taxing all property."

An exchange suggests that the activity of the Protestant clergy in this movement is inspired by the fact that a large preponderance of the untaxed property is held by the Catholic church, but the odium theologium does not appear in their argument, which is unanswerably sound. "We are making this fight" they say, "for the sake of right and justice, and the correction of a palpable wrong—a wrong that has forced itself upon the attention of taxpayers by the fact that the constitutional exemptions acquiesced in by a tolerant, benevolent, and magnanimous public sentiment are in numerous instances grossly abused. A vast amount of valuable property now untaxed is held for speculation and profit, and not for the purpose contemplated by the constitution of the state. By many it is urged that the churches are moral forces in a community, and for this reason their property should not be taxed. Every honest man and virtuous woman is a moral force, and on the same theory it should only be necessary for them to prove their purity in order to escape taxation. This movement is only started, and as yet we have no active aggressive organization. But if our initial efforts betoken ultimate success, an organization with an irresistible public sentiment behind it will be formed in the near future."

St. Louis Secularists should see to it that copies of the pamphlet "Church Property" (advertised on opposite page) are placed in the hands of the Agitation Committee, with the article, "An Opinion on Tax Exemption," in this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER. So fortified, if they are in earnest, the people of Missouri may carry the contest to a successful issue.

Cross Against Crescent.

When both sides of the story about the Armenian atrocities are told, the Mohammedan participants appear less black than they are painted by the Christian missionaries. There is a paper published in Ulster Park, N. Y., by Mohammed Alexander Russell Webb, which devotes much of its space to a defense of the present sultan of Turkey and to a vindication of his course toward the "rebellious, anarchistic Armenians."

Old Cetewayo, the Zulu chief, put the African situation in few words. Said he: "First you send the missionary with the Bible; next you send the trader with the rum bottle; next you send the consul with the flag; then you send the soldier with the gun." Mohammed A. R. Webb uses more words, but they mean about the same thing. Christian governments have sent to Turkey their missionaries, their traders, their ambassadors, and their guns and warships. The presence of the missionaries and Armenian followers of Christ in the Sultan's domain is used as a warrant for foreign interference with the affairs of the Moslem government, and M. A. R. Webb avers that the sultan has granted concessions such as no Christian power would have made under the circumstances. He has accorded the Armenians more liberty than they know how to enjoy, and they have used it at the expense of the property and lives of his other subjects. "They have been bold in doing this," says Mr. Webb, "feeling assured that they would be supported and encouraged by the church Christian missionary element in all parts of the world. Nor have they been mistaken; this support and encouragement have been freely and enthusiastically given to them, notwithstanding the convincing evidence that gross injustice was being done to the Turkish government." Great trouble has arisen, we are told, through lust for political power, territory, and commercial supremacy on the part of England and Russia, but these questions could be settled diplomatically and without rupture of peaceful relations were it not for "the far greater disturbing influence of Christian intolerance and fanaticism."

If we may credit the word of the editor of the Moslem World, "in no country on earth is the religious liberty of all classes more firmly guaranteed and protected than in the Turkish dominions." None are so tolerant of other religions as the followers of Mohammed (on whom be peace). His Imperial Majesty, Abdul Hamid II, sultan of Turkey and caliph of Islam, has not only given Christian missionaries every liberty, but special privileges as well. In England less than two years ago the Mussulmans of Liverpool, while engaged in prayer, were stoned by a Christian mob and several so seriously injured that they were sent to a hospital. Even Mr. Webb himself has been persecuted and robbed in America in a manner that would call down the wrath of the sultan if Webb had been a Christian missionary in Turkey. Briefly, the Christian missionaries, by working upon religious prejudices, have stirred up the Armenians to revolt, and the greedy Christian powers are taking advantage of the disturbance to agitate for the dismemberment of the Ottoman empire.

Added to the intolerance inherent in the Christian religion, the missionaries are actuated by the malignancy of the beaten. They have failed to convert one "honest, intelligent Mussulman." In all oriental countries missions are a failure, and nowhere more completely so than in Turkey.

Such is the Mohammedan version of the Armenian trouble. We do not have to accept it all as literally veracious, for when one religionist discusses the character and acts of another belonging to an opposing cult, prudence dictates that his statements should be weighed in the scale of probability. But one thing is certain—at the root of the difficulty is diversity of belief. Christian missionary zeal has brought the followers of Christ into conflict with the followers of Mohammed, and fanaticism has been safely trusted to do the rest.

Falsifying the Issue.

The Sabbath enforcers have held their mass meeting to protest against submitting the question of Sunday liberty to the voters of New York city. They held it in this town on the evening of December 16th, and there were present as speakers Bishop H. C. Potter, who presided; the Rev. A. P. Doyle, a Catholic priest; Warner Miller, a politician; the Rev. J. M. Buckley, an editor; Bishop Doane, of Albany, and Frederic R. Coudert, a lawyer. All of these sounded the same note, and it was a false one. In their call for the meeting they set forth:

"That there is nothing in the trade of a saloon keeper which should make it an exception to the long-settled policy of the state, which protects the right of rest and quiet worship on Sunday by forbidding ordinary traffic on that day."

That is all the call contains which touches the Sunday question proper, the remainder of the document being devoted to the evils of intemperance, which is another matter. Even the paragraph here quoted is a misrepresentation. Discussion of the Sunday issue has been most voluminous. Out of the mass of fallacious argument put forward, the Sabbatarians have extracted the kernel of sophistry, and that kernel is embodied in the lines quoted. It is intended to delude. We are to believe that the anti-Sunday law fight is solely in the interest of the saloons, which on its merits it is not. The saloon keepers are of course contending for what they conceive to be their rights in the matter, but the persecution of the vendors of matches, ice, neckties, and collar-buttons, and the closing of grocery stores where only provisions are sold, does not touch the liquor interests. Not the slightest evidence is adduced that the liquor dealers desire, like the parsons, to close all doors that do not open in the direction of their places of business. They ask for a repeal of the law forbidding them to do business on Sunday, which is perfectly natural, but it is not true that they desire to be an exception in that respect to other merchants. This is not said in defense of the publicans except as citizens, but to demonstrate that the Sabbatarians are conducting a campaign on false issues. All the discussion of liquor selling and the consequences of intemperance is introduced to cast odium upon the cause of a free Sunday, and for no other purpose. Admitting it to be a great pity that men will sell rum, the fact that they do sell it, as they are licensed to do by the government, gives no suggestion of a reasonable excuse for enforcing puritanical Sunday laws on men engaged in other branches of business.

Deliver us from those hypocrites who aver in the call for this mass meeting that the state "protects the right of rest and quiet worship on Sunday by forbidding ordinary traffic on that day." To say nothing about the noisiest kind of traffic, the running of railroad trains, which is not forbidden in civilized communities, the truth must suggest itself to the dullest mind that the state will be powerless to protect the quiet of any day when church bells are rung from morning till night.

Such an occasion as this meeting could not be expected to pass with no allusion to the iniquity of "submitting a law of God to the local option of corrupt cities." Bishop Doane saw to it that the omission was not made. Having illustrated his contention by saying that the state might as well submit adultery as Sabbath observance to local option, he quoted the law of God in such case made and provided, to wit, "Six days shall work be done, but on the seventh day there shall be to you an holy day, a Sabbath of rest to the Lord." Beyond doubt, he knew that this law had reference to some other day than Sunday, but, like Senator Quay, of Pennsylvania, he appeared willing to "strike out the word 'seventh' before the word 'day' and insert the word 'first.'" Besides, he garbled the law. A material part of every law is the penalty, and when we demand the enforcement of the statute itself we must do so knowing that its penalty will be inflicted on the offender; otherwise it is void. If Bishop Doane, therefore, accepts the legislation as just, he has to take all its provisions; and the provision of this act regarding the Sabbath is that "whosoever doeth work therein shall be put to death." Were we not witnesses to the fact, human testimony could scarcely convince us that a law so barbarous as the so-called Mosaic command about the seventh day, originating in an age of darkness and savagery, could be thought worthy the serious attention of intelligent people in this century.

Bishop Doane's remarks so well express the tone of the gathering that no others need be quoted. Every speaker placed himself on record as totally unmindful of the existence of such a principle as that of religious liberty, and called upon the police to turn the city into a desert on one day in seven in the interest of "quiet worship" which has never been disturbed or denied. And not one person in twenty in New York goes to church or worships elsewhere.

Catholic Mendacity.

The Catholic News of November 20th has a quite diverting editorial concerning a scene in a French court of justice. It says that this scene "must be regarded as a strong argument for the careful religious as well as secular training of youth." Emilius Gaudot, a boy of eighteen, had murdered a girl in order to rob her of about forty cents. The judge said to the prisoner that probably he would not have killed the girl if he had known how little money she had. This dialog ensued:

"Gaudot: 'And why not? What does it matter to me to have an old carcass more or less in this world? I work for any wages I can procure.'

"Judge: 'Your cynicism would disgust the very cannibals themselves. You are only eighteen, and you are charged with a capital crime. Who has taught you so much iniquity?'

"Gaudot: 'How do I know?'

"Judge: 'Do you confess to all the charges brought against you?'

"Gaudot: 'I confess all. These things are play for me.'

The counsel for the murderer saw that he must play to the galleries if he was to hope for a mild sentence for his client. So he proceeded to arraign the whole governmental machinery of France for its failure to keep the crucifix in the schools. Here is a sample of his buncombe:

"I see before me and I salute the Image of the Crucified One. This Image is here in the very court where you condemn the guilty. But tell me why is it not in your schools to which you invite the little child in order to instruct him? Why do you punish men under the eye of God? Why is the God of Calvary presented for the first time to Gaudot here when he sees himself struck down by the law? If the Crucifix had been presented to Gaudot when he sat at his desk in school, Gaudot would not now sit on this bench of infamy."

But there is nothing in the account as given by the News that goes to show that Gaudot had not received religious instruction. So far as we know, he may have been brought up very piously. Nothing in his acts indicates to the contrary, for not even his lawyer would pretend in private conversation that no crimes are committed by those who have been educated religiously. There have been multitudes of Catholic criminals, of all stations in life, from a Borgia on the papal throne to the humblest sneak thief or garroter. There are today thousands of inmates of our jails and penitentiaries who have seen the crucifix from their infancy through youth to manhood and womanhood. The assertion of the lawyer that "if the crucifix had been presented to Gaudot when he sat at his desk in school, Gaudot would not now sit on this bench of infamy," is paralleled by the equally mendacious assertion of the editor of the Catholic News here in New York that "no honest man can doubt that religious instruction would have prevented this young man from committing the terrible crime that now sends him to his death." If this claim holds good in the case of all Catholic-educated persons, we shall be greatly indebted to the editor of the Catholic News if he will explain the presence in Sing Sing and Auburn of the hundreds of Catholic guests who are forcibly detained in the state penal institutions in those places.

Announcement.

We have been the recipient within the past two weeks of from one to forty dozen clippings of clerical attacks upon Colonel R. G. Ingersoll. His recent lecture tour, as his tours always do, has stirred the followers of the meek and lowly one to renewed efforts at slander and personal vituperation, has given their imaginations new wings, and their inventiv powers new incentives. There is nothing, apparently, like the Christian religion to make men mean; and a man who loves God a great deal usually hates one who doesn't in proportion.

Let our friends have patience. We are preparing for the THE TRUTH SEEKER, and shall also put it in pamphlet form, a full consideration of these miserable lies, showing them to be such, and thus enable all Freethinkers to squelch the dirty little preachers who vend and revend the libelous slanders of a nameless scoundrel, as well as infamous inventions of their own.

We do not expect to be able to chase every lie to its grave, but we shall kill the stock ones, and the suckers which spring up around their roots can be mowed off by anyone. They all have a common parent tree. We shall begin to print it in the paper early in January.

In Plymouth church, Brooklyn, December 12th, was held a prize spelling match. Two deacons of the church, not being spelled down, agreed to toss a coin to decide which should take the prize of $5, and it was done. There can be no question that they gambled in the sight of the congregation, and broke the law as effectually as if they had bet on a horserace or a throw of dice. If gambling is a crime, they were criminals. It is unnecessary to add that neither of the two deacons was arrested, but it may be appropriate to note occasionally that pious opposition to games of chance and other iniquities is prompted principally by a lust for notoriety and conducted on a basis of canting hypocrisy.

Christ-up-to-date Schlatter, the ex-shoemaker, perpetual motion crank, and ex-bedlamite, has already attracted the attention of a greater number of people than ever heard of the Galilean in his day, and the amount of testimony published about him is much more voluminous than the gospels. Still, the world waits to hear of one verifiable cure that he has effected. His case is valuable as exhibiting phenomena similar to those said to have attended the career of his predecessor nearly two thousand years ago, and as affording us a chance to judge how much truth there is likely to be in the older accounts. Taking advantage of the opportunity for comparison, we find that messiahs are very common clay, and that the problem which they raise is not whether they are inspired or uninspired, but whether they are lunatics or impostors.

Minds not clarified by the presence of the "holy spirit" will be somewhat bewildered to learn that while as vicar of Christ Pope Leo XIII. is infallible, as a cardinal and author he fell into such grievous error of doctrine that one of his books is in the Index Expurgatorius and no faithful son or daughter of the church may read it. When he was Cardinal Joachim Pecci, and before heaven had bestowed upon him the portfolio of God's vicegerent on earth, he wrote a work on the "Sacred Blood of Mary," in which he argued that the susceptibility of the Virgin to lunar influences should be made the subject of pious hilarity and celebrated periodically by a feast. It is recorded that "the author, in a praiseworthy manner, made submission and disapproved of his own work."

We are in receipt of a copy of the Westminster Endeavor, published at Indianapolis, Ind., containing a marked paragraph vaunting the fact that the above-mentioned religious paper is printed upon the press formerly belonging to the plant of the iconoclastic Ironclad Age, now suspended. We are not disturbed. The readers of the Age do not go with the machinery which produced it; and since that machinery can no longer be put to its original use, its fate is doubtless a matter of as much indifference to them as to ourselves. Nevertheless, if some Freethinker, once a reader of Dr. Monroe's paper, should chance to revisit the glimpses of the "Den" and observe the old press working off Endeavorers, he might muse, with Hamlet, "To what base uses we may return, Horatio!" And it might take no great effort of the imagination for him to conceive of the noble dust of Alexander stopping a bung-hole.

A remarkable religious revival is reported to be in progress among the inmates of the Indiana state prison at Indianapolis, more than one hundred of the most hardened convicts having professed conversion, while a Christian Endeavor society with two hundred members has been organized within the prison walls. According to the constitution and by-laws of the Endeavorers, every local society is entitled to send delegates to the national convention, and the members of the Indianapolis branch are wondering if the rule will be permitted to work in their case. If so, there will be lively competition for choice of delegates; but though the privilege of meeting with the central body may be denied these new converts, they may be cheered by the pretty sure prospect that the organization they have joined will, from time to time, send delegates to worship with them where they are.

"The recent papal letter condemning religious congresses was somewhat of a surprise, because confessedly the Catholics made the best showing at the Chicago Parliament of Religions. Without going to the length of anathematizing such assemblies, the Pope has placed an interdiction upon them. In this respect his views coincide with those of certain Episcopalian divines who are also disturbed by congresses that tend to merge sects and creeds. But neither pope nor divine can check the impulse toward brotherhood."—N. Y. Jewish Messenger.

The real objection to parliaments of religion is that they are virtual recognitions of the scientific conception of religion, that it is a development instead of a revelation. This is why Leo, the Adventists, the Reformed Presbyterians, and other ultra orthodox Christians discourage such assemblages. They see, as we see, that these gatherings place Christianity on the same plane with the "heathen" and "pagan" religions. The comparative study of theology is a deadly stab in the vitals of special revelation. Parliaments of religion are for the comparative study of theology. Therefore all far-seeing and consistent defenders of the dogma of exclusiv salvation must oppose such parliaments. Regarding the assertion contained in the closing sentence of the Messenger's paragraph, it is not entirely "the impulse toward brotherhood" that is drawing the sects together. Many religionists, Christians in particular, realize that it may be better to relinquish some of their absurd pretensions concerning the origin of their dogmas for the substantial benefits of a union that will give them, through legislation, a closer grip on the consciences and liberties of their neighbors. They reason that it will not matter so much about the orthodoxy of a person's belief so long as good stiff Christian laws compel him to keep his mouth shut and at least not openly defy the social conventions based on the assumption of the divine sanction of its anti-natural creed. The desire to secure political supremacy explains a great deal of the prevailing agitation in favor of church union.

"A dispatch from New Rochelle, N. Y., speaks of an old homestead on the road to White Plains, which was burnt, as having been 'frequently visited by the Atheist Thomas Paine.' Thomas Paine in the 'Age of Reason,' explicitly denied being an Atheist, and affirmed that he believed in one God. If he ever avowed himself an Atheist, or hesitated to declare that he believed in one God, we should like to have some reader who is in possession of the proof communicate with us."—Christian Advocate, Nov. 28, 1895.

Your mail will not be burdened with such communications, doctor, though if every parson who has made the statement that Paine was an Atheist, without having the proof in his possession, should communicate with you, you would need another hand to open your letters. Paine's argument for the existence of God, made in his address before the Theophilanthropists of Paris, is the only safe refuge of present-day Theists.

The Rev. Dr. Rainsford, of St. George's church, New York, at a banquet of the Methodist Social Union a week ago, made the statement that the church was growing more unpopular every day. Murmurs arose among his auditors, but he went on:

"Say what you will, the church is not holding its own. Fewer people, in proportion to the total population, attend church in New York city to-day than did ten years ago. . . . Close all the saloons, and you won't benefit the poor man a bit. I am against closing the saloon till you give the poor man something better in its place. Put the best and handsomest churches in the slums, give them the best music, and put the strongest man to reform the worst scoundrel."

The truth of Dr. Rainsford's statement is not at all doubtful. Churches that are engaged in a war upon the community must expect to lose ground. It is enough that they ask intelligent persons to believe their impossible stories and to accept their ridiculous creeds, without putting themselves in the attitude of combatants toward the very people for whose salvation they profess to be laboring. When a church measures its success, not by the number of converts it has made, nor by the amount of good it has done, but by the number of police arrests it has caused, it ought to grow unpopular, and we are glad to hear from so reliable a statistician as Dr. Rainsford that it is doing so.

The closing of New York's saloons on Sunday is reported to have reduced the visible amount of drunkenness, but it has had another effect not so salutary. Crimes of violence are on the increase, and there are more of them on Sunday than on other days for the reason that the police are so intent on preventing citizens from getting their customary beer that they have less time to devote to protecting them. One of our judges, in charging the grand jury recently, remarking that the number of assaults and robberies was unprecedented in the history of the city, said that a condition of affairs existed involving dangers to life and property such as should be found in no civilized community. This is without doubt directly traceable to the religious and "moral" crusade inaugurated by the police commissioners. If a police officer can make an arrest unattended with danger or even effort, like that of a street pedler, a bartender, or a woman suspected of accosting men on the street, it assures him relief from the monotony of patrolling, and gives him a half day off to attend court the next morning. In the ten weeks ending December 16th there were 143 crimes against life and property in New York city. These included nineteen murders, thirty-nine felonious assaults, nine incendiary fires, thirteen highway robberies, and sixty-two burglaries. Few of the criminals were apprehended, but the police managed to make about five hundred arrests for violation of the Sunday law.

A new Comstock law has been introduced in the Senate of the United States by Vilas, of Wisconsin. It is a duplicate of the notorious postal statutes passed by the "drunken Congress" of 1873, and is designed to establish a surveillance by the Vice society over matter consigned to express companies and other common carriers. Besides prohibiting the transmission of certain books, prints, and pictures, it provides a penalty of $5,000 fine and five years' imprisonment for sending letters the literary taste of which is not approved by the promoters of ignorance. By this bill it is also made unlawful to directly or indirectly give any information, in a written or printed communication as to how or by what means an undesired increase of the population may be averted. As advice against marriage, as well as the advocacy of chastity, would come under that head, it is evident that the framers of the bill regard the Malthusian question as settled, and the married are condemned to suffer the most serious consequences of acts in which they may be willing or unwilling participants. It is abominable. There is no warrant under the Constitution nor under the heavens for such interference with private correspondence and business transactions. It should be condemned and resented by every person with sufficient self-reliance to mail a letter without first submitting it to his grandmother for approval. The bill is numbered "Senate 556," against which protests should be directed to members of the Senate.

It is an old saying that if certain persons are accorded a sufficient length of rope they will hang themselves. So it is with some abuses. Given time, they eventually lead to their own abolition. The nuisance arising from the appointment of chaplains in legislative assemblies seems to be approaching the point where abatement may come as a natural result. The Evening Post says:

"The widespread disgust over the opening prayer of the new chaplain of the House ought not to pass without leaving some impression. This performance of the Rev. Mr. Couden is only the worst of a long series of offenses against decency perpetrated by clergymen who have offered prayer before legislative bodies and party conventions of late years. The political prayer has become a public scandal, which ought to be suppressed. The only effective way of accomplishing this seems to be to abolish the system of prayers on such occasions. It is a practice which, while appropriate enough in a day and in a state when only church members were allowed to vote, and when the clergy exercised power over the government, has now become an anachronism, and, by consequence, a worse than empty form. It belongs in the same category as the 'election sermon,' which used to be preached before each new legislature in Massachusetts until the lawmakers refused to hear it, and the Fast day, which nobody would keep; and the chaplaincy 'must go,' as each of these other similar institutions has already gone."

We do not know how Chaplain Couden has offended the Post. Probably he prayed as he thought those who elected him would like to have him pray, and without regard for the feelings of party opponents. The political sympathies of the chaplain's God are supposed to be with the faction having control of the House and its patronage. But no matter what Mr. Couden said; it was not the prayer, but the uttering it in a legislative body as the agent between that body and some supposed deity, and taking pay for it out of the public treasury, which constituted the offense. It may have been prejudicial to decency, or even scandalous; it certainly violated common sense. Official prayers at public expense are a sort of pious robbery, and when a chaplain prays in the House or Senate and then draws his salary for doing so, the morality of the act is not much above that of a pilferer who first crosses himself and then appropriates a valise that does not belong to him.

Something for Colonel Ingersoll's Friends.

We have made a lot of glass paper weights with the photograph of Colonel Ingersoll in them which we can furnish for 50 cents each. The picture is a very good one, the weight is heavy, and every Freethinking business man ought to have two or three on his desk to hold his papers down. The ladies will of course be pleased with so handsome an ornament for center-table or mantel. In the library, too, and wherever there are papers to hold down, it will come handy, as well as being a souvenir of the greatest heretic in the world. Sent by mail or express prepaid for 50 cents.

A Controversy to be Peacefully Settled.

Probably all Freethinkers believe in peaceful methods of settling international disputes. War and religion, as Winwood Reade pointed out, have played parts of about equal importance in the martyrdom of man. Prof. Goldwin Smith, a resident of Toronto and a friend of THE TRUTH SEEKER in its contention for the right of carriage in the Canadian mails, was recently asked for a statement of his views upon President Cleveland's message upon the Venezuela boundary question, and his opinion as to the probable termination of the dispute. He said:

"No one, I think, who has been much among Americans and conversed with men of different parties and classes among them, will be much surprised at Mr. Cleveland's message. I am firmly convinced that since the abolition of slavery there prevails among them no desire for territorial aggrandizement. The absence of such a desire was shown when they refused to annex San Domingo, and has appeared on other occasions. I have never in all my intercourse with them heard the slightest expression of a desire to infringe upon the independence of Canada. I have no doubt that as an independent country we might rest in perfect security at their side, but to the Monroe doctrine I have always believed them to be strongly attached, and I doubt not that President Cleveland in asserting it on this occasion will have their general sympathy and support.

"They regard it not as a manifesto of American aggrandizement, but as a charter of independence for this continent and a declaration that the New World shall be allowed to work out its own destiny, free from any interference on the part of the powers of the Old World.

"They were resolved to apply the principle in the case of Mexico, and they did insist with success on the withdrawal of the French emperor and the extinction of the Latin empire which he founded. In telling the powers of the Holy Alliance that an interference on their part with the political independence of South American republics would be regarded as an act unfriendly to the United States, President Monroe clearly implied that the United States occupied the position of a tutelary power. It is singular that this should not hitherto have been generally noticed, but it is certainly a fact.

"I think it doubtful whether any European power would be permitted, if the United States could help it, to make this continent the scene, basis, or highway of its wars. I rather think that the United States would be inclined to exercise that tutelary authority in guarding the peace of this continent. Our two railways are almost as much American as Canadian. They are practically in no small measure under American control. I doubt whether they would be allowed to be freely used for the transmission of troops and munitions of war to be employed in war against any power with which the United States were at peace. In case of war I suspect that Great Britain's only safe route to India would be around the Cape of Good Hope. I have been speaking as to the Monroe doctrine generally and the attachment of Americans to it, which prepared me for the attitude assumed by Mr. Cleveland.

"On the merits of the Venezuelan question in particular I would not presume to judge between the opinions of the great diplomatists arrayed on the two sides. It appears to be simply a boundary question, and all boundary questions, I should say, are cases for arbitration. I can, indeed, conceive of no class of cases to which arbitration is more plainly applicable than these. I do not doubt that the controversy will be brought to a peaceful termination."

An Opinion on Tax Exemption.

The following is a synopsis of a decision by the Supreme Court of the state of Oregon at its October term, 1895, in the case of The Portland Hibernian Benevolent Society, respondent, vs. Penumbra Kelley, appellant (opinion by Bean, C. J.), which will interest Secularists:

The society is incorporated under the laws of Oregon, to dispense charity to its members and their families. It owns a lot in Portland, on which is a three-story brick building, all rented for stores, offices, and a public hall, except one room, which is occupied by the society; the revenues being exclusively devoted to the objects and purposes of the society. The suit was brought by the society to restrain the sheriff from enforcing the collection of taxes levied upon the property for state and county purposes for the year 1892, on the ground that the property is exempt from taxation under the constitution and laws of the state. The constitution says: "The legislative assembly shall provide by law for uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation; and shall prescribe such regulations as shall secure a just valuation for taxation of all property, both real and personal, excepting such only for municipal, educational, literary, scientific, religious, or charitable purposes as may be specially exempted by law." The law says: "The personal property of all literary, benevolent, charitable, and scientific institutions, incorporated within this state, and such real estate belonging to such institutions as shall be actually occupied for the purposes for which they were incorporated, shall be exempt from taxation."

The sheriff contended (1) that the society "is not a charitable institution, within the meaning of the law, because its benefits are confined to its own members and their families." (2) "That the property assessed is not actually occupied for the purposes for which it was incorporated." The first point, the court decided against the sheriff. The second, it decided in his favor. The opinion on the second point is as follows:

We are clear that the property in question is not exempt from taxation because it is not actually occupied for charitable purposes.

Subdivision 3 of Sec. 2,732 (Hill's Ann. Laws of Oregon) under which the exemption is claimed, exempts only such real property belonging to incorporated charitable institutions as shall be actually occupied for the purposes for which they were incorporated. It does not exempt from taxation the enumerated institutions as such or real estate simply because it belongs to such institutions or even because it is used for charitable purposes, but it expressly confines the right of exemption to such real estate only belonging to them as shall be actually occupied in a particular manner and for a specified purpose, and this right therefore clearly cannot be extended to property occupied and used for other and different purposes, although the revenue derived from its use is devoted exclusively to the objects for which the institution was established. It is the actual occupancy of the property which determines its right to exemption and not the use made of its proceeds. The plain and obvious meaning of the statute is that only the real estate actually occupied and in use by these different institutions for the purposes for which they were organized, shall be exempt from taxation. While so occupied and used it does not come in competition with the property of other owners and the purposes for which it is used were supposed by the legislature to be a sufficient benefit to the public to justify its exemption from the burdens of taxation imposed upon other property. But when such property is used for the purpose of accumulating money the law imposes upon it the same burden of taxation as it imposes upon other property similarly situated. The statute does not undertake to discriminate between the uses which different societies or individuals will make of the proceeds of their business and determine for that reason that one shall be taxed and the other not. It deals with the property as it finds it, and not with what may be done with its proceeds in the future. Upon this question the authorities are practically unanimous under similar statutory provisions.*

H. 306; Morris vs. Masons, 68 Tex. 698; Proprietors

It is so manifestly just that all property shall bear its due proportion of the expenses of government that laws granting exemption from taxation are always strictly construed, and before such exemption can be admitted the intent of the legislature to confer it must be clear beyond a reasonable doubt. Thus it is held that laws exempting from taxation "houses of religious worship," or "buildings erected and used for religious worship," or "property used for religious purposes," etc., do not exempt a parsonage erected by a religious society for the use of its minister, although occupied by him free of rent and built on ground which would otherwise be exempt.*

And a building belonging to the Young Men's Christian Association which contains above the basement—in which are the gymnasium, bowling alley, and bathroom—twenty-two rooms, only one of which is devoted to public worship, was held not exempt under a law exempting "every building used exclusively for public worship" (Y. M. C. A. of N. Y. vs. Mayor, etc., of N. Y., 113 N. Y. 187). The constitution of this state requires an equal and uniform rate of assessment and taxation of all property excepting "such only for municipal, educational, literary, scientific, religious, or charitable purposes as may be specially exempted by law." Taxation is, therefore, the rule, exemption the exception; and nothing can be held to be exempt by implication. It is only such property, used for the purposes specified in the constitution, as the legislature may specially exempt which can escape taxation. Exemption is not a matter of right, but a pure matter of grace, and every person or corporation claiming that his or its property or any part thereof is exempt must be able to show clear constitutional or legislative provision to that effect. The legislature in its wisdom has provided that, of the real property belonging to literary, benevolent, charitable, or scientific institutions incorporated within this state, such only shall be exempt from taxation as shall be actually occupied for the purposes for which they were incorporated, and under all the rules for the construction of exemption laws this cannot be held to include real property which is occupied for other purposes, although the revenues received therefrom may be used for the purposes of the corporation. Some of the authorities cited go to the extent of holding that when a portion only of a building belonging to such an institution is occupied for the purposes for which it was incorporated and the remainder is occupied by tenants paying rent, the entire building is liable to taxation; but the general tenor of the authorities, and no doubt the better rule, is that in such case the assessor in estimating the value of the property should make a proper allowance for the portion of the building occupied by the society, so that the tax levied will be laid only upon the value of that which is not exempt, though the property may be assessed as a whole.

It is insisted by the plaintiff that the state is estopped from levying the tax in question for the reason that while it has owned the property assessed since 1877 no attempt was made to assess it until the year 1890, and that relying upon that fact it borrowed in that year $33,000 on a mortgage to enable it to erect the building now on the premises, and stipulated and agreed to pay the taxes on such mortgage. But the neglect or omission of the proper officers to assess the property cannot control the duty imposed by law upon their successors, or affect the legal construction of the statute under which its exemption from taxation is claimed (Vixburg S. R. P. R. Co. vs. Dennis, 116 U. S., 665).

I am indebted to the Hon. T. W. Davenport, State Land Agent, of Salem, for a transcript of the decision, from which to make the foregoing extract for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I send the authorities cited, thinking they may be useful to others.

The International Freethought Congress.

Translated from Foreign Journals by Gustav Nelson, M.D.

The International Freethought Congress, which was held at Brussels, Belgium, Sept. 22d to 25th, this year, was a decided success.

Delegates from nearly all countries except the United States and Canada were present. France was represented by twenty-five delegates and Belgium by forty-four. Spain, Holland, Germany, Austria, Italy, Switzerland, Norway, Sweden, Australia, England, Mexico, and various republics of South America had delegates present. The French as well as the Belgian secular press sent reporters, who gave a faithful account of the proceedings of the congress.

Among the delegates especially mentioned by the Brussels papers were Paul Robin, founder and for many years director of the orphan asylum at Cempuis; Paul Bernard, Schacre, Mr. and Mrs. Pasquier Bousseret, Marie Veronne, all from France; Odon de Buen and Adolfo Moglin, Spain; Dr. Fulpius, Switzerland; Nellie van Kol, Holland; Mrs. Hedwig Wilhelmi, Germany and Austria; Jordan, Wheeler, Wald, England; Goudstekker and Barbessa, Italy; Deluc, Des Essarts, Furnemont, Vandewelde, Cavrat and Hektor Denis, Belgium.

The Brussels Freemason lodge, "Les amis Philantropes," tendered free of charge their beautiful lodge building. Sunday morning, President Furnemont opened the proceedings and introduced Prof. Hektor Denis, who spoke on the subject of evolution and coming victory of the spirit of humanity. The next speaker was the deposed Spanish university professor, Odon de Buen, who in his speech declared that the present congress was but the continuation of the one held three years ago in Madrid, and which was prohibited by the government. He stated further that this unlawful and tyrannical proceeding of the Spanish authorities had given Freethought an additional growth in Spain. Barcelona has to-day a Freethought society numbering over two thousand members, with a rationalistic kindergarten attached. The Congress, upon the motion of delegate Lenormand, formulated an address of sympathy with the striking workmen of Charmeaux.

The afternoon session, presided over by Paul Robin, was a stormy one. The first question to be debated was a resolution in favor of the abolition of war, on which all agreed, until the Parisian delegate, Schacre, demanded that an exception be made in the case of France and Germany, inasmuch as no peace was possible so long as Alsace-Lorraine remained German. His amendment was voted down.

Mrs. Wilhelmi protested against the recent Sedan celebrations in Germany, as being an outrage not alone against the French people, but against the whole world. She said that resolutions against war were futile; people enjoy hearing them, but the governments laugh at them. A Miss Barbarousse (France) proposed to stop war by refusing to serve. The proposition was received with acclamations, not so much on account of its practicability as because of its brevity. Although the general sentiment of the Congress was against war, it was deemed better to carry the further discussion over to the next congress.

The second question was regarding the "relations of church and state." The various resolutions pertaining to this subject were agreed upon without trouble, but when it came to the discussion of the resolutions denying the right of church organizations to hold property, to receive endowments, and to engage in mercantile pursuits, trouble arose at once. The French delegates and several of the Belgian—in fact, the Socialistic delegates—spoke in its favor, while others, especially Mr. Vandewelde, in a passionate and eloquent speech, fought against it. He warned the Freethinkers against intolerance. Nobody possesses the whole truth. Even in the church all is not bad. Let us separate church and state, divest the former of its freedom from taxes, and of its financial support from the state; tear the children from the grasp of the church and let the state educate them. Let us make the clergy and laity equal before the law, but remember to do not to others what you would not should be done to you.

Mrs. Wilhelmi pointed out that this was a Freethought congress. We had nothing to do for or against Socialism; religion, the church, no matter what kind, is our enemy.

Speaker followed speaker, words grew warmer and warmer, and when finally the original resolution was accepted by a vote of 24 against 13, Mr. Vandewelde arose and stated that he could not indorse by his presence a resolution smacking of intolerance, and he was therefore compelled, although agreeing with the Congress on every other point, to leave the meeting. And he and his friends withdrew.

The next point in the order of the day was "The Equality of Man and Woman." The following demands were adopted without a dissenting vote: 1. Abrogation of all laws tending to protect man at the expense of woman. 2. The same wages for work done by man or woman. 3. Regulation of labor-conditions by international law.

Delegate Maurice offered an amendment providing for the institution of a privileged "society for the rights of mothers" (une société matricale), but it was disposed of by another amendment demanding absolute social, political, and economic equality for the sexes.

The congress recommended that in order to counteract the excessiv development of the emotional nature of woman, which remains the chief obstacle to her embracing Freethought, provision should be made for celebrating the birthdays of prominent women as well as men, for instructiv lectures for the benefit of women, for the use of music and song in all our meetings and within the family circle, and for the discussion of scientific and literary subjects among women.

"The Protection and Education of the Child," and "The Founding of Rationalistic Schools," were the next subjects brought under discussion, and they caused a stormy debate. The following resolutions were presented: 1. The foremost duty of the Freethinker is to insure his children from very infancy instruction in the principles of natural morality founded upon Freethought. 2. To further this object, there ought, in every place where a sufficient number of Freethinkers liv, to be started rationalistic schools independent of the state, where boys and girls from 6 to 15 years of age, in common, can receive a modern scientific education.

One of the delegates said that it was the duty of Freethinkers holding important offices or sitting in legislativ bodies to pay special attention to educational matters. The next speaker gave an account of the rationalistic orphan school at Brussels, which was opened last October. Paul Robin, the late principal of the Cempuis orphan asylum, pointed out the mischievous social influences on education. These influences, he said, hinder all attempts to bestow a good education, for society at large as it now is destroys whatever good is accomplished individually. In its educational efforts society entirely loses sight of the fact that the development of each individual has, or should hav, for its ultimate object the realization of the greatest amount of happiness. The time to begin a child's education is not when it is young, but before it is born. A good education necessitates a good birth; one cannot exist without the other. We must supplant in a sensible manner the present careless way of bringing children into the world. We must instruct the grown-up people how they can prevent, without harm to themselves, the giving birth to too many children and to mental or physical wrecks.

A perfect hurricane of objections assailed the remarks of the last speaker, and it is worth recording, to the shame of the male sex, that, with a few honorable exceptions, the speaker was sustained in his views by the women delegates only. Also Heinrich Wilhelmi made an excellent speech in which she supported Paul Robin. Mrs. Nellie van Kol, a delegate from Holland, likewise supported the speaker. As the congress could not come to any agreement on the resolutions offered, it was decided to refer the further discussion of them to the local societies. An effort was made at a later sitting to bring these resolutions to a vote, but the opposition, led by Paul Robin and the women, came out victorious.

The Swiss delegate, Dr. Fulpius, proposed that the congress appoint a day every year which Freethinkers of all countries should celebrate. President Furnemont pointed out that we had such a day in the 1st of May, the universal labor day. Marie Veronne, French delegate, deplored the lack of parliamentary etiquet as evidenced in the proceedings of the congress, and on behalf of the French delegates offered a series of rules to be used in the future. The debate on these regulations was put off to a future congress, but the present one recommended their acceptance.

A proposal to restrict the number of mandates and votes of each delegate met with opposition from the French delegates, who represented 250 societies in the present congress. After a long debate it was resolved that a delegate could be entrusted with any number of mandates, but that he should be allowed no more than three votes.

Rome, with Milan as second choice, was selected as the seat of the next congress. The business department of the International Freethought Federation was transferred from Brussels to Paris. When the congress adjourned, the delegates parted to meet again in the evening at a sumptuous banquet given by the Brussels Freethinkers to the foreign delegates.

Does the Average Christian Read the Bible?

If anyone will take the trouble to investigate this question he will be surprised at the ignorance of the great mass of Christians of the book called the Holy Bible. He will find that they glibly quote whatever favors their creed, and when that is done, all is done. They know no more of the Bible in general than they know of the Zendavesta or Koran; that is to say, nothing at all. Once I quoted a part of the fourth chapter of Ezekiel, which gives a recipe for a very unsavory cake, to a lawyer of eminence and a very pious Christian. You may imagin my surprise when my statement was flatly contradicted, and I was roughly handled for blaspheming the holy word of God. When he became a little cooler, I asked him if he had a Bible. He produced one, and he was soon reading the passage in question. His utter amazement clearly showed he had never read the disgusting passage before. When he had finished it, he closed the book, arose, and walked away, forgetting to apologize for his Christian courtesy toward me. My son, Dr. G. M. Davidson, of Polk's Station, Tenn., was once warmly exhorted by the Rev. Mr. S. to lay down his Infidelity, and become a follower of the meek and lowly Jesus. My son told him he could not believe certain doctrinstought by Jesus, and quoted as a specimen the twenty-sixth verse of the fourteenth chapter of Luke: "If any man come to me, and hate not his father and mother, and wife and children, and brethren and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple." The reverend gentleman with much warmth and indignation affirmed that no such language could be found in the Bible. The passage was at once produced. He read it, but, like a sheep being led to the slaughter, "he opened not his mouth." I have often said, and I see no cause to change my mind, that if every honest, sensible man and woman in every Christian community should calmly sit down and read the Bible carefully through, not because they believe it, but with a view of learning exactly what it teaches, there would not be one honest, sensible man or woman left in the church in a dozen years. Where is there a human being with a decent heart in him that can hate his father and mother, brother and sister, wife and children? It would disgrace a brute to accuse him of such heartlessness.

Religious Vandalism.

Says the New Jersey Forester: "The growing of Christmas trees for market would be if properly conducted a legitimate and, no doubt, profitable business. Although the custom is time-honored and gives pleasure to children for a few days, it seems a shame to sacrifice thousands of beautiful young trees for such useless purposes. There is hardly an old field in Southern New Jersey which does not show the work of Christmas thieves. They cut down the thriftiest cedars as soon as of a marketable size, and cut the tops out of full-grown trees. All this is to celebrate a custom the meaning of which nobody exactly knows. The city of Paris uses 40,000 Christmas trees each year."

The timely suggestion of the New Jersey Forester is what the writer of this has along advocated, especially in his last report. By "saints and sinners" our talk was considered sacrilegious. But we know we are right. Millions upon millions of young and most beautiful spruces and balsam firs are annually cut and shipped in carloads over the Northwest, supplying even Chicago. This destruction of our most promising trees passes for a proper celebration of a religious anniversary. Let us not discount its beautiful significance, but if we must use trees then raise them for the purpose and stop churchal vandalism upon what is absolutely needed to preserve our evergreen forests.—Progressive Age.

Sound Doctrin.

Neither the civil nor the religious rights of the people can be safe when the state in any way concerns itself with the enforcement of any of the doctrines or observances of the church. Thomas Jefferson, when president, made this very clear in his answer to the New England clergymen who wished him to appoint a day of fasting and prayer. Unfortunately neither Benjamin Harrison nor Grover Cleveland proved himself to be another Thomas Jefferson. In the works of Jefferson, vol. v, pages 236 and 237, we find this unanswerable argument:

"I consider the government of the United States as interdicted by the Constitution from intermeddling with religious institutions, their doctrines, disciplin, or exercises.

"But it is only proposed that I should recommend, not prescribe, a day of fasting and prayer. That is, that I should indirectly assume to the United States an authority over religious exercises which the Constitution has directly precluded them from.

"It must be meant, too, that this recommendation is to carry some authority, and to be sanctioned by some penalty on those who disregard it; not, indeed, of fine and imprisonment, but of some degree of proscription, perhaps in public opinion. And does the change in the nature of the penalty make the recommendation less a law of conduct for those to whom it is directed?"

"I do not believe it is for the interest of religion to invite the civil magistrate to direct its exercises; its disciplin, or its doctrines; nor of the religious societies, that the general government should be invested with the power of effecting any uniformity of time or matter among them.

"Fasting and prayer are religious exercises; the enjoining them, an act of disciplin. Every religious society has a right to determin for itself the times for these exercises, and the objects proper for them, according to their own particular tenets; and this right can never be safer than in their own hands, where the Constitution has deposited it."

Mistaken Women.

We would like to make a statement to the women suffragists of this country. It is this: When you advocate the return of the Bible to the public schools you dishearten many of the men who are among your strongest and most persistent advocates. They are typical Americans under the Constitution and believe that you should vote, but when they see you seeking to violate the spirit and letter of the Constitution, and so easily led into the intolerant use of your influence, they are driven to reflect if it would not be dangerous to give you the ballot. It may not be considered chivalric to speak this truth, but, whether you believe it or not, many thousands are influenced to vote against the emancipation of women for the above reasons. We regret the action, for instance, of the Woman's Educational Society of Chicago. It is one of the most unfortunate incidents, looked at from women suffragists' point of view, which could happen to the cause in this country.—Progressive Age.

The Canadian Censorship.

From the Book and News-Dealer.

The post-office authorities of Canada have decreed that no more copies of The Truth Seeker shall be imported into that country, singly or in quantities. The claim is that the paper is sacrilegious and scurrilous. If The Truth Seeker is clever it can at home, by a judicious setting forth of the exclusion act, increase its circulation far beyond what it may have lost in Kanuckia. They are not ready for Freethought and speech over there yet—that is to say if the postmaster-general is any criterion. He is a Roman Catholic, by the way.

From Rodhuggaren, Fergus Falls, Minn.

The New York Freethought journal, The Truth Seeker, is prohibited in the Canadian mails. The postmaster-general of Canada is a poor, narrow-minded, ignorant Catholic, and he could not even point out the special articles in The Truth Seeker which he resented. With the exception perhaps of its pictures, The Truth Seeker has always been very moderate, and is edited with both tact and ability. It throws the searchlight on the many crooked ways of the church, and in stirring up this humbug it has the advantage of having no special love for any church party; but up there in Canada they cannot bear that anyone should touch superstition's thick layer of corruption, and hence they prohibit The Truth Seeker.

[The foregoing appears also in Nya Normanden, of Minneapolis, Minn.—Ed. T. S.]

The Sunday laws are a statutory embodiment of the dogma of the Brownist sect of the Puritan sect of the Protestant dissenters to the effect that people ought to be idle on Sunday. They force an external deference to this dogma on people who are not Brownists. This is their only meaning, this is their only value to their Brownist advocates. These fanatics recognize in them rightly a union of their church with the state. When the people at large get to understand the matter in the same true light, will they not arise in their wrath and repudiate this inheritance from those pestilent fellows whom the healthy intellectual stomachs of England and Holland spewed out, and whom to our everlasting misfortune a mysterious providence allowed to land on Plymouth Rock instead of commanding Plymouth Rock to land firmly and comprehensively on them?—J. T. Ringgold, in the New York World.

Observations.

I contemplate with ghoulish glee a printed protest addressed to newspaper editors by the Rev. Dr. I. K. Funk, publisher of the Standard Dictionary. The case is this, that in arranging the vocabulary of English words, Dr. Funk's hired men found it necessary to reproduce and define certain so-called coarse and indelicate terms; and a lexicographical competitor, taking advantage of the doctor's dilemma, has collated some of these blush-compelling words and put them in a circular, which he is distributing among teachers and parents to prove that the Rev. Mr. Funk's lexicon should not be admitted to the school or family. The meanness of such warfare is of course simply inexpressible, but the victim is estopped from claiming any redress. He thinks the press ought to be under the censorship of Comstock or some other moral idiot. He conducts his paper, the Voice, on the principle that arousing the prejudice is as legitimate as enlisting the reason against an opponent. He would mutilate a violator of his rule of ethics as cheerfully as he would deprive a burglar of his tools; and he would not accord to any person liberty in what he shall drink, read, or admire in painting, or in choosing when he shall rest or work. Ordinarily, if a publisher is attacked as he now is by a competitor, the indignation of a fair-minded public is excited; but in this instance those who know the Rev. Dr. Funk will not let their blood boil. They will see that the guns now turned upon him were by himself loaded with mud, and that when he receives their contents in the neck he is getting only what he meant for others. It is a case of righteous retribution, poetic justice, hoist with his own petard, and everything else which indicates that the shearer's own wool is in danger; for the complainant has helped to corrupt the public mind so as to make his competitor's appeal to it effective. Let him asexualize his dictionary and resolve to lead a better life.

"To my comrade," is the inscription I discover written over my name in a neat volume of poems entitled "Wind Harp Songs," by J. William Lloyd, which the author has sent me. I accept the word comrade. It is preferable to "brother," as it contains no suggestion of church-membership and has no cant about it. For allied reasons, songs stand higher in my estimation than hymns. While I have to admire some of the poems in this volume without being clear as to their purpose or the significance of their form, those which I am equal to grasping are so excellent that I have no doubt the fault is my own that the others are not read understandingly. Mr. Lloyd is not a poet of thought, but of impression and fancy. I should say that he has more sensibility than perceptivity. Phenomena are more felt than seen. Their light and shadow fall upon him, and he makes random notes. In the same manner I quote:

Banks,
Bees,
Bird music,
Clouds, Distance. . .

Sleep.

You see, the theme is not worked out. Now, Banks are low, or they are high—Grassy or bare, and the bees hum by. Music of birds is sad or gay, Or low and sweet; clouds drift away. While distance ends in widest blue, Sleep draws her curtain o'er the view. And so on; but Mr. Lloyd omits these collateral facts. He gives the outline and lets you fill in the colors. If the picture isn't satisfactory, that is the fault of your imagination or your execution, and you can't blame him. His list of substantives is above criticism.

Passing by these eccentricities, no one can deny to Mr. Lloyd the qualities of a true poet. He has great sympathy, great sensitiveness, and a wonderful delicacy of touch. Those who have been, as he has, "on the plains, in the forest, in the wake of the plow," will in these poems hear again the music that haunts the silence of those places, and which they may have forgotten or thought upon as a lost chord.

Owing to the superiority of its methods, the Catholic church will probably be financially prosperous when other bodies organized for predatory purposes are defunct. A speaker at the late Free-thought Congress informed his hearers that the Sisters of Charity infest the government offices at Washington on pay day, soliciting gifts of money from the clerks as they emerge, and woe to the man who does not come down with the cash. The same thing is permitted here in New York. The untouched sit by the paymaster's window with open satchels, and the employee who neglects to "hit the center" when he draws his salary has but a feeble tenure.

I know a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER employed in one of the city departments. He is an Infidel from the days of D. M. Bennett, but he contributes to the fund of the Catholic church like the rest. When he first entered upon the duties of his present position, and before he had learned the rules of the office, he of course did not know what percentage of earnings a man enjoying his belief would be expected to cover into the papal treasury. On a pay day to which he now recurs with sadness, he was passing out of the office, when the satchel of the church mendicant was presented to receive his offering. In order that a basis for subsequent donations might be established, he drew a dollar or two in loose change from his pocket and pushed it toward the sister in his open palm, suggesting that she should select therefrom a piece of money of the denomination representing the dues of one who regarded her church as a humbug. He supposed that a subsidiary coin would be taken, but he is wiser now. The sister devoutly crossed herself, and then, with the most cheerful alacrity, took it all. It is no use for common hold-ups to compete with that system.

I suppose that few of the people of Kansas know how much they are indebted to the Boston Arena for its successful agitation in favor of raising the age of protection for girls in that state. The following anecdote bearing on the matter is told in Washington city by Representative Mercer, of Nebraska: An old Kansas couple who had a son living in California wrote to him requesting that he should return and take up his abode with them during the remainder of their declining years. The son was dutiful, but he preferred California for ranching, and so, according to Representative Mercer, he replied: "I am surprised at your asking me to return. I own a ranch here and am happy. If anything is lacking it is you. I would dearly love to be with you again, but, as I said before, I am surprised that you should ask me to return to a state where they raised nothing at all last year except the age of consent." It will be gratifying to Mrs. Gardener and Mr. Flower to learn that they have saved the Sunflower state from the reproach of total infertility.

It is foreshadowed that, at the present rate of growth, the churches of the United States will in the year 1900 have a seating capacity of fifty millions; and an aggressive religious editor, who thinks that all the seats will be occupied, desires to know what Infidelity will be able to show to offset these figures. The question surpasses my ability as a mathematician. I do not exactly see how any comparison can be instituted on such a basis. In fact, I am almost ready to deny that the breadth of thought in 1900 can be ascertained by applying the calipers to the part of the person from which the religious editor's measurements are apparently taken.

The Rev. Joseph Parker, of London, has assured his congregation that there will be no war between England and America. "The Christians of both countries," he said, "will keep the peace." That appears to settle the matter; for if the Christians will keep the peace the Infidels will not go beyond inviting Lord Salisbury and President Cleveland to debate the question at issue before the Manhattan Liberal Club, with opportunity for members to participate, in speeches of ten minutes each.

Regarding war talk, the fact to be kept felicitously in the public mind is that it is all talk and no war, and the second concern is to see that the situation remains unchanged in that respect. Remarks by English journals are annoying to patriots, but they should be read in the light of the circumstance that they are uttered three thousand miles away. Canadian journals, to be sure, are nearer, and they are the more obstreperous because they have more at stake. In the event of a war with England, the United States would at once invest Canada, and then what could stop Heston's pictures from going over the border with a rush? Nothing in the world. So the trouble means a good deal to Canada. The springing of this issue on America by England before the Lord Dunraven matter is settled looks like precipitancy. English pride should forbid Lord Salisbury to send any of his ships hither until they are assured a track free from excursion steamers and rowboats. To do otherwise might be construed as a reflection on the course pursued by the noble Dunraven. On our part, we should refuse to engage Mr. Salisbury's castiron yachts without some guarantee that he will go over the course the prescribed number of times and make it interesting for the spectators.

As to the establishment of foreign supremacy on this continent, what have we to lose? Are not our liberties already in the custody of the Connecticut Yankee Comstock, the degenerate Dutchman Roosevelt, and the Johnny Crepaud postmaster-general of Canada? The subjects of British tyranny complain of nothing worse than these.

GEO. E. MACDONALD.

The National Reform Association and its Convention.

You would think that the National Reform Association which professes to represent over forty millions of Christians, would have a large and rousing national convention. My surprise was great to find only a small number present. It was rather a curious phenomenon to me—considering the hullabaloo this "Reform" is making over the country, for this association is certainly the head and front of the reactionary movement in favor of ecclesiastical politics. Before these few fanatics the politicians bow down in absolute terror. On the closing day, Friday, Dec. 13th, at the opening of the morning session, only 29 were present; in the afternoon 21, and in the evening 75, although the great "Sunrise" Morse was advertised to speak. I certainly expected a crowded house. What is the reason of this "beggary account of empty boxes?"

In numbers, in interest, in power our Freethought national conventions are far superior to these annual gatherings of the enemy. At no session did we have so small a number as the "Reformers," and our closing session was nearly ten times as great in attendance. We represent the new; they represent the vanishing past. We are sometimes discouraged at the slimness of our audiences. Let us no longer be discomfited. Our pioneer ranks beat the Christian outposts ten to one. It is vitality upon our side and hypocrisy upon theirs.

It is evident that there is no living interest among the millions of Christian people in this "national reform," for if there were such an interest thousands upon thousands would throng these meetings. I do not think there is one Christian in a hundred who actually desires God in the Constitution—that is, counting the nominal Christians, who amount to about twenty-one millions. We must remember, however, that this meager "reform" convention represents the logic—the theology of the Christian churches. The strength of the "reform" movement is not in its numbers, but in the vast mass of superstition that lies behind it, ready at any moment to be brought into play. If we merely considered the numbers personally interested in this "God party" it would only be a laughing matter; but it is more than it appears. It is a jutting rock, based on immense strata of past belief, now lost amidst the brilliance of the nineteenth century, but liable at any moment to be flung to the surface with wreck and disaster. The meager attendance of this convention betokens the terrific hypocrisy that pervades the age, and which is more cruel and destructive than fanaticism itself. These few fanatics do compel three-fourths of Congress to bow the knee to its demands, simply because hypocrites are the greatest of cowards. The triumph of the "National Reform" party is not the triumph of the honest desire, even of Christians themselves; but it is the triumph of hypocrisy, of cowardice, of sycophancy, of fools and knaves and cringing politicians. I would much rather have back of this "reform" movement the honest desire of a sincere Christian people than that which is now its support—a mass of shallow, office-seeking, false-hearted charlatans. I do not say that the members of this convention, mostly clergymen, are not really honest men; but if these men have a particle of insight they must know that the only possible way they can succeed is not by the support of honest Christians or of honest politicians, but only by the cowardly adherence of the worst elements of our political parties. Thus if this "reform" party does win, it will win through the rottenness of the republic, and not through that which is best and noblest even in the churches themselves.

These few fanatics have already introduced the "God-amendment" into both houses of Congress. They may bulldoze Congress into offering this amendment to the people of this country. What then? The greatest religious conflict will arise, Those Christians who to-day do not really want the amendment will be forced to support it as a matter of conscience, and the church of Rome, which will derive such an immense advantage from the amendment, will vote for it almost to a man. The "lean knee" of the "Reform" party, apparently contemptible in numbers, may be able by the logic of circumstances to swallow up the prosperity of the land.

The chief spirit of the "Reform" party is its field secretary, Rev. Dr. H. H. George. He understands his business and makes a business of it. He is in good fighting trim; is over six feet high, with broad shoulders, plenty of muscular force, and a go-ahead look. There is nothing uncertain in his tactics. He marches straight for his goal. He is much clearer headed than Wilbur Crafts and his school. Crafts says that the Constitution is implicitly Christian and the state also by supreme court decisions, etc. George says that the Constitution is not Christian, that the state is not Christian, that Supreme Court decisions do not make it Christian, and that the only way to make it Christian is by an amendment to the fundamental law of the land. Secretary George is clearly right from our standpoint. We are not a Christian state and nothing can make us a Christian state except an amendment to the Constitution; and there is just where the fight is on. The Christians have not won any permanent victory until they have amended the Constitution. Then they are in the saddle and we cannot unseat them. A Supreme Court decision or legislative act is only a temporary victory, which can be swept away at any time by new decisions and new acts; but a constitutional amendment is permanent, and it actually can make this a Christian state. It is the impression of some that a Supreme Court decision or an act of Congress, or of the President, can make this a Christian state. But this is impossible. Nothing can make this a Christian state except the Constitution. Ten thousand decisions of the Supreme Court, or ten thousand acts of Congress or President, can't make this a Christian state. They can cause laws to be made and administered as if this were a Christian state; but they cannot change a matter of fact. The Supreme Court, or Congress, or President, may decide that an innocent person is guilty; but that does not make him guilty. The Constitution is a secular constitution; and nothing can make it a Christian constitution save the Constitution itself. God himself can't get into the Constitution except the American people put him there by constitutional amendment. The Constitution, as Mr. George says, is the battle-ground, and we accept the issue. Keep God out of the Constitution, make it secular, and some day supreme courts and congresses and presidents will conform to its requirements; while they cannot make it other than it is; but put God into the Constitution, and the republic is absolutely destroyed. The heart is taken out of it. It is dead. What folly for one moment to allow this "reform" party any advantage. It is a life-and-death struggle for the liberty of the human race.

Along with the theological bearing of this "reform" movement, we must look at its political significance. Its purpose is not only to put God into the Constitution, but to centralize political power at Washington, and thus eventually to overthrow the sovereignty of the states, so that we not only cease to be a secular government, but we become an enormous centralized government, with no home or local rule. The church theocracy is opposed to state rights. It purposes to exercise its authority through one great central government, until finally there will be no political power outside of Washington. The direct tendency of this "reform" party is not only to church monopoly, but to political monopoly of all kinds, so that the state legislatures and courts will be practically abolished. Not only do these "reformers" desire a "God-amendment," but also a marriage and divorce amendment, so that all marriage and divorce laws will be enacted by Congress; and also a prohibition amendment, so that the liquor traffic shall be absolutely under control of Congress. Thus gradually the states will be stripped of all law-making power whatsoever. This party is also in favor of strict immigration laws; and, so far as I can judge, is in favor of admitting only rich Christians. However, the immigration resolution was dropped, for they could not exactly agree as to its wording; and some were in favor of admitting the poor man, provided he could pass muster on the "moral test." Rev. Mr. George wanted particularly to keep out the "vicious scum." By this he meant the Anarchist, Socialist, etc.

Another important resolution before the convention was concerning secret societies. The convention was hardly brave enough to meet the question openly and above board. Some wanted to know what the resolution really meant. It was so worded that only those who were of the inner circle knew its drift. I wish I could get hold of the resolution and publish it—but I guess it is hidden away, for it did not pass. One member said the resolution was an "insinuation," and he didn't want any "insinuations" but a frank statement. Another member declared that the wisest policy was not to make explicit statements, but implicit statements; that is, don't say exactly what you mean—play the fox.

Of course I knew at once what the resolution meant. It was a covert attack upon the Masons, Odd Fellows, and all secret societies. The "Reform" party takes the position of the church of Rome, that secret societies are anti-Christian. Of course if this becomes a Christian government then all these secret societies will be abolished. They will be unconstitutional, or made so. I hope the Masons and Odd Fellows will take note of this—that if the Christian amendment is passed they will be outlawed. In this same resolution was also a protest against all acts of worship in which the name of Christ was not supremely honored. This would exclude all Jewish and Mohammedan worship, and all pagan worship; and also the religious ceremonies of the Masons and Odd Fellows, which are not Christian, but Theistic, and mainly based upon the Old Testament. One member suggested "all public worship;" but the original resolution embraced all acts of worship public and private. These must conform to the Christian religion or be forbidden. The resolution was finally passed by. The convention got into a muddle over it. It didn't know how much to say and how much not to say; when to be explicit, and when to be implicit; when to be the lion, and when to be the fox. I am afraid the Christian Statesman will not print this resolution or the discussion connected with it. I wish it was on record, however, for it shows that the "National Reform Association" would outlaw all secret societies, and forbid all acts of worship public and private that are not distinctively Christian.

It will be seen that the "God-amendment" is an opener to all sorts of tyranny. It is the basis by which all human society will be placed under the control of the church. Such an enormous despotism as is here contemplated was never yet established. I see the name of Anthony Comstock is attached to the call, so among other things the "God-amendment" carries Comstock. The force of political degeneration can no farther go. Little as this convention is, a congregation mainly of white neckties, it is still the focus by which the worst elements of the nation will endeavor to control its government. No matter how honest these men may be, they must deal with fraud, corruption, hypocrisy, cowardice, dishonesty, stupidity, rascality, and all sorts of meanness, in order to succeed. We must meet them and thoroughly expose their plans. It is a battle-field around the pillars of constitutional liberty. It is foolish to say that there is no danger. Superstition is still deep-seated and it is as cruel as ever.

I have attended this convention in order to find out and exhibit this skeleton just as it is—to show its weakness and its strength. It is a skeleton, but it can touch springs of human destiny and be exceedingly dangerous. We must take care that this skeleton—this obtrusion of the dark ages—does not get its grip upon the Constitution.

The Tyndall Prayer Test.

When the subject of the efficacy of prayer is under discussion—as at present on account of the action of the Christian Endeavorers in praying for the conversion of Colonel Ingersoll—reference is at once made to the celebrated "prayer test" proposed by Professor John Tyndall to the Church of England and the dissenting sects. How many know the terms of that test? Probably very few, for we have not seen it in the public prints during the past twenty years. Following is Professor Tyndall's introductory letter to the Contemporary Review, and also portions of the letter (said to have been written by Sir Henry Thompson) proposing a method for putting prayer to the test:

The following suggestive letter has been placed in my hands, with a view to publication. It is sure, I think, to interest the thoughtful readers of the Contemporary Review. It deals, indeed, with a subject which interests everybody, and regarding which all manner of men, from the Prime Minister downward, have given the public the benefit of their views.

If such be attainable, it is surely desirable to have clearer notions than we now possess of the action of "Providence" in physical affairs. Two opposing parties here confront each other—the one affirming the habitual intrusion of supernatural power, in answer to the petitions of men; the other questioning, if not denying, any such intrusion. The writer of the letter wishes to bring these opposing affirmations to an experimental test. He considers the subject to be accessible to experiment, and makes a proposal which, if faithfully carried out, would, he thinks, displace assertion by demonstration as regards the momentous point in question.

His proposal is so fair, and his mode of stating it so able and conciliatory, that I could not, when asked to do so, refuse to give it the support implied by these few lines of introduction.

June, 1872.

JOHN TYNDALL.

DEAR PROFESSOR TYNDALL: Since our conversation the other night, when you were good enough to listen to a suggestion I made relative to a means of determining the value of prayer to the Deity, it occurred to me to put the idea into writing, and to ask you to do me the further kindness of looking at it in this shape.

It seems to me impossible at the present day to find ourselves in contact with a source of power available for human ends, or affirmed to be so on high authority, without recognizing a necessity—or even that it is a duty—to estimate its value. And especially, if the power be one which is effective for the production of physical results, is it desirable to examine its nature, and to measure its extent, and the condition under which it works.

The value of prayer to the Deity has been recognized in all ages and by all nations, not merely by the ignorant and superstitious, but by the more cultivated portions of the human race. And I think it may be said that, among the great body of religious people of all denominations in this country, a belief in its efficacy is almost universally professed.

After much thought and examination of the various questions and objections which may possibly be urged, I do not hesitate to propose an investigation pursued on a system somewhat analogous to that which is pursued by the Faculty when a question arises as to the value of any particular mode of treating disease, in order to estimate and rightly appreciate the influence of special prayer to check disease or to avert death.

I do not propose to ask that one single child of man should be deprived of his participation in all that belongs to him of the influence of "general prayer" by the whole Christian church for "all men." But I ask that one single ward or hospital, under the care of first-rate physicians and surgeons, containing certain numbers of patients afflicted with those diseases which have been best studied, and of which the mortality rates are best known, whether the diseases are those which are treated by medical or by surgical remedies, should be during a period of not less, say, than three or five years, made the object of special prayer by the whole body of the faithful, and that at the end of that time, the mortality rates should be compared with the past rates, and also with that of other leading hospitals, similarly well managed, during the same period. Granting that time is given, and numbers are sufficiently large, so as to insure a minimum of error from accidental disturbing causes, the experiment will be exhaustive and complete.

I might have proposed to treat two sides of the same hospital, managed by the same men; one side to be the object of special prayer, the other to be exempted from all prayer. It would have been the most rigidly logical and philosophical method. But I shrink from depriving any of—I had almost said—his natural inheritance in the prayers of Christendom. Practically, too, it would have been impossible; the unprayed-for ward would have attracted the prayers of believers as surely as the lofty tower attracts electric fluid. The experiment would be frustrated. But the opposite character of my proposal will commend it to those who are naturally the most interested in its success; those, namely, who conscientiously and devoutly believe in the efficacy against disease and death of special prayer. I open a field for the exercise of their devotion. I offer an occasion of demonstrating to the faithless an imperishable record of the real power of prayer.

It is on record that the foregoing test was not accepted by the church. Instead, Professor Tyndall was made the subject of general attack, the temper of which may be inferred from his remarks closing the debate. He said: "I ask no space to reply to those railers who make such free use of the terms 'insolence,' 'outrage,' 'profanity,' and 'blasphemy.' They obviously lack the sobriety of mind necessary to give accuracy to their statements or to render their charges worthy of serious refutation."

NOBLESVILLE, IND., Dec. 9, A.M., 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $3, for which please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, and the "Pictorial Text-Book." You have a book I want badly, but it appears I can never have enough money to spare at one time to get it—"The History of the Inquisition." I hope to see the day when it will be in my possession.

The Pictures Suit Him.

BLUE EARTH CITY, MINN., Nov. 30, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: About December 25th I will be in Cass county amongst the wicked ones, as my neighbors are mostly Free-thinkers; so you see, Mr. Editor, I will be at home.

Mr. Heston's cartoon, "God Bless Our Home," is a good one. It did good missionary work. I wish him a long, happy life. The pictures alone are worth the price of THE TRUTH SEEKER. So I say we are getting our money's worth.

Yours for liberty, E. S. GLICK.

The Boys Amuse Themselves.

MESA GRANDE, CAL., Nov. 29, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3, for which please continue my subscription.

There are besides myself about a half dozen Freethinkers in this neighborhood, and inclosed you will find a list of their names. There are no churches here, but there is a Sunday-school which I attend occasionally to listen to what is taught the little ones. Once in awhile two or three of us meet and have arguments with the good Christians, and we generally get away with them, being better informed as to the difference between Bible nonsense and common sense.

For a Holiday Gift.

LOUISVILLE, KY., Dec. 6, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $3, for the "Ingersoll-Field Debate" and "Prose Poems," to be sent to inclosed address. Franklin Steiner lectured here on the 25th and 26th of November. When he left he said he had been well received, well paid, and well pleased, and expressed a wish to be called again. And we shall call him, for he talks well, draws well, and takes well. He is one of the brainiest men in our ranks. The people are generally glad to get THE TRUTH SEEKER, especially when I furnish it free of cost to them. They ask for it, and send to my home for it.

Truly, WILLIAM T. CARTER, M.D.

Learning from the Pictures.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., Dec. 3, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3, to be applied on my subscription to the dear old TRUTH SEEKER. I must say I think it the grandest paper published on the face of the earth. I wish you could hear my little seven-year-old girl question me in regard to the pictures as they appear weekly. They are too deep for her to comprehend at this time, but I trust if she is spared for me to raise her to womanhood, she will be able to understand them and teach the truths to others. She takes a great interest in them, and is very careful that none of them gets torn. I have some three or four hundred of them, and you ought to see her get them on the floor and look at them, and hear the many remarks she makes about them. In a nutshell I will say, I don't believe she will believe that Jonah was swallowed by a whale.

But Will They Grant Liberty?

BOISTFORD, WASH., Dec. 4, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5. Send me by mail "Foundations of Faith," and one dozen "Bible Contradictions;" the balance will change the countenance of the tab on my paper.

God's mouthpieces in this part of the country have quit preaching "red-hot" hell-fire sermons, and are preaching moral sense, or Freethought, rather. They lecture on anatomy, astronomy, and the wonderful works of nature. Of course they say that their God did it all, but give us no tangible evidence to prove this a fact. And then they preach kindness and mercy, peace and harmony, love and unity, and that it is an injustice to persecute each other for a difference of opinion; that every person is honest in his convictions, and has a right to his opinion. Now, if this is not Freethought, then I do not know what Freethought is.

The country is getting alive with Epworth Leagues and A. P. A's, and I am going to distribute all the telling Freethought literature that I possibly can.

Yours for liberty, G. A. BOYD.

A Good Example.

WILKESBURG, PA., Dec. 9, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $5 to renew my subscription. I have endeavored to get you a new subscriber, but failing, I try to make up the deficiency by renewing for two years. I venture to hope that all whose subscription has expired will do likewise, as by so doing they would put you in a better position to fight the theocrats. Money is the life-blood of business. I am certain that all who are in your debt can square themselves before the first of the year if they will. I am certain that none who are getting THE TRUTH SEEKER have reason to complain, for they are getting their money's worth and more, and I hope that all will tumble to that fact.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is just right for me. I admire your courage and your self-control in answering the theocrats. You do it so easily and so forcibly that you are bound to win the sympathy of the people.

G. E. GAUDELO.

Backed Down After Challenging.

PETERSBURG, IND., Dec. 9, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Truly the Freethinkers should organize. The machinery for systematic work is effectively established, and all we have to do is to work it.

The Rev. Gould, evangelist, of the C. P. church here, agreed in his pulpit talk to "pay half the hall rent and meet the best Infidel that could be trotted out," one night or one week. I accepted in the name of Franklin Steiner by letter. The preacher, on learning who Steiner was, backed down and did not mail his recognition of the notice. I published an account of the event in a local paper.

I grind rye and corn meal, and own feed-grinding and planing-mill machinery. So Mr. Gould retaliates by saying: "Infidels are dyspeptics; they eat rye." I got a challenge from one the other day." I respond by letter, which is a waste of time and paper, that poor Jesus ate his rye raw and stole it into the bargain. And this Gould pretends to eat this Jesus to this day. Mr. Gould will disgust as many of his membership as he brings new sheep into the fold.

F. S. WEAVER.

Objections to the Pictorial Method.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 6, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I feel like shaking hands with Dr. C. C. Van Waters and saying "Them's my sentiments tew." I have long wished to express myself similarly to Dr. Van Waters, but felt that perhaps the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER knew a little more about conducting a paper than I did, but now that some one has "spoken out in meetin'" I shall follow suit. I believe, with the doctor, that these cartoons are doing more harm than good. To the Liberal, of course, they may be received with more or less approbation, but I never feel like presenting your otherwise most excellent paper to any of my Christian friends for fear of shocking and repelling them. We all have friends who have not yet "escaped the narrow cells of a creed," but who are nevertheless good neighbors, whose good will and friendship we care to retain, and whom therefore we do not wish to offend. Moreover, for my part, I should so often like to show them a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER containing in every issue such excellent articles, but am always deterred in doing so on account of those cartoons, particularly those on the last page. I can see nothing "funny," and certainly nothing elevating in them, and I am sure that they would give such offense to my Christian friends as would probably forever after prevent their reading any Freethought literature. For this reason I have never in the two years I have been a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER handed it to any of my Christian acquaintances. On the other hand, whenever I meet with a Liberal article in any of our current magazines I invariably do some missionary work with it.

I should be glad to work for a larger circulation for THE TRUTH SEEKER, not for pecuniary gain, but for the best means of disseminating Freethought literature, were it not for these objectionable cartoons. I cannot do without THE TRUTH SEEKER. I therefore inclose check for four dollars for another year's subscription and books. J. J. SHIRLEY, M.D.

[Subscribers desiring to use THE TRUTH SEEKER for missionary purposes, and apprehensive of the effect of the cartoons on the unconverted, will find that, owing to the way the paper is folded, the outer leaves containing the pictures may be readily removed, and the publication thus rendered innocuous. Many readers, after questioning the utility of Mr. Heston's work, have on a subsequent occasion been so pleased by some particularly apt illustration that their objection has been withdrawn, and they have become enthusiastic partisans of our artist.—ED. T. S.]

Thoughts on Several Subjects.

WELLAND, DEC. 9, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $2 to assist you a little in propagating the religion of humanity. I have been almost a helpless invalid for many years; have been a reader of your paper, I think, fifteen years. It comes to my brother's address. We have always lived together since he was born, which was 44 years ago. I am 53. He has seen you at Freethought conventions and at your office. There is very little enterprise in the direction of Freethought in this vicinity. There are several about here who talk favorably of Freethought. One of them told me a few years ago that there was no use talking, "we have got to be popular," and you know what effect that class of people have toward reforming the world. It is our duty to vindicate those who have been a great help to the cause.

John Ray died at Welland nearly two years ago. He was an active worker in the cause. I believe he did more than all the rest around here put together. He was very much like D. M. Bennett; he was a very deep reasoner on any subject; did all that he could for our cause while he was able and seemed to have full possession of his mental faculties to the last. He died of old age, at 88 years. My brother saw him about two weeks before his death and talked for hours with him; he visited him again about two days before his death and found him as rational as ever, but scarcely able to speak. Through all his declining years he understood his condition thoroughly; he often spoke of his end being near, and planned for his funeral, at which no sermon was to be preached. His wishes were carried out. He died peacefully, not the slightest fears of the future.

One thing I must not forget to mention; that never were more truthful words spoken than those Elmina uttered about that unfortunate Negro who was tortured to death. I have often thought and reasoned on that subject—How to treat criminals and insane people. We should recognize that they all do just what nature forced them to do. Nature is very cruel; it forces upon us a great many inconveniences. Just look for one moment at the sufferings that man and beast have to endure; look at the expense we are under to protect ourselves from crime, and yet we are always in danger, and are not protected. We poor mortals have very little power to make things any different. The Lord is said to be all-powerful and hence he could make a world without sin and pain, but he did not do it. There are many of us who if we had the power would have made the world without sin or pain.

As time never began and never will cease its onward march—or, in other words, it will never end—does that place us exactly in the center of time? Will there be as much time in the future as there has been in the past? If we divide time at the first of January, 1896, will there be as much time after this date as before it? Those who answer this, if any do answer it, must give reasons fully for such answers. I will propose another question: As space is endless in every direction, does that make us exactly in the center of space, or is there any center to space? I would like to see some replies to these propositions.

JULIUS A. CHANTLER.

From Sunny Land.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., Dec. 7, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: This is a land of warmth and sunshine, green trees and flowers at a time when the North is enveloped in sheets of snow. When the swallow homeward flies, then the tourist hither hies. Jacksonville is Florida's chief center of population, and has many attractions in the way of outdoor sports, hunting and fishing, river and rail excursions, etc.

The house of the late General Spinner—he of inimitable signature note, "the old watchdog of the Treasury"—stands on the bank of the broad St. John's river, one hundred yards below my hotel. His fancy boat-house also stands over the water some thirty feet from the shore. An old negro blacksmith, who has worked many years in a shop near, told me some amusing anecdotes of the bluff old general; said that he entertained many of his friends from the North and elsewhere; that he paid the negroes liberally for work he often hired them to do, and made the air blue with oaths if anyone interfered with his plans. The bare flag pole on the boat-house suggests that perhaps the flag was laid away with the remains of him who had lived so long under it. His son-in-law and grandson now occupy the house.

Jacksonville has just four dozen churches where the Christian plan of salvation is preached to credulous hearers by men who know as little of the future as their dupes. Just now some men, instigated by the churches, are prosecuting some others for selling liquors on Sunday. It is encouraging to hear some good Freethought utterances by the able attorney for the defense, Colonel Pope. In his speech, yesterday, he styled the crusade against Sunday liquor selling "a craze of the ministers"; that it is a retrograde movement and will throw Jacksonville backward "just as Parkhurst's actions have thrown New York backward"; that "the prosecution seeks to inject public sentiment into the law, and this should not be allowed"; that "the idea of bringing the sanctity of the Sunday into the judiciary under the pretense that it is holier than any other day is abhorrent"; that "just to the extent that the religious craze goes, just so far will these gentlemen go to perpetuate this absurdity." The attorney for the prosecution made his closing speech to-day, and the judge took the case into consideration, to render a decision next Thursday. May Liberty pervade his thoughts and prompt him to utter her principles.

Again, last Sunday I walked into a Trinity Methodist Episcopal church by accident, and had a bitter dose of a sermon to swallow. In addition to the usual slush and gush the minister, Rev. L. S. Rader, made a fling at the Freethinkers. He said that he saw down town a black, stuffed monkey that appeared to be turning a peanut parrot, but when he looked closer he saw that the parrot was turning the monkey. He said that the Freethinker was like the monkey; that he claimed to be moving the world onward whilst his only motion was the result of catching on to Christianity's advancement. Don't you know that it made my blood boil? I could not reply, but wanted to tell him that the stuffed monkey reminded me of Christianity's devil; that for centuries Christians thought the devil was alive and working a trap to catch them, and they were in constant hubbub and conflict trying to avoid him, but that of late years Freethinkers had proved that the devil was only a myth, or no more than the stuffed monkey that acted merely through the violence of their movements; that many of the preachers now look on the devil as "nothing more than a huge joke," as the notorious Dr. Holland said, but they continue to use him to frighten their flocks into dropping the shekels.

If you will send me two copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER containing this I will send one to Brother Rader as a specimen copy and ask him to subscribe.

Yours truly, S. S. BRYAN.

How to Canvass.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 12, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: A genuine live Freethinker is one who does something to promote Freethought. For he thinks to very little purpose who never acts in accordance therewith. Only by helping to enlighten others can we pay the debt we owe the cause for our own fortunate enlightenment. And those unable to either deliver lectures, edit journals, write books, magazine or newspaper articles, or contribute money, can, nevertheless, greatly aid the cause by getting subscribers for Freethought publications, thus sustaining and increasing their circulation and their power to do good.

The approaching season of inclement weather, suspending outdoor work and giving all more leisure for reading, furnishes a favorable opportunity for getting subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Your three months' trial subscription for fifty cents makes it much easier than formerly to get subscribers.

To those working Freethinkers who feel like doing their share for the grand cause by soliciting subscribers, let us say: You need not feel backward about approaching either stranger or friend to ask for his subscription, for remember you are not asking him for a favor, but are really asking him to let you do him a favor—especially if you propose (as I almost invariably do) yourself to bear the trouble and expense of safely remitting his money to the publisher.

Reform club rooms, or other meeting places, where many progressive thinkers congregate, often afford an opportunity to accomplish most with the least effort. It is often essential, however, that you get each prospective customer aside and speak to him privately, or, at least, only in the presence of other Freethinkers, as many will subscribe privately who would not publicly.

First, present to him those points of the paper likely to favorably impress him, being particularly careful not to arouse his antagonism and thus provoke an endless debate. Leave to the paper the duty of fully converting him, and aim only to get him to subscribe for it.

If he is in any measure a reformer, tell him that THE TRUTH SEEKER advocates a fundamental reform without which all other reforms are barren and cannot long endure. For "there can be but little liberty on earth while men worship a tyrant in heaven." Implore him not to exhibit toward Freethought that same indifference or prejudice which he condemns others for showing toward his favorite reform.

If he says he gets "too many papers already," tell him it is not how much, but what we read, that enlightens—that you can vouch for the superior quality of THE TRUTH SEEKER—that mental, like physical, health depends respectively upon variety of food, and until he gives THE TRUTH SEEKER a fair trial he doubtless supplants it by inferior papers, and is blissfully ignorant of the grand treat he thereby misses.

First urge him to subscribe for a whole year, so that, failing in this, you may induce him to compromise on a three months' trial subscription. After getting it three months, he will probably become a permanent subscriber eventually.

But if he won't take the paper, by all means induce him to get Paine's "Age of Reason," which, by getting the eight for a dollar, you can furnish him at fifteen cents per copy. If he will neither invest $3 nor fifty cents, he can't well refuse to invest fifteen cents, and reading it will eventually make him desire THE TRUTH SEEKER any way, so your effort will thus not be entirely fruitless.

"Actions speak louder than words."

Yours for action as well as talk,

D. WEBSTER GAOH.

An Infidel in the Congregation.

PLEASANT VIEW, KY., Nov. 25, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: In this part of the sunny South there are not many Freethought men. Occasionally you find one in your travels, but he is generally afraid of his convictions, and will not say anything unless he is sure where he is at.

I suppose I am the first political candidate that ever ran in the state and wore a Freethought badge at the same time (the Otto Wettstein badge). In the recent election I was a candidate for the legislature on the People's party ticket. I was nominated by a petition of about four hundred citizens. But, of course, I was defeated in advance, because this is strictly a republican district. The opposition did not say much about my Freethought principles, though I expected them to do so in circular form. I suppose they would if they had been much afraid of my election.

Recently I have been attending some religious revival meetings more for curiosity and pastime than for anything else. When I go into the church everybody looks at me as though I was a visitor from an unknown world. One night recently one of the ministers noticed me in the congregation and when he was called upon to pray he remembered me as the man who assailed God's holy word, and wanted Him to cause my tongue to cleave to the roof of my mouth when I did so. He did not speak my name, but everybody knew whom he meant. A church member said to me afterward that he did not believe in such personal prayers, but I told him I did not care how much they prayed for me; they could neither hurt me nor do me any good. A few days ago I met a bevy of young lady converts and they wanted to know why I was not a Christian. I told them it was because Christianity was contrary to my reason. Of course they undertook to argue the case. I asked them if they believed in prayer and the answer of prayer. Of course they did. "Then," said I, "I will make this agreement with you: You pray to your God that he may send his spirit of prayer into my heart, and if he does it I'll pray." They did not want to do that unless I would agree to pray first, to which I would not consent. The minister came in and my proposition was stated to him. He said it was a fair one, and that they ought to pray for me. So I attended church a little more than I otherwise would to hear how my case was going. One night I went to the Methodist prayer meeting, where it is the custom to ask members to give their experience before kneeling in prayer. Many of the members did this and the meeting grew very enthusiastic. Just before it was dismissed the class leader said, "Will Mr. Herron say something?" Of course I was not looking for such a question, and it rather called me down, but I gathered my wits in a moment and rose to my feet, because I thought the opportunity too good to lose. I can not recollect everything I said, but this is about the substance of it: "My Christian Friends: You have asked me if I would like to say something. I have often thought I would like to speak to you, but of course I feel a little timid about doing so for fear of offending some one. Recently I was asked to become a Christian. I will tell you that I cannot because I cannot believe the Bible as a book of God. I cannot believe Jesus Christ was the Son of God. Now, I know you pity me for my unbelief, but I cannot help it. I can do just as you do; believe just as much as my reason compels me. Your reason, you think, compels you to believe the Bible, while mine compels me to disbelieve it. My reason may be in error, but I think not; if it is, I am sorry for it, and as soon as I find that it is I will make my humble confession, but I cannot now. You asked me to pray. I cannot do that because you tell me your God is good and wise. Is he not? [Here one old brother nodded assent.] Well, if that is true, will he not do what he knows to be right without asking? [Here the same brother shook his head for No.] If he will not, why not? [There was no explanation.] I am aware that it is a bad thing to be in error concerning any serious matter, and if anyone of you will show me where I am in error, I will humbly confess it, or if any minister will do so, I will acknowledge my error."

Then the class leader started a song, after which he asked the members to kneel in prayer for Brother Herron. Well, you ought to have heard the multitude praying for the heretic. I intend to make it a little more interesting if they ever call on me again, although I shall try not to offend them.

I think Freethinkers might do some good by attending churches in certain places and reasoning with the Christians.

Respectfully, S. P. HERRON.

Final Remarks.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., Dec. 5, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: As long as mortal man appears and disappears on this ball of dirt and water, he will continue to discuss the question of immortality, whether discussion settles it or not. But not wishing to overdo the thing, I will now conclude my remarks on the subject, and return thanks for the space given to express them in your columns.

It has been correctly stated that science knows nothing of life save through its manifestations, and the manifestations seen under the name of Spiritualism are most surely all there is to give evidence of a life not dependent on a physical body. I hold that these manifestations are not sufficient to do it, and have stated that some of them which were once attributed to spirits are now explained and accounted for without. Telepathy, or thought transference, was long claimed by Spiritualism as indisputable evidence of the existence of spirits, but if Mr. Swan will turn to page 889 of "The Dynamic Theory" (for sale by the Truth Seeker Company, if he has no copy), he will find the scientific explanation of it, and the sixth sense which he believes in will be partially explained. If he will read the history and development of hypnotism by Bjornstrom, he will learn more about that "sixth sense" in connection with clairvoyance, and will see how easy it is for a hypnotist to make his subject see spooks or mental images. If he will read the statement of a noted seer which is here inserted, he will see what proportion of visions he saw were real: "My experience as a seer gives me authority to say that only about ten per cent of the spirits and scenes claimed to be seen by media and seers are real; and that ninety per cent are pure phantasms, or images projected upon the mental retinas of the sensitive." Had he said one hundred per cent it would have been nearer right. He further said: "The thoughts have shape; the objects seen are phantasms. Thus an animal, dog, or bird, is loved by man or woman; still they die; but when dead the ideas of them still exist in their respective owners' minds. Now with those images in your mind, you ask a seer, 'Do you see my pet in heaven?' The answer is 'Yes,' and no wonder, for you have just that moment sent the image there." People go to sensitives and get names of the dead and descriptions, which can be accounted for by thought transference and the somnambulistic condition of the sensitive's mind; drop their two dollars and come away thinking they have been in the presence of spirits. And now, Mr. Swan, I will tell you why none of them got onto that eighty-foot tapeworm fourteen years old. The man thus favored by God was not aware of its presence, so could not and did not send forth its mental image. See? The method of communicating with spirits, as outlined above, is going on all over the world and part of Canada, and people who want another life, and want it bad, go to a seance, get the name of some dead friend, with or without a description, and credulity does the rest. They have become Spiritualists, and know that we shall live forever and a while afterwards. If they get to doubting, another seance braces them up and they "know" it again.

When you have passed through as much Spiritualistic experience as I have, Mr. Swan, and dropped as many good dollars in pursuit of ghosts, you may, as I did, without "reading books edited by others," find yourself anchored to solid Materialism.

Speaking about physical manifestations, let me introduce the testimony of a very prominent man who advocated Spiritualism while living and died in the faith. Said he: "Jugglery has been so systematized these days that not more than one so-called physical manifestation in fifty is to be relied on for what it purports to be." Are you sure you have always been fortunate enough to avoid the forty-and-nine?

Now let us take a retrospective view of Spiritualism. What is known as the modern article has been before the world for nearly fifty years. Tell us, if you can, what it has done except to destroy old creeds and stimulate the hope of immortality. It has revealed nothing that adds to the stock of human knowledge, and the good it might have done, if true, is noticeable by its absence. Spirits might have explained the disappearance of Charlie Ross, and saved his parents years of mental agony; but they didn't. Spirits might have prevented a second murder, had they revealed a murderer's name in Vermont, when a noted medium visited the scene for that purpose; but they didn't; and the man who did the crime repeated it a few months later and was then caught without spirit aid. No end of crime and murders might be prevented by spirits if there are any, but such things are too trivial to notice; and so with the awful fate of many who have been, and still are, buried alive while in a state of suspended animation. "Spirits" never come back to tell of such things or to issue a warning; and nothing was ever known of such awful events not discovered by mortals. According to Spiritualism, the room at the time of a funeral is always full of spirits, and yet they never in any known case made an effort to prevent a premature burial, which would be an easy matter, with no end of mediums to use for that purpose in all parts of the country.

But this one fact stands out with marked prominence: Never did any medium under so-called spirit-control reveal any fact not known at some time by somebody in the mortal form. Spirits with all their supposed opportunities have no knowledge that we do not possess; and if science desires any knowledge regarding the interior of Africa or the North Pole, it never did, and never will, attain such without sending a living human being after it. Spirits have imparted the valuable information that Theodore Parker's spirit-home is sixty-five billions of miles away; that endless progression awaits us, whatever that is; that the planet Mars is inhabited, etc.; but they could never discover the source of the Nile or tell us anything about the interior of the Chinese empire when it was walled up to the outside world. They know nothing about the globe on which we live that mortal man has not learned by search and discovery, and, though behind the scenes, have no more knowledge regarding the origin of human life and the unwritten history of the human race than we have. We get nothing from spirits that rises above the fountain head of knowledge right here on terra firma, never did and never will, and all they tell us of and about another life is as indefinite, unsatisfactory and worthless as the Book of Revelation. Twaddle and expressions of undying love for those who fought like cats and dogs when on earth, are the essence of spirit communications, and the average seance is sufficient to disgust anyone not stupefied by grief and sorrow. But space is limited, so I will close by asking Mr. Swan if evolution is not taught by science, where it is taught; in the Sabbath schools? I wish also to know what he means by "dead matter which produces nothing." Has he discovered a new kind, and some form of force not inseparably connected with matter? If so, he should reveal his discoveries in the interest of science. Such talk shows what a thorough student of Materialism he must have been, and how badly he needs for general information to read the "Dynamic Theory."

As a last word I invite reflection on this indisputable fact: "No human being is born into this world with any sign or evidence of a mind or memory. All are born with a brain fitted to a nervous system for receiving impressions; and the impressions received by the brain are all that makes that wonderful intellect which is expected to live forever under the name of soul. 'A man,' said Francis Bacon, 'is what he has experienced;' and the sum total of individual experience is regulated by environments and decided by the power and capacity of the brain to receive and assimilate. The mind depends on the brain for its origin, and is never superior to its material source, and the destruction of the one is probably the end of the other."

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Which One Was Kept.

There were two little kittens, a black and a gray
And grandma said with a frown:
"It never will do to keep them both,
The black one we'd better drown."

"Don't cry," my dear, to tiny Bess,
"One kitten's enough to keep,
Now run for nurse, for 'tis growing late
And time you were fast asleep."

The morrow dawned, and rosy and sweet
Came little Bess from her nap.
The nurse said, "Go into mamma's room
And look in grandma's lap."

"Come here," said grandmamma with a smile
From the rocking chair where she sat;
"God has sent you two little sisters;
Now what do you think of that?"

Bess looked at the babies a moment,
With their wee heads, yellow and brown,
And then to grandma soberly said,
"Which one are you going to drown?"

Santa Claus.

At this gift-season of the year millions of artless, confiding little children will be imposed upon by a most stupendous falsehood. They will be informed that Santa Claus, a being in the form of a big, burly man with snow-white hair and beard long, and flowing around a very red face, will come dressed in furry coat and top-boots, and laden with packs of tin trumpets and guns, carts, horses, dolls, tiny sets of dishes, and all things to please the little folks—that he will force his way noiselessly down the chimney and proceed to fill the stockings of children who have been good all the year (an impossible thing, by the way), and who have followed faithfully instructions of wise or over-wise elders, and who have placed the inoffensive stocking in a conspicuous part of the chimney corner. This downright lie will be forced upon the little ones by parents and grandparents, brothers and sisters, uncles, aunts, and cousins.

But, by and by, and very soon, in this precocious age, these same little ones will come to learn that mamma and papa, and the rest of the folks, in this matter didn't tell the truth, and may be, in after years, will tell that their first lesson in deception was learned at their mother's knee. "Oh, but it is a harmless tale, and too pretty a myth to let go," said a good mother, the other day. Pretty enough, but it is not harmless. False teaching never is. And why express falsely, when the plain, unvarnished truth is so much better? Let the gifts come in the stocking, or shoe, if it so please you, but let the child know how they got there, and whose dear hands they really came from. Will they not appreciate mamma's and papa's love, care, and thoughtfulness, much more than they can the coming of a mysterious Santa Claus who can have no reason for taking such interest in them?

Let us be honest with the children. Let us not deceive them, nor warp their tender minds in any way, or by any means whatever. Let us teach them the truth.

S. H. W.

A French Philosopher.

Perhaps no contributor to the school of philosophy has been so generally misunderstood as Pierre J. Proudhon.

His was not a character that seemed adapted to Paris and its people. Stern, cold, and proud, he repelled rather than attracted public attention. A critic has spoken of him as one "whose pen seemed dipped in vitriol rather than ink." "He had more capacity," said another, "for receiving blows than most men of original and eccentric genius, and he had a marvelous faculty for giving them." Strongly egoistic, he repudiated all authority that did not emanate from one's highest self.

Proudhon was born in Faubourg de la Mouillère at Besancon, in January, 1809. He was the child of poverty, and bred in obscurity. After a somewhat desultory education received chiefly at public libraries, Proudhon, as a young boy, began life a printer. Here his individuality asserted itself. He had published a little work of his own on general grammar, dedicated to the Academy at Besancon, and the society, recognizing the scientific merit of the essay, accepted it. This was a proud event for the rising young author. During this period a little incident occurred worth recording to illustrate the broad mind of the humanitarian.

A young man came to Besancon seeking employment, and hoping for an immediate engagement, as he was absolutely at the end of his resources. There was no work to be had. While the unfortunate applicant, forty-eight hours without food, is contemplating suicide, Proudhon meets him. Learning his distress, he takes him to his own room, gives him food, clothing, and lodging for two months, and finally is enabled to procure employment for him. This during a time when Proudhon received scanty remuneration himself, barely sufficing to provide the comforts of life. "You ask me if I know Proudhon," said this young workman, some time afterwards; "I owe him life; I it was whom he preserved from a leap into the river."

Perhaps this little illustration, brought so forcibly to Proudhon's attention, played no small part in his impression of labor's crushed and helpless condition. At any rate, he now developed into a typical reformer. Arriving at Paris in 1832, he set himself at once about perfecting his life work. "Say that which thou knowest," was his motto, and faithfully did he labor under it. This strong and implicit confidence in his own logic was the shield by which he defied all opposers. A noted biographer has said of him: "The scream of the volatils and the enthusiast without backbone only produced a sense of weariness in him." And the philosopher's description of the literary Frenchman gives evidence of great discernment. "The Frenchman does not really want to be free. Some one has said that we are not ripe for liberty; it is inexact. We shall never be ripe; this liberty is useless to us. Provided he has the wherewithal to live, permission to play or jest; provided he may comment upon the government while obeying it, the Frenchman is content." This is lamentably true of other nations as well as of France.

Many epithets and comparisons have been hurled at Proudhon from the pens of his various reviewers. Some of these are amusing. "Byron turned economist and publicist; doubt and despair raised into doctrine." "A Samson, who, failing to pull down the Philistine temple, shook the pillars, frightening a number of foolish people, greatly hissed at by others, and died." But it is absurd to aver, as a biographer has done, that "in nothing is Proudhon a Frenchman." He was essentially French, and belonged to France. Because intellect and logic set him above his class it does not follow that his character was not that of a Parisian. Anyone conversant with his works will realize this.

Proudhon possessed a powerful frame and an energetic mien, with a voice clear and vibrant as a bell. Everything he did was done with passion. This trait of character is purely French. And perhaps it was an unfortunate heritage. "He died at fifty-six, worn out," says a biographer. His death occurred in January, 1865.

Of course, Proudhon had his share of the persecution that so inevitably overtakes the unpopular reformer. He was in prison several times, and was, in fact, married from there. He was, also, several years in exile. His family number four, including Catherine Proudhon, who, perhaps inheriting some of her father's ability, has published a certain amount of correspondence which will undoubtedly prove of great value to the world when the writings and character of Proudhon are better understood.

IDA BALLOU.

What the Little Folks Are Saying.

It has remained for a little girl in Brooklyn to nearly if not quite equal the famous witticism of Leigh Hunt. Of course she spoke in childish innocence, where the English essayist and wit used his ripened intellect.

Hunt, in describing an exceedingly warm day, it will be remembered, spoke of it as one which tempted him "to strip off his flesh and sit in his bones."

This dear little Brooklyn miss had been romping and running all day. Toward nightfall her father met her. "Are you not very tired, little one?" he asked.

"Oh, not so very tired, papa," she replied. Then in a burst of confidence she whispered, "Only I do feel as though I'd like to take my legs off and carry them awhile."

AN EARLY INTIMATION. — "Johnny," said the boy's father, "I suppose that you are going to hang up your stocking next Christmas." "No, I'm not," was the reply after some thought. "Why not?" "Because," he answered, looking his father straight in the eye, "you couldn't put a bicycle in my stocking."

In your issue of December 14th, Sarah E. Wiley, of Galveston, Tex., asks how snakes catch their game. Replying I will say that the snakes catch rats, mice, squirrels, weasels, and other small animals by coiling themselves around their holes and patiently waiting till they come out. When they tighten the coils suddenly and crush them. I have witnessed the operation.

"Let go of that tail and that horn—I insist!"

Health and Happiness.

VIII.—DIET OR REGIMEN IN NURSING—CONTINUED.

During the first three months, and above all the first week or two, the mother should give to the infant only her own milk. I pray you to take no heed of the advice, very frequently tendered, that the milk lacks this or the other ingredient; is not nourishing; that the infant has need of something strengthening or refreshing. All kinds of mixtures will be recommended, teas of various kinds, etc.—many of which are the very means to induce ailments, as thrush and the like. The milk of the mother of a newly-born infant is always watery with little white flakes in it (colostrum). But it is precisely therein that the merit lies, and just for that reason it is suitable for the babe. Therefore during the first few days of the nursing's existence give it nothing but the mother's milk. It is not until towards the third or fourth month that she may introduce the bottle to the infant. Fresh cow's milk, one-third pure water, sweetened with milk sugar and slightly warmed, agrees with some children. Afterwards pure milk may sometimes be given. During the first five months, however, mothers will do well to give infants no other food but milk. A child of that age is not capable of digesting anything else. While it is not always easy to obtain pure milk, especially in large cities, yet I believe it is to be had by the careful selection of some honest milkman or farmer who will supply the genuine article. Goat's milk may be made to answer very well when cow's milk is not to be had. If, however, neither one or the other is obtainable, a good brand of condensed milk can be resorted to, diluted with water, and sweetened if necessary. Besides, that milk preserves well, and is especially convenient to those who are traveling with young children. Young mothers using the natural world do well to provide themselves with a can or a box of the condensed article ready for use, as during the night, perhaps, under the influence of heat, or a storm, etc., the milk destined for the child may become sour.

Many substances recommended as substitutes for mother's milk do not even merit the name. You may rest assured that many of the manufactured articles lack most of the elements of true milk. Nothing so nearly replaces mother's milk as that of the cow or goat, when properly prepared.

Supposing the child has safely reached the age of eight months, and has been fed altogether by the mother, two meals a day of cow's milk should now be introduced; say a teacupful at each meal. In case any discomfort arises, add one-third or one-fourth of lime-water. At the age of nine months, further variation may be introduced. An occasional cup of beef tea, mutton, chicken or veal broth, or the yolk of an egg. It must be remembered, however, that all these are merely accessories to the main diet, milk, of which a healthy child should consume a pint and a half to two pints a day. At this time of life it should have five meals a day, at 8 A. M. a teacupful of warm milk thickened with grated zwieback (dried bread); at 11 A. M. a cupful of warm milk or a teacupful of beef-tea, etc. If the child sleeps through the night do not disturb it; should it awake hungry, there is no objection to a cup of milk.

When a year old, the breakfast may consist of a cup of milk and a slice of bread and butter and the yolk of an egg lightly boiled; and again at 11, 2, and 6 o'clock of beef-tea, milk, etc. The meals may be varied by substituting oatmeal and milk, bread and milk, etc. Occasionally the child may have boiled mashed potatoes, perhaps cauliflower with gravy, at dinner. The general practice of very young children sitting at the same table with their parents, and partaking of the same food and drink, is anything but commendable. The child's stomach is not yet prepared to digest the same kind of food and drink as is the adult's. Besides, children acquire bad tastes and habits, which in many instances prove harmful and lead to gastric trouble. The custom of giving to children beer or other alcoholic stimulants at meals, or at any time, is very pernicious, and should under no circumstances be allowed.

Nursing.—Free breathing is essential to nursing. The child must breathe freely in order to nurse well. The breathing may be impeded either by the child's nose lying too close to the breast, or by being stopped up. Care, therefore, should be taken, in case the babe does not nurse freely, to see whether the breathing is not thus hindered. In the former case a slight pressure of the finger on the place with which the nose comes in contact will remove the impediment. If, however, it should be noticed that the child draws and swallows unsteadily and lets go every few minutes, the cause is no doubt a temporary closing of the nose with hardened mucus. To relieve this introduce with a feather or camel's hair brush a little pure fat or oil into the nostrils. If that is ineffective, syringe the nose with a little warm salt water. The organ being cleansed, the child will again breathe freely through the nose. If you wish to discover whether or not the child's nostrils are stopped up, place a very narrow strip of thin paper about two inches long before the openings of the nose. If the nostrils are free you will see the paper move with every expiration; if the nose is stopped up the paper will not move. When children breathe through the mouth it is very frequently an indication that the nose is filled with dried mucus, in which case respiration through its normal channel is hindered. J. HARTMANN, M.D.

If this were not a folding-bed,
I'd take all risks myself," she said.

Mrs. H. (returning from church): "You seemed to agree with all the parson said this morning." Mr. H.: "What makes you think so? I heard very little of it?" Mrs. H.: "Well, you nodded at nearly every sentence."

HAS it occurred to Mr. Roosevelt to calculate the exact reduction in Jesse James brigandage which might be effected if the Blue laws were so enforced as to prevent masked brigands from working on Sunday?—New York World.

THE Christian Endeavor Society prayed on Thanksgiving day for the conversion of Bob Ingersoll. This is time wasted. Better pray for snow for Christmas eve, so Santa Claus can get around easily.—Canton (Ohio) News-Democrat.

DEACON PASSER (to boys whom he has found playing in the meeting-house): "What do you mean by making all this noise in the house of the Lord?" That Bad Towser Boy: "I reckon this is Uncle Tommie Anderson's house. My dad allows he's got a mortgage on it for more 'n it's wuth."—Boston Transcript.

THE minister had been in the little Kentucky town but a short time, and when he was called to preach a funeral sermon he thought it best to pick up a few facts about the deceased. "I trust our brother gone before was a truly religious man?" he said to the surviving brother. "You bet he was," was the earnest answer. "Why, brother, he never tuk out his gun to lay fer one of the Simmonses without fust prayin' three hours."—Cincinnati Enquirer.

HE DIDN'T GO THERE.—Fond Mother: "Dear me, what's the matter now?" Married Daughter: "Boo-hoo—my husband has deceived me." Fond Mother: "The brute! How do you know?" Married Daughter: "He—boo-hoo—he said he was—was going to the church fair last night, and—and he didn't. He went somewhere else." Mother: "Who told you he went somewhere else?" Daughter: "No one. This morning I found some—some money in his pockets—boo-hoo-hoo!"—New York Weekly.

IN Westminster Abbey, says an English paper, there is a large marble tablet in memory of a famous bishop. It is a bas-relief, representing the bishop—a portrait—in the agony of death, sinking into the arms of an allegorical female figure, presumably intended for the angel of death. It is said that an aged couple from the country were being shown around the abbey, and pausing long before the tablet the old lady remarked to her husband: "That's a good likeness of the bishop, but," regarding the angelic personage attentively, "it's a very poor one of Mrs. —. I knew her very well, and she didn't look like that."—New York Tribune.

HERE is a story about that eccentric character, the late Lord Ailesbury. It has the two-fold merit of being true and of never having previously appeared in print. Lord Ailesbury was standing bareheaded in a well-known hatter's shop in Piccadilly while his hat was being ironed. A bishop—who, being still alive, has not yet reached his turn for posthumous anecdotes, and must consequently be nameless—entered the shop in full attire, and seeing Lord Ailesbury bareheaded, mistook him for a shopman. Taking off his own head-covering, the bishop said, "I want to know if you have a hat like this?" Lord Ailesbury surveyed the hat and its owner, and turned on his heel with the curt remark, "No, I haven't; and if I had, I'm d—d if I'd wear it."—London Realm.

MR. GOULTER WOOD writes as follows of an incident which occurred at Bradford-on-Avon, near Bath, in 1805. The bishop visited the town, and at the morning service the parish clerk said: "Let us zing to the praaize and glawry o' God dree vus-ses o' the hundred an' vourteenth Zam, a varision zbecially 'dapted to the 'casion by myself—

"Why hop ye zo, ye little, little hills?
An' what var do 'e skip?
Is it a 'cos yu'm proud to zee

"Why skip ye zo, ye little, little hills?
An' what var do e' hop?

"Yese; he is com'd to preach to we;
Then let us all strike up,
An' zing a glawrious zong o' praaize,
An' bless the Lard Bishop."

Gems of Thought.

VOLTAIRE was not a saint. He was educated by the Jesuits.—Ingersoll.

WRONGS intrenched in bad legislation can never be converted into vested rights.—Investigator.

IF Christ had the power to defend himself from the Jews and refused to use it, he was guilty of suicide.—Diderot.

POWER is a brutal thing, and will always in the end go to those who have least knowledge and insight.—Auberon Herbert.

HUMAN wisdom is the aggregate of all human experience, constantly accumulating, selecting, and reorganizing its own materials.—Story.

HE that will freely speak and write must be forever no slave, under no prince or law, but lay out the matter truly as it is, not caring what anyone will like or dislike.—Lucian.

THE Catholic would pray as a Catholic. The Unitarian and the Trinitarian would pray in a like manner. We are opposed to any and all who wish to go into our schools with even select quotations from the Bible, or with "non-sectarian" prayers.—Progressive Age.

DO not gain a boy's trust; convince him by your behavior that you have his happiness at heart; let him discover that you are the wiser of the two; let him experience the benefits of following your advice and the evils that arise from disregarding it; and fear not you will readily enough guide him.—Herbert Spencer.

ALL religion is paradoxical to reason. God hates sin, yet sin exists. He is omnipotent, yet evil is not overcome. The will of man is free, or there can be no guilt, yet the action of the will, so far as experience can throw light on its operation, is as much determined by antecedent causes as every other rational force. Prayer is addressed to a being assumed to be omniscient, who knows better what is good for us than we can know, who sees our thoughts without requiring to hear them in words; whose will is fixed and cannot be changed. Prayer, therefore, in the eye of reason, is an impertinence.—Froude.

CONSIDER . . . the work of Herbert Spencer in relation to the era in which it has arisen. Without aristocratic birth, without means sufficient even to secure leisure, without authority save in his powers of reason, it has been his fate to pursue his career in a country where the talismanic words are title, wealth, position. Distinguished as a philosopher alone, he has striven to make his influence felt in a nation where the respect for pure intellectuality, and where the general diffusion of culture, are far below that of the other two great nations foremost in civilization—France and Germany. Attempting to establish philosophy upon a new basis, he has run counter to the prodigious prestige of the Universities with their stereotyped teaching still looked in the absurdities of medieval metaphysics.—Arthur Lynch, in Free Review.

IF the average man, the one unaddicted to the habit of analysis, is told that he is virtuous only because "happiness is the end and aim of morality," he is wont to express doubt, or to exhibit indignation with a thesis which is foreign to the smug and comforting philosophy in which he has been reared. He will tell you, and probably with perfect sincerity, that he does not always do the right because the right will bring him happiness, but because he wishes to be upright and moral, and to act in the right for right's sake. But by whatever label we describe worthy conduct, the fact remains that the desire for pleasure is the radix which develops into the lovely efflorescence of the grandest deeds of altruism. The pleasure may be immediately secured by the "moral glow" or satisfaction, or it may follow upon transient pain.—Walter M. Gallichan, in Free Review.

I AM sorry to know that honest men who are quite intelligent on all other questions, and who quite naturally yield to doubt in all other things, are positively thrown into a panic when a doubt respecting any religious matter presents itself to their consciousness. So absolutely have the creeds enslaved men that they feel afraid to use their reason, and dread the possible consequences of the use of their own senses! Can any degradation be deeper than that? Ordinary tyrants can intimidate men as far as actions are concerned; but it requires the wicked priest to intimidate them as to thought and belief. And how utterly wicked must that tyranny be which treats the natural, honest workings of the mind as sin! Yet men permit the mongers of that holy sham to prate of morality, while their system is the most immoral thing to be anywhere found. It is horrible! Let us do our uttermost to destroy priestly tyranny.—Joseph Symes.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

POPES AND THEIR DOINGS

ACCOUNT OF

Vicars of Christ and Vicegerents of God. Cloth, 75 cents.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

Price, 20 cents, six for $1.

ON Dec. 17th President Cleveland sent to the United States Senate a message in which he recommended the application of the Monroe doctrine to the boundary dispute between England and Venezuela and called for a commission to ascertain the line between Venezuela and British Guiana, over which the dispute had arisen. In his message he uttered the following war note: "While it is a grievous thing to contemplate the two great English-speaking peoples of the world as being otherwise than friendly competitors in the onward march of civilization and strenuous and worthy rivals in all the arts of peace, there is no calamity which a great nation can invite which equals that which follows a supine submission to wrong and injustice, and the consequent loss of national self-respect and honor beneath which is shielded and defended a people's safety and greatness." This means that the United States will go to war with England if the boundary dispute is not settled with fairness to the South American republic. In England it is said that Lord Salisbury, prime minister, will pay no attention to the message on the ground, first, that the Monroe doctrine does not apply, and, second, that the United States has no right to interfere in the matter. The Senate and House have passed a bill giving the president authority to appoint the commission he recommends, which will probably consume about three months in its investigations, and then report. The cost of the committee is placed at one hundred thousand dollars. There is considerable warlike talk on both sides of the Atlantic, and some preparation. London speculators, actuated more by pique than by fear of loss, are said to be unloading their American securities, and Wall street is in dismay. The president has supplemented his war message with one urging immediate financial legislation; to which the House will respond with a tariff-revising measure, probably with an attachment providing for the issue of a popular loan to maintain the gold reserve.
